PUBLISHERS' PREFACE.

THE plan of this CYCLOPÆDIA is somewhat different from the other Bible Dictionaries and Cyclopædias which have of late years issued from the press, combining as it does the general features of a Biblical and a Theological Cyclopædia, with a comprehensive digest of the Literature and Biography connected with Christianity. The Compiler has freely availed himself of all accessible sources of information, with the view of supplying, both to the Theological Student and the non-professional reader, a popular compendium of what has been written, both in ancient and modern times, on the most important subjects which are either involved in or allied to Bible Christianity.

Instead of making a parade of erudition, which is calculated to dazzle, and sometimes to mislead, rather than to instruct the general public, the present volume is designed to present the results rather than the processes of a somewhat prolonged studious investigation, in a form so simple as to be within the comprehension of the most unlettered reader. All discussions of a purely grammatical and exegetical character have been sedulously avoided.

The doctrines and precepts of Christianity have been fully considered, not in the light of mere human systems, but with a constant reference to the Word of God—the only unerring standard of divine truth.

Much attention has been bestowed on Oriental Manners and Customs, as illustrating many passages in the Bible, as well as enabling the reader to enter into the whole spirit and genius of the sacred books.

The opinions of the various sects which have sprung up in the course of the History of the Christian Church, have been fully explained.

The corrupt doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome have been freely exposed, and their absurd and unscriptural character clearly shown.

To render the work more complete, the Compiler has introduced a Biographical History of the most eminent divines, who have either originated sects, or, at all events, powerfully influenced the times in which they lived.

No point, in short, has been willingly omitted which seemed to throw light upon Bible Christianity, or to enlarge the religious information of the Bible Christian. The present work, it is hoped, may serve to promote the interests of vital godliness, as well as to advance the cause of true scriptural knowledge.

The rapid progress of Christian literature, which characterises the age in which we live, seems to call for the appearance of such a volume as that which is here presented to the public. Many valuable accessions have no doubt been made of late years to this department of Literature, but the greater number of them have been more erudite than popular, besides being almost, if not entirely, limited in their range to subjects of a strictly Biblical character. But the sphere of the present volume extends to all that can be fairly considered as included in religion, and may therefore prove a useful closet companion to the Bible, as well as the source of much varied and interesting information to the general reader.

PREFACE.

THE present volume is intended to supply a felt desideratum in the Christian Literature of the day. During the last half century, various Biblical and Theological Dictionaries and Cyclopædias have issued from the press, affording to the professional student ample means of advancing his knowledge of Divine Truth. It is desirable, however, that a taste for Sacred Literature should no longer be confined to our Theological Halls, but should be diffused as widely as possible among the Christian Families of our land. To contribute, in some degree, towards the accomplishment of this all-important object, the "CHRISTIAN CYCLOPÆDIA" is now offered to the public, being designed as a popular compendium of what has hitherto been written on all those subjects which are either involved in, or allied to Christianity. Among the numerous topics discussed in the work may be mentioned :—The Doctrines and Duties of Theology,—the various Opinions of the different Sects which have arisen in the course of time in the Christian Church, along with a Biographical History of the most eminent Divines,—the corrupt Doctrines and Practices of the Church of Rome,—the Natural History of the Bible,—and a view of Oriental Geography, Manners, and Customs, in so far as these bear upon the illustration of the Word of God. In its plan, in short, this Cyclopædia embraces the general features of both a Biblical and Theological Dictionary, along with a comprehensive digest of the Literature and Biography connected with Christianity; the idea having been suggested by, as the volume is founded on a work which was published in America nearly twenty years ago, under the title of "The Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge,"—a book which, however useful at the time of its appearance, falls far short of the present advanced state of Theological Literature. To the preparation of the "Christian Cyclopædia," the Compiler has devoted the careful study and laborious research of many years; and, while a large portion of the book is the original product of his own pen, it is only becoming to mention that he has availed himself largely of the writings of his predecessors in the same walk of literature. In drawing up the articles on Natural History, he gratefully acknowledges his obligations to the valuable work of Harris; and for the strictly Theological articles he has been much indebted to the Dictionaries of Buck and Brown. The erudite work of Calmet, with the no less erudite Fragments of Taylor, the sensible and judicious Dictionaries of Watson and Jones, and the admirable and profoundly learned Cyclopædia of the lamented Kitto, have opened up rich mines of precious material, from which has been derived much of the information with which the present work is enriched. The knowledge here communicated, indeed, has been obtained from every accessible source; and, therefore, far from making any pretensions to originality, the "Christian Cyclopædia" professes to be nothing more than a "Repertory of Biblical and Theological Literature," suited to the age in which we live.

PART I.

It is a well-attested truth, that immorality ever grows with infidelity; and to the prevalence of vice must certainly be imputed that scorn and derision in which too many in the present day hold the sacred oracles of God,—the revealed will of the great Creator of heaven and earth.

From hence, therefore, it is reasonable to ask, what cause can produce so strange a deviation from the ways of God? Doubtless, from that unhappy disregard, either to the gospel in general, or to his peculiar and essential truths so visible in the world, and which appear to be continually increasing. It is too evident that multitudes among us, like those of old, who thought and professed themselves the wisest of mankind, or in other words, the free-thinkers of the age, have been desirous of banishing God and his truths from their knowledge; and it is therefore the less to be wondered at, if “God has given them up to a reprobate mind;” to the most infamous lusts and enormities; and to a depth of degeneracy, which, while it is in part the natural consequence, is in part also the just, but dreadful punishment of their apostasy from the faith. And we are persuaded that those who wish well to the cause of Christ, as every true Christian most certainly does, cannot serve it more effectually, than by endeavouring to establish men in their belief of the gospel in general, and to build them up in its most holy faith. The latter, we flatter ourselves, we have sufficiently done in the course of the various topics embraced in this Christian Cyclopædia; and propose in this Dissertation to prove, that the Christian religion is true, and owes its origin to God himself.

It will be needless to observe, that this is a matter of the highest importance, as every one will apprehend that this is the foundation of all our hopes. It is absolutely necessary, in this age of libertinism, that every Christian should be able “to give a reason for the hope that is in him,” and to put to silence the tongues of those men who have evil will at Zion. And may the Almighty enable us to plead his cause with success! May the divine Spirit accompany these arguments, that the faith of our readers being more and more established, it may appear that the tree is watered at the roots, by all the other graces growing and flourishing in an equal proportion.

God has made ample provision for the honour and support of his gospel, by furnishing it with a variety of proofs, which may, with undiminished, and indeed with growing conviction, be displayed in the eyes of the whole world: and we should be greatly wanting in gratitude to him, in zeal for a Redeemer’s kingdom, and in charitable concern for the conversion of those who reject the gospel, as well as for the edification of those who embrace it, should we wholly overlook those arguments, or neglect to acquaint ourselves with them. This is the evidence we propose, and beg our readers would peruse it with becoming attention.

In prosecution of this great design, we shall endeavour more particularly to show, that if we take the matter on a general survey, it will appear highly probable, that such a system of doctrines and precepts, as we find Christianity to be, should, indeed, have been a divine revelation; and then, that if we examine into the external evidence of it, we shall find it, certain in fact, that it was so, and that it had its origin from on high.

First, then, we are to show, that taking the matter merely in theory, it will appear highly probable, that such a system as the gospel should be indeed a divine revelation.

To prove this, we shall endeavour to show, That the state of mankind was such, as greatly to need a revelation; that there seems, from the light of nature, encouragement to hope that God would grant one; that it is reasonable to believe, that if any were made, it should be introduced and transmitted as Christianity was; and that its general nature and substance should be such as we find that of the gospel is. If we satisfactorily prove these particulars, there will be a strong presumptive evidence that the gospel is from God, and a fair way will be opened for that more direct proof, which is principally intended.

1. The case of mankind is naturally such as to need a divine revelation.

We would not be understood to speak here of a man in his original state, though, even then, some instruction from above seemed necessary to inform him of many particulars which it was highly proper for him then to know; but we speak of him in the degenerate condition in which he now so evidently lies, by whatever means he fell into it. It is very easy to make florid encomiums on the perfection of natural light, and to deceive unwary readers by an ambiguous term, as a late author has done in his deistical writings: a fallacy beneath an ingenuous reasoner, and which alone ought to have exposed his book to the contempt of every serious reader. Truth needs no disguise; a candid advocate scorns such subterfuges; let facts speak for themselves, and controversy will soon be decided. We appeal to every intelligent reader who is acquainted with the records of antiquity, or that has any knowledge of the present state of those countries where Christianity is unknown, whether it is not too obvious a truth, that the whole Heathen world has lain, and still lies, in a state of wickedness. Have not the greater part of them been perpetually bewildered in their religious notions and practices, very different from each other, and almost equally differing on all sides from the appearances of truth and reason? Is any thing so wild as not to have been believed; any thing so infamous as not to have been practised by them, while they not only pretended to justify it by reason, but to have consecrated it as a part of their religion? To this very day, what are the discoveries of new nations in the American or African world; but, generally speaking, the opening new scenes of enormity? Rapine, lust, cruelty, human sacrifices, and the most stupid idolatries, are, and always have been, the morality and religion of almost all the Pagan nations under heaven; and if they have discovered a dawn of reason, it has only sufficed to convince them of the want of an abler guide, to direct them in pursuit of real happiness.

But perhaps some of our readers have only heard those things by uncertain reports. If this be the case, look around you within the sphere of your own observation, and remark the temper and character of the generality of those who have been educated in a Christian and even in a Protestant country. Observe their ignorance and forgetfulness of the divine Being, their impieties, their debaucheries, their fraud, their oppression, their pride, their avarice, their ambition, their unnatural insensibility of the wants, sorrows, and interest of each other; and when you see how bad they are in the midst of so many advantages, judge by that of the probable state of those that want them. When the candid reader has well weighed these particulars, let him judge whether a revelation be an unnecessary thing.

2. There is, from the light of nature, considerable encouragement to hope, that God would favour his creatures with so desirable a thing as a revelation appears to be.

That a revelation is in itself a possible thing, is evident beyond all shadow of doubt. Shall not He that made man's mouth, who has given us this wonderful faculty of discovering our sentiments, and communicating our ideas to each other; shall not he be able to converse with his rational creatures, and by sensible manifestations, or inward impressions, to convey the knowledge of things which lie beyond the discernment of their natural faculties, and yet may be highly conducive to their advantage? To own a God and to deny him such a power, would be a notorious contradiction. But it may appear much more dubious, whether he will please to confer such a favour on sinful creatures.

Now it must be acknowledged, that he would not certainly conclude he would never do it; considering, on the one hand, how justly they stood exposed to his final displeasure: and, on the other, what provision he had made by the frame of the human mind, and of nature around us, for giving us such notices of himself as would leave us inexcusable, if we either failed to know him, or to glorify him as God, as the apostle argues at large, (Rom. i. 20, &c.) Nevertheless, we should have something of this kind to hope from considering God as the indulgent father of his creatures; from observing the tender care he takes of us, and the liberal supply which he grants for the support of the animal life; especially from the provision he has made for man, considered as a guilty and calamitous creature, by the medicinal and healing virtues he has given to the productions of nature, which man, in a perfect state of rectitude and happiness, never would have needed.

This is a circumstance which seems strongly to intimate, that he would some time or other graciously provide an adequate remedy to heal the minds of the children of men; and that he would interpose to instruct them, in his own nature, in the manner in which he is to be served, and in the final treatment which they may expect from him. And certainly such an apprehension seems very congruous to the sentiments of the generality of mankind; a sufficient proof that men naturally expect some such kind of interposition of the Almighty.

3. It is natural to conclude, that if a revelation were given, it would be introduced and transmitted in such a manner as the Evangelists show us Christianity was.

It is, for instance, highly probable, that it should be taught either by some illustrious person, sent down from a superior world, or at least by a man of eminent wisdom and piety, who should himself have been not only a teacher, but an example of righteousness. In order to this, it seems probable, that he should be led through a series of calamities and distress; since otherwise he could not have been a pattern of that resignation which adorns adversity, and is peculiar to it. And it might also have been expected, that in the extremity of his distress, the Almighty, whose messenger he was, should, in some extraordinary manner, have interposed either to preserve, or to recover him from death.

It is, moreover, exceeding probable, that such a person, and perhaps also they who were at first employed as his messengers to the world, should be endowed with a power of working miracles, both to awaken men's attentions, and to prove his divine mission, and the consequent truth of his doctrines, some of which might, perhaps, be capable of no other proof; or if they were, it is certain that no method of arguing is so short, so plain, and so forcible, and on the whole so well suited to conviction, and probably the reformation of mankind, as a course of evident, repeated, and uncontrolled miracles. And such a method of proof is especially adapted to the populace, who are incomparably the greater part of mankind, and for whose benefit we may assure ourselves a revelation would be chiefly designed. It might be added, that it was no way improbable, though not in itself certain, that a dispensation should open gradually to the world; and that the most illustrious messenger of God to men, should be ushered in by some predictions which should raise a great expectation of his appearance, and have an evident accomplishment in him.

As for the propagation of a religion so introduced, it seems no way improbable, that having been thus established in its first age, it should be transmitted to future generations, by credible testimony, as other important facts are. It is certain, that affairs of the utmost moment, transacted among men, depend on testimony: on this, voyages are undertaken, settlements made, and controversies decided; controversies on which not only the estates, but the lives of men depend. Though it must be owned, that such an historical evidence is not equally convincing with miracles which are wrought before our own eyes; yet it is certain it may rise to such a degree as to exclude all reasonable doubt. We know not why we should expect, that the evidence of a revelation should be such, as universally to compel the immediate acquiescence of all to whom it is offered. It appears much more probable, that it should be so adjusted, as to be a kind of touchstone to the tempers and characters of men, capable, indeed, of giving ample satisfaction to the diligent and candid inquirer, yet attended with some circumstances, from whence the captious and perverse might take occasion to cavil and object. Such we might reasonably suppose a revelation would be, and such we maintain Christianity is. The teachers of it undertake to prove, that it was thus introduced, thus established, and thus transmitted; and we trust that this is a strong presumption in its favour, especially as we add,

4. That the principal doctrines in the gospel are of such a nature, that we might in general suppose a divine revelation would be, rational, practical, and sublime.

It is natural to imagine, that in a revelation of a religion from God, the great principles of natural religion should be clearly asserted and strongly maintained; such as the existence, the unity, the perfection, and the providence of God; the essential and immutable difference between moral good and evil; the obligations we are under to the various branches of virtue, whether human, social, or divine; the value and immortality of the soul; and the rewards and punishments of a future state. All these particulars every rational person would conclude were contained in it; and that upon the whole it should appear calculated to form men's minds to a proper temper, rather than to amuse them with curious speculations.

It might, indeed, be farther supposed, that such a revelation would contain some things which could not have been learnt from the highest improvements of natural light; such as, that God would pardon the sins of the most flagrant offender, on account of the satisfaction made by his dear Son, the Redeemer of the world; that he would work holy desires in the hearts of his people, by the power of his divine grace ; and form them for happiness hereafter, by implanting in them a principle of holiness.

In short, the Christian system is undoubtedly worthy of God, nor is it possible to imagine from whom else it could have proceeded.*

Thus have we considered the first branch of the argument, and shown, we hope satisfactorily, that taking the Christian system only in theory, it appears highly probable. The truth is, to embrace the gospel is so safe, and upon the whole so comfortable a thing, that a wise man would deliberately venture his all upon it, though nothing more could be offered for its confirmation. But, blessed be God, we have a great deal more to offer in this important cause ; and can add, with still greater confidence, that it is not only probable in theory, but,

Secondly, That it is in fact certain ; that Christianity is indeed a divine revelation.

On this it must be confessed the chief stress is to be laid ; and therefore we shall insist more largely on this branch of the argument, and endeavour, by the Divine assistance, to prove the certainty of this great, this important fact. And in order to this, it will be necessary to show,

I. That the books of the New Testament now extant, may be depended upon as written by the first preachers and publishers of Christianity. And,

II. That from hence it will certainly follow, that what they assert is true ; and that the religion they teach, brings with it such evidences of a Divine authority, as may justly recommend it to our acceptance.

Each of these heads would furnish matter for several volumes ; but as we are writing only a Dissertation, it is our business to strike at the most obvious and important particulars, by which they may briefly be illustrated and confirmed.

I. We are to prove, that the books of the New Testament, now extant, were written by the first preachers and publishers of Christianity.

We shall now confine ourselves to the books of the New Testament, as that particular part of the sacred Oracles has engrossed our present attention ; though we propose, in another place to lay down some solid arguments in defence of the authenticity of the Old, which is an invaluable treasure, being the very foundation of the New, and demands our daily, pleasing, and grateful perusal, and is capable of being defended in a manner we are persuaded its most subtle enemies will never be able to answer.

After premising these particulars, we shall go on to the argument, and advance it by the following degrees. We shall prove that Christianity is an ancient religion—That there was such a person as Jesus of Nazareth crucified above seventeen hundred years ago, at Jerusalem—That the first preachers of his religion wrote books, which went by the name of those that now make up the volume of the New Testament—And that the English translation of them now publicly used, is in the main faithful, and may be depended upon.

1. It is certain that Christianity is not a new religion, but one that was maintained by great multitudes soon after the time in which the gospels tell us Jesus appeared.

That there was, considerably more than seventeen hundred years ago, a body of men that went by the name of Christians, is full as evident as that a race of men was then subsisting in the world ; nor do we know that any enemy to the religion of Jesus has ever been vile and confident enough to dispute it. Indeed there are such numbers both of Christian and hea-

* From what has been said, it sufficiently appears, that revelation was absolutely necessary to instruct mankind in the most important principles of religion, and consequently all the fallacious arguments of deistical writers against the necessity of an extraordinary revelation, fall to the ground, like a mighty structure when the foundation is destroyed.

then writers, who attest this fact, that it would be madness to deny it, and therefore superfluous for us to prove it. But we cannot help observing that Tacitus, Suetonius, Pliny, Marcus Antonius, and others, not only attest the existence of such a body of men, but also inform us of the extreme persecutions they underwent in the very infancy of their religion; a strong evidence that they were firmly persuaded that their religion was from on high.

2. That there was such a person as Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified at Jerusalem, when Pontius Pilate was the Roman governor there.

It can never be imagined, that multitudes of people should take their names from Christ, and sacrifice their lives for their adherence to him, even in the same age in which he lived, if they had not been well assured that there was such a person. Nay, Tacitus himself tells us that he was put to death under Pontius Pilate, who was procurator of Judea in the reign of Tiberius. And it is well known that the primitive Christian apologists often appeal to the acts of Pilate, or the memoirs of his government, which he, according to the custom of all other procurators, transmitted to Rome as containing an account of these transactions; and as the appeal was made to those who had the command of the public records, we may assure ourselves such testimonies were then extant. But it is a fact which our enemies never denied. They owned it; they even gloried in it, and upbraided the Christians with the infamous death of him whom they called their Saviour. Thus it sufficiently appears that there was, at the time commonly supposed, such a person as our blessed Saviour Christ, who was a divine teacher, and who gathered many disciples, by whom his religion was afterwards published in the world.

3. It is also certain that the first publishers of this religion wrote books, which contained an account of the life and doctrines of Jesus their Master, and which went by the names of those that now make up our New Testament.

It was in the nature of things highly probable that they would declare and publish to the world in writing, the things they had seen and heard; considering how common books were in the age and countries in which they taught; and of how great importance an acquaintance with the history and doctrine of Christ was to the purposes which they so strenuously pursued; but we have much more than such a presumptive evidence.

The most inveterate adversaries to Christianity must grant that we have books of great antiquity, written some fourteen, some fifteen, and some more than sixteen hundred years ago; in which mention is made of the life of Christ, as written by many, and especially by four of his disciples, who by way of eminence are styled Evangelists. Great pains have indeed been taken to endeavour to prove, that some spurious pieces were published under the names of the apostles, containing the history of these things. But all these have been confuted, and the vile asserters stigmatized with that contempt their false asseverations justly deserved. And we are sure he must be very little acquainted with the ancient ecclesiastical writers, who does not know that the primitive Christians made a great difference between those writings, which we call the canonical books of the New Testament, and others: which plainly shows that they did not judge of writings merely by the names of their pretended authors, but inquired with an accuracy becoming the importance of these pretences. The result of this inquiry was, that the four Gospels, the Acts, the Epistles of St Paul, one of St Peter, and one of St John, were received upon such evidence, that Eusebius, a most accurate and early critic in these things, could not learn that they had ever been disputed. And afterwards the remaining books of the New Testament, namely, Hebrews—James—the second of Peter—the second and third of John—Jude—and the Revelation, were admitted as genuine, and added to the rest. On the whole, it is sufficiently plain, that the primitive Christians were so thoroughly satisfied of the authority of the sacred books, that they speak of them not only as credible and authentic, but as equal to the oracles of the Old Testament, as divinely inspired, as the words of the Spirit, as the law and organ of God, and as the rule of faith, which cannot be contradicted without the greatest guilt; with many other expressions of the same kind, which often occur in their discourses. To which we may add, that in some of their councils, the New Testament was placed on a throne, to signify their desire, that all their controversies might be determined, and their actions regulated by it.

From the whole, therefore, it is plain, that the primitive church did receive certain pieces which bore the same titles with the books of our New Testament. Now we think it is evident, that they were as capable of judging whether a book was written by Matthew, John, or Paul, as the ancient Romans could be of determining whether Horace, Tully, or Livy, wrote those which go under these names. And certainly the interest of the former was much more concerned in the writings of the apostles, than that of the latter in the composition of their poets, orators, or even their historians; and there is reason to believe, they would take much greater care to inform themselves fully in the merits of the cause, and to avoid being imposed upon by artifice and fiction. Let us now proceed to show,

4. That the books of the New Testament have been preserved in the main uncorrupted, to the present time, in the original language in which they were written.

This is a matter of the last importance; and blessed be God, we have a proportional evidence: an evidence, in which the hand of Providence has, indeed, been remarkably seen; for it is certain there is no other ancient book in the world which may so certainly and so easily be proved to be authentic.

And here we will not argue merely from the piety of the primitive Christians, and the heroic actions and resolutions with which they chose to endure the greatest extremities, rather than deliver up their Bibles, though that consideration is evidently of the greatest weight; but shall entreat our readers to consider the utter improbability of altering them. From the first ages they were received and read in churches, as a part of their public worship, just as Moses and the prophets were in the Jewish synagogues; they were presently spread far and near as the boundaries of the church were increased; they were early translated into other languages, of which translations some remain to this very day. Now when this was the case, how could they be adulterated? Is it a thing to be supposed and imagined, that thousands and millions of people should have come together from distant countries; and that, with all their diversities of language and customs, and, it may be added, of sentiments too, they should have agreed on corrupting a book, which they all acknowledged to be the rule of their faith, and their manners, and the great charter by which they held their eternal hopes? It would be madness to believe it, especially when we consider what number of heretics appeared in the very infancy of the church, who all pretended to build their notions on scripture, and most of them appealed to it as the final judge of controversies. Now it is certain, that these different sects of Christians were a perpetual guard upon each other, and rendered it impossible for one party to practise thus grossly on the sacred books, without the discovery and clamour of the rest.

Nor must we omit to observe, that in every age, from the apostles' time to our own, there have been numberless quotations made from the books of the New Testament; and a multitude of commentaries in various languages, and some of very ancient date, have been written upon them; so that if the books themselves were lost, they might, in a great measure, if not entirely, be recovered from the writings of others. And we may venture to say, that if all the quotations ever made from all the ancient writings now in Europe were gathered together, the bulk of them would by no means be comparable to that of the quotations taken from the New Testament alone. So that any man might with much better reason dispute whether the writings ascribed to Homer, Demosthenes, Virgil, or Cæsar, be in the main such as they left them, than he could question it concerning those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Peter, James, and Paul.

It may be said, in the main, because we readily allow, that the hand of a printer, or of a transcriber, might chance, in some places, to insert one letter or word for another; and the various readings of this, as well as all other ancient books, prove, that this has sometimes been the case. But those various readings are generally of such little importance, that he who can urge them as an objection against the assertion we are now maintaining, must have little judgment, or little integrity; and, indeed, after those excellent things which have been said on the subject by many defenders of Christianity, he must, if he has read their writings, have little modesty too.

Since then it appears that the books of the New Testament, as they now stand in the original, are, without any material alteration, such as they were when they came from the hands of the sacred authors, nothing remains to complete this part of the argument, but to show,

5. That the translation of them now in common use may be depended upon, as, in all particulars, agreeable to the original.

This is a fact of which the generality of readers are not able to judge immediately, though it is of the last importance: it is therefore with great pleasure we reflect, how ample evidence they may have another way, to make their minds easy on this head. We mean, by the concurrent testimony of others, in circumstances in which it cannot be imagined they would unite to deceive them.

There are few who preach the gospel of the Son of God, but have examined this matter with the greatest care, and are able to judge in so easy a case; and who will all unanimously declare, that the common English translation is in the main faithful and judicious. We do not, indeed, scruple, on some occasions, to animadvert upon it; but these remarks never affect the fundamentals of religion, and seldom reach any farther than the beauty of a figure, or the connexion of an argument.

But the argument does not wholly rest on the unanimous suffrages of the teachers of the gospel. The different sects of protestants in this kingdom bear witness to this truth. For it is certain, that where a body of men dissent from the public establishment, and yet agree with the church from which they dissent, in using the same translation, though they are capable of examining and judging of it, is as great evidence as can be desired, that such a translation is right in the main. But the dissenters unanimously unite with us in bearing testimony to the oracle of God, as delivered in our own language; and consequently our translation may be depended upon.

Thus have I finished the first part of my argument, and shown that the Christian religion is certainly true, and that the New Testament is genuine. I shall next proceed to show, II. That from allowing the New Testament to be genuine, it will undeniably follow, that Christianity is a divine revelation.

And here a person is at first ready to be lost in the multiplicity of arguments which surround him. It is very easy to find proofs; but difficult to range and dispose them in such an order as best to illustrate and confirm each other. We shall therefore offer them in the following natural series.

The authors of the books contained in the New Testament were certainly capable of judging concerning the truth of the facts they asserted: their characters, so far as we can judge of them by their writings, render them worthy of regard; and they were under no temptation to attempt imposing on the world by such relations as they have given us, if they had been false. Nevertheless, it is certain in fact, that they did gain credit, and succeeded in a most amazing manner, against all opposition. It is therefore certain, that the facts which they asserted were true; and if they were true, then it was reasonable for their cotemporaries, and it is reasonable for us, to receive the gospel as a divine revelation: especially if we consider what has happened in the world for the confirmation of it, since first propagated by them. This is the conclusion to which we must attend; and therefore let us seriously consider each of the steps by which we arrive at it.

It is exceedingly evident, that the writers of the New Testament certainly knew the facts they asserted were true.

And this they must have known, for this plain reason; because they inform us, they did not trust merely to the report even of persons whom they thought most credible, but were present themselves when several of the most important facts happened; and so received them on the testimony of their own senses. On this St John, in his first epistle, ch. i. ver. 1—3. lays a very great and reasonable stress: "That which we have seen with our eyes;" and that not only by a sudden glance, but "which we have attentively looked upon, and which even our hands have handled of the word of life;" i. e. of Christ and his gospel, "declare we unto you."

Let the common sense of mankind judge here. Did not Matthew and John certainly know whether they had personally, and familiarly, conversed with Jesus of Nazareth or not? Whether he had chosen them for his constant attendants and apostles? Whether they had seen him heal the sick, dispossess devils, and raise the dead? And whether they themselves had received from him such miraculous endowments as they declare he bestowed upon them? Did not they know whether he fell into the hands of his enemies, and was publicly put to death or not? Did not John know whether he saw him expiring on the cross or not? and whether he received from him a dying charge, which he records, chap. xix. ver. 27. Did he not know whether he saw him wounded in the side with a spear or not? and whether he did or did not see that effusion of blood and water, which was an infallible argument of his being really dead? Concerning which, it being so material a circumstance, he adds, "He that saw it bare record; and he knoweth that he saith true;" i. e. that it was a case in which he could not possibly be deceived. And with regard to Christ's resurrection, did he not certainly know whether he saw our Lord again and again; and whether he handled his body, that he might be sure it was not a mere phantom? What one circumstance of his life could he certainly know, if he were mistaken in this?

Did not Luke know whether he was in the ship with Paul when that extraordinary wreck happened, by which they were thrown ashore on the island of Malta? Did he not know whether, while they were lodged together in the governor's house, Paul miraculously healed one of the family, and many other diseased persons in the island, as he positively asserts that he did in Acts xxviii?

Did not Paul certainly know whether Christ appeared to him on the way to Damascus or not? whether he was blind; and afterwards, on the prayer of a fellow-disciple, received his sight? or, was that a circumstance in which there could be room for mistake? Did he not know whether he received such extraordinary revelations and extraordinary powers, as to be able, by the laying on of his hands, or by the words of his mouth, to work miracles?

To add no more: Did not Peter know, whether he saw the glory of Christ's transfiguration, and heard that voice to which he so expressly refers, when he says, "We have not followed cunningly devised fables, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty, when there came such a voice to him; and this voice we heard," 2 Pet. chap. i. ver. 16—18.

Now Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Paul, and Peter, are by far the most considerable writers of the New Testament; and surely when we reflect on these particulars, we must own, that there are few historians, ancient or modern, that could so certainly judge of the truth of the facts which they have related. The reason why we have enlarged in stating so clear a case is, that it is the foundation of the whole argument; and that this branch of it alone cuts off infidels from that refuge which they could generally choose, that of pleading the apostles were enthusiasts; and leaves them silent, unless they will say that they were impostors. For you evidently see, that could we suppose these facts to be false, they could by no means pretend an involuntary mistake; but must, in the most criminal and aggravated sense, as Paul himself expresses it, 1 Cor. xv. 15. "be found false witnesses of God." But how unreasonable it would be to charge him with so notorious a crime, will in part appear, if we consider,

That the character of these writers, so far as we can judge by their works, seems to render them worthy of regard; and leaves no room to imagine that they intended to deceive us.

It would be unnecessary to show at large, that they appear to have been persons of natural sense, and, at the time of their writing, of a composed mind; for certainly, no man that ever read the New Testament with attention, could imagine they were idiots or madmen. Let the discourses of Christ in the Evangelists, of Peter and Paul in the Acts, as well as many passages in the Epistles, be perused, and we will venture to say, he who is not even charmed with them, must be a stranger to all the justest rules of polite criticism. But he who suspects that the writers wanted common sense, must himself be most evidently destitute of it: and he who can suspect they might possibly be distracted, must himself, in this instance at least, be just as mad as he imagines them to have been.—It was necessary, however, just to touch upon this; because, unless we are satisfied that a person be himself in what he writes, we cannot pretend to determine his character from his writings.

Having premised this, let us, on perusing the New Testament, observe what evident marks it bears of simplicity and integrity, of piety and benevolence; upon which we shall find them pleading the cause of its authors, with a nervous, though gentle eloquence; and powerfully persuading the mind, that men, who are capable of writing so excellently well, must evidently appear to have strictly adhered to the rectitude of truth.

The manner in which they relate this narration is most happily adapted to gain our belief. For as they tell it with a great deal of circumstances, which by no means could be prudent in legendary writers, because it leaves so much the more room for confutation; so they also do it in the most easy and natural manner. There is no air of declamation and harangue; nothing that looks like artifice and design; no apologies, no encomiums, no character, no reflections, no digressions; but the facts are recounted with great simplicity, just as they appear to have happened; and those facts are left to speak for themselves in their great Author. It is plain that the rest of these writers, as well as the apostle Paul, did not affect excellency of speech, or flights of eloquence, as the phrase signifies; but determined to know nothing, though among the most learned and polite, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified. A conduct which is the more to be admired, when we consider how extraordinary a theme theirs was, and with what abundant variety of most pathetic declamation it would easily have furnished any common writer; so that one would really wonder how they could forbear it. But they rightly judged, that a vain affectation of ornament, when recording such facts of their own knowledge, might perhaps have brought their sincerity into question; and so have rendered the cross of Christ of no effect.

Their integrity likewise evidently appears in the freedom with which they mention those circumstances, which might have exposed their Master and themselves to the greatest contempt, among prejudiced and inconsiderate men; such as they knew they must generally expect to meet with. As to their Master, they scruple not to own, that his country was despised, his birth and education mean, and his life indigent; that he was most disdainfully rejected by the rulers, and accused of sabbath-breaking, blasphemy, and sedition; that he was reviled by the populace as a debauchee, a lunatic, and a demoniac; and at last, by the united rage of both rulers and people, was publicly executed as the vilest of malefactors, with all imaginable circumstances of ignominy, scorn, and abhorrence.

Nor did they scruple to own that terror and distress of spirit into which he was thrown by his sufferings, though this was a circumstance at which some of the heathens took the greatest offence, as utterly unworthy so excellent and divine a person. As to themselves, the apostles readily confess not only the meanness of their original employment, and the scandals of their former life, but their prejudices, their follies, and their faults, after Christ had honoured them with so holy a calling. They acknowledged their slowness of apprehension under so excellent a teacher, their unbelief, their cowardice, their ambition, their rash zeal, and their foolish contentions. So that, on the whole, they seemed every where to forget that they were writing of themselves, and appear not at all solicitous about their own reputation; but only that they might represent the matter just as it was, whether they went through honour or dishonour, through evil report or good report. Nor is this all; for,

It is certain that in their writings there are the most genuine traces, not only of a plain and honest, but a most pious and devout, a most benevolent and generous disposition. These appear especially in the epistolary parts of the New Testament, where, indeed, we should most reasonably expect to find them; and of these it may be confidently affirmed, that the greater progress any one has made in love to God, in zeal for his glory, in a compassionate and generous concern for the present and future happiness of mankind, the more humble and candid, and temperate and pure he is, the more ardently he loves truth, and the more steadily he is determined to suffer the greatest extremity in its defence. In a word, the more his heart is weaned from the present world, and the more it is fired with the prospects of a glorious immortality, the more pleasure will he take in reading those writings; the more will he relish the spirit which discovers itself in them; and find, that as face answers face in water, so do the traces of divine grace which appear there, answer to those which a good man feels in his own soul. Nay, it may be added, that the warm and genuine workings of that excellent and holy temper, which every where discovers itself in the New Testament, have for many ages been the most effectual method of animating true believers with a zeal for the honour of the gospel, and a desire of framing their conversation as becomes the gospel of Christ.

Where, then, there are such genuine marks of an excellent character, not only in their discourses, but in their epistolary writings, and those sometimes addressed to particular and intimate friends, to whom the mind naturally opens itself with the greatest freedom, surely no candid and equitable judge would lightly believe them to be all counterfeit; or would imagine, without very substantial proof, that persons who breathe such exalted sentiments of God and religion, should be guilty of any kind of wickedness; and in proportion to the degree of enormity and aggravation attending such a supposed crime, it may justly be expected that the evidence of their having really committed it should be unanswerably strong and convincing.

Now it is very certain, on the principles laid down above, that if the testimony of the apostles were false, they must have acted as detestable and villanous a part as one can easily conceive. To be found, as the apostle with his usual energy expresses it, false witnesses of God, in any single instance, and solemnly declare to have done miraculously, what we, in our own consciences, know was never done at all, would be an audacious degree of impiety, to which none but the most abandoned of mankind could arrive. Yet if the testimony of the apostles was false, as we have proved they could not be themselves mistaken in it, this must have been their case; and that not in one single instance only, but in a thousand. Their lives must, in effect, be one continued and perpetual scene of perjury: and all the most solemn actions of it, (in which they were speaking to God, or speaking of him as God the Father of Christ, from whom they received their commission and powers,) must be a most profane and daring insult on all the acknowledged perfections of his nature.

And the inhumanity of such a conduct would, on the whole, have been equal to its impiety. For it would have been deceiving men in their most important interests, and persuading them to venture their own future happiness on the power and fidelity of one whom, on this supposition, they knew to have been an impostor, and justly to have suffered a capital punishment for his crimes. It cannot be supposed that God, who regards the interest of his children, would long suffer an imposition to prevail, without preventing it by the interposition of his wisdom and power.

It would have been great guilt to have given the hearts and devotions of men so wrong a turn, even though they had found magistrates ready to espouse and establish, yea, and to enforce the religion they taught. But, on the contrary, to labour to propagate it in the midst of the most vigorous and severe opposition from them, must equally enhance the guilt and folly of the undertaking. For by this means they would have made themselves accessory to the ruin of thousands: and all the calamities which fell on such proselytes, or even on their remotest descendants, for the sake of Christianity, would be in a great measure chargeable on these first preachers of it. The blood of honest, yea, of pious, worthy, and heroic persons, who might otherwise have been the greatest blessings to the public, would, in effect, be crying for vengeance against them. And the distresses of the widows and orphans, which those martyrs might leave behind them, would join to swell the account.

So that, on the whole, the guilt of those malefactors, who are from time to time the victims of public justice, even for robbery, murder, or treason, is small, when compared with that which we have now been stating. And corrupt as human nature is, it appears to be utterly improbable, that twelve men should be found, we will not say in one little nation, but even on the whole face of the earth, who could be capable of entering into so black a confederacy on any terms whatsoever.

And now, in this view of the case, let us make a serious pause, and compare with it what we have just been saying of the apostles of Jesus, so far as an indifferent person could conjecture it from their writings; and then say whether we can in our hearts believe them to have been these abandoned wretches, at once the reproach and astonishment of mankind? Would they have sealed a known falsity with their blood, or bartered their lives for the confirmation of vague notions, or uncertain conjectures? We cannot surely believe such things of any, and much less of them, unless it shall appear, they were in some peculiar circumstances of strong temptation; and what those circumstances could be, it is difficult even for imagination to conceive.

But history is so far from suggesting any unthought-of fact, to help our imagination on this head, that it bears strongly the contrary way. I shall now proceed to show,

That they were under no temptation to forge a story of this kind, or to publish it to the world, knowing it to be false.

They could reasonably expect no gain, no reputation by it, but on the contrary, supposing it an imposture, they must with the most ordinary share of prudence, have foreseen infamy and ruin, as the certain consequence of attempting it. For the grand foundation of their doctrines was, that Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified at Jerusalem by the Jewish rulers, was the Son of God, and the Lord of all things. We appeal to men's consciences, whether this looks at all like the contrivances of artful and designing men.

It was evidently charging upon the princes of their country, the most criminal and aggravated murder; indeed, all things considered, the most enormous act of wickedness which the sun had ever seen. They might therefore depend upon it, that these rulers would immediately employ all their art and power to confute the testimony, and to destroy their persons. Accordingly one of them was presently stoned, another quickly beheaded; and most of the rest were scattered abroad into strange cities, (as we learn from the Acts of the Apostles) where they were sure to be received with great prejudices, raised against them amongst the Jews, by reports from Jerusalem, and highly strengthened by their expectations of a temporal Messiah: expectations which, as the apostles knew by their own experience, it was exceedingly difficult to root out of men's minds: expectations which would render the doctrine of Christ crucified an insuperable stumbling-block to the Jews.

Nor could they expect a much better reception among the Gentiles, with whom their business was to persuade them to renounce the gods of their ancestors, and to depend upon a person who had died the death of a malefactor, to persuade them to forego the pompous idolatries in which they had been educated, and all the sensual indulgence with which their religion (if it may be called a religion) was attended, to worship one visible God through one Mediator, in the most plain and simple manner: and to receive a set of precepts, most directly calculated to control and restrain, not only the enormities of men's actions, but the irregularities of their hearts.

A most difficult undertaking! And to engage them to this, they had no other arguments to bring but such as were taken from the views of an eternal state of happiness or misery, of which they asserted their crucified Jesus to be supreme disposer, who should another day dispense his blessings or his vengeance, as the gospel had been embraced or rejected. Now, could it be imagined that men would be easily persuaded, merely on the credit of their affirmation, or in compliance with their importunity, to believe things which to their prejudiced minds would appear so improbable, and to submit to impositions to their corrupt inclinations so insupportable? And if they could not persuade them to it, what could the apostles then expect? What but to be insulted as fools or madmen by one sort of people; and by another to be persecuted with the most savage and outrageous cruelty, as blasphemers of their gods, as seducers of the people, and disturbers of the public peace? All which we know happened accordingly. Nay, they assure us, that their Lord had often warned them of it; and that they themselves expected it; and thought it necessary to admonish their followers to expect it too. And it appears, that far from drawing back upon that account, as they would surely have done if they had been governed by secular motives, they became so much the more zealous and arduous, and animated each other to resist even at the price of their blood.

Now, as this is a great evidence of the integrity and piety of their characters, and thus illustrates the former head, so it serves to the purpose now immediately in view, that is, it proves how improbable it is, that any person of common sense should engage in an imposture, from which, as many have justly observed, they could, on their own principles, have nothing to expect but ruin in this world, and damnation in the next. When we therefore consider and compare their character and circumstances, it appears utterly improbable, on various accounts, that they would have attempted in this article to impose upon the world. But suppose, that in consequence of some unaccountable, as well as undiscoverable frenzy, they had ventured on the attempt, it is easy to show,

That, humanly speaking, they must quickly have perished in it; and their cause must have died with them, without ever gaining any credit in the world. Common sense must have suggested to them, that a report of a circumstance most extraordinary in its nature, if not attested by the most convincing evidence, must have exposed their cause as base, absurd, and contemptible.

One may venture to say this in general, on the principle which we have before laid down. But it appears still more evident, when we consider the nature of the fact they asserted, in conjunction with the methods they took to engage men to believe it; methods which, had the apostles been impostors, must have had the most direct tendency to ruin both their doctrine and themselves.

Let us a little more particularly reflect on the nature of that grand fact, namely, the death, resurrection, and exaltation of Christ; which, as already observed, was the great foundation of the Christian system, as first represented by the apostles. The resurrection of a dead man, and his ascension into, and abode in the upper world, was so strange a thing, that a thousand objections might immediately be raised against it; and some extraordinary proofs might justly be required as a balance to them. Now the rejecters of the gospel, it might be supposed, would set themselves to invent some hypothesis, which should have some appearance of probability, to show how such amazing circumstances should ever gain credit in the world, if they had not some very convincing proofs. But this, with all their endeavours, is totally impracticable; and consequently, the most convincing proof that can be given of the great truth of the whole.

When the Christian seriously considers the horrid but vain attempts these enemies to the gospel make, to pervert that religion on which the redemption of the human race is founded, how natural is it for him to ask, Is it possible, that even the most impious and obstinate atheist can read with attention the various and astonishing circumstances that attended the Divine Redeemer, from his birth to his crucifixion, and yet disbelieve? Does not even the minutest circumstance and transaction fully evince the great truths of his mission? and shall the atheist continue even to doubt, merely because himself was not an eye-witness of the facts recorded by those who were?

The celebrated Dr Watts has very justly pictured the character of the atheist in the following stanzas:

Fools in their hearts believe and say,
That all religion's vain,
There is no God that reigns on high,
Or minds the affairs of men.

From thoughts so dreadful and profane, Corrupt discourse proceeds ;
And in their impious hands are found
Abominable deeds.

Their tongues are used to speak deceit,
Their slanders never cease ;
How swift to mischief are their feet ?
Nor know the path of peace.

Such seeds of sin (that bitter root)
In all their hearts are found ;
Nor can they bear diviner fruit,
Till grace refine the ground.

But let us pursue the argument a little farther, and we shall easily discover what must destroy every observation made by the infidel, and confirm his opponent in the incontrovertible and glorious cause of the Christian religion.

The manner in which the apostles undertook to prove the truth of their testimony to these facts : and it will evidently appear, that instead of confirming their system, it must have been sufficient utterly to have overthrown it, had it been itself the most probable imposture that the wit of man could ever have contrived. It is evident that they did not merely assert that they had seen miracles wrought by this Jesus, but that he had endowed themselves with a variety of miraculous powers. And these they undertook to display, not in such idle and useless tricks as slight of hand might perform ; but in such solid and important works, as appeared worthy of a divine interposition, and entirely superior to human power : restoring sight to the blind, soundness to lepers, activity to the lame, and, in some instances, life to the dead. Nor were these things undertaken in a corner, in a circle of friends or dependants : nor were they said to be wrought on such as might be suspected of being confederate in the fraud : but they were done often in the public streets, in the sight of enemies, or the persons of such as were utter strangers to the apostles ; but sometimes well known to neighbours and spectators, as having long laboured under those calamities, which, to human skill, were utterly incurable. Would impostors have made such pretensions as these ? Or, if they had, must they not immediately have been exposed and ruined ?

Nor is there any room at all to object ; that perhaps the apostles might not undertake to do these things on the spot, but only assert that they had done them elsewhere ; for even then, it would have been impossible that they should have gained credit ; and they would have seemed the less credible, on account of such a pretence. Whatever appearance there might have been of gravity, integrity, and piety, in the conversation of Peter ; for instance, very few, especially such as had known but little of him, would have taken it upon his word, that he saw Jesus raise Lazarus from the dead at Bethany, but fewer yet would have believed upon his affirmation, had it been ever so solemn, that he himself raised Dorcas at Joppa, unless he had done some extraordinary work before them, correspondent at least, if not equal to that. One may easily think of invincible objections which otherwise might have been made ; and undoubtedly the more such assertions had been multiplied, every new person, scene, and fact, had been an additional advantage given to the enemy, to have detected and confuted the whole system, which Peter and his brethren had thus endeavoured to establish.

But to come still closer to the point : If the New Testament be genuine, as we have already proved it, then it is certain, that the apostles wrought miracles in the very presence of those to whom their writings were addressed ; nay more, they likewise conferred those miraculous gifts in some considerable degree on others, even the very persons to whom they wrote ; and they appeal to their consciences with regard to the truth of it. And could there possibly be room for delusion here ? It is exceedingly remarkable to this purpose that Paul makes this appeal to the Corinthians, and to the Galatians, when amongst them there were some persons disaffected to him, who were taking all opportunities to sink his character and destroy his influence. And could they have wished for a better opportunity than such an appeal? An appeal, which, had not the fact it supposed been certain, far from recovering those that were wavering in their esteem, must have been sufficient utterly to disgust his most cordial and steady friends. The same remark may be applied to the advices and reproofs, which the apostle there gives, relating to the use and abuse of their spiritual gifts; which had been most notoriously absurd, and even ridiculous, had not the Christians, to whom he wrote, been really possessed of them. And these gifts were so plainly supernatural, that as it had been often observed, if it be allowed, that miracles can prove a divine revelation, and that the first Epistle to the Corinthians be genuine (of which, by the way, there is at least as pregnant evidences, as that any part of the New Testament is so) then it follows, by a sure and easy consequence, that Christianity is true. Nevertheless, other arguments are not to be forgot in these observations. And therefore, as we have proved, that had the testimony of the apostles been false, it is not to be imagined, that they could have gained credit at all; especially when they had put the proof of their case on such a footing as we are sure they did. We shall now proceed to show,

That it is a certain fact, the apostles did gain early credit, and succeeded in a most wonderful manner; from whence it will follow, that their testimonies were true.

That the apostles did, indeed, gain credit in the world, is evident from what we before offered, in order to prove the early prevalence of Christianity in it, and this may be further confirmed from many passages in the New Testament. And here we insist not so much on express historical testimonies, though some of them are very remarkable; especially that of the brethren at Jerusalem, who speak of vast numbers of believing Jews assembled at the feast of Pentecost, mentioned in chap. ii. of the Acts. But I argue from the epistles written to several churches, which plainly prove that there were congregations of Christians in Rome, Corinth, Ephesus, Colosse, Thessalonica, Philippi, Laodicea, Smyrna, Pergamos, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Crete, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, Bithynia, and many other places; insomuch, that one of the apostles could say, "That Christ had so wrought by him to make the Gentiles obedient not only in word or profession, but in deed too; that from Jerusalem, even round about unto Illyricum, he had fully preached the gospel of Christ:" or, as the word imports, "had accomplished" the purposes of it. And there is a great deal of reason, both from the nature of the thing, and from the testimony of ancient history, to believe, that others of the apostles had considerable success elsewhere. So that St Paul might with reason apply to them and their doctrine, what is originally spoken of the luminaries of heaven and the instruction they communicate, "their sound is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world."

So great was the number of those who were made proselytes to Christianity by the preaching of the apostles. And we have all imaginable reason to believe, that there was none of all those proselytes, but what were fully persuaded of the truth of the testimony they bore; for otherwise no imaginable reason can be given for their entering themselves into such a profession. The apostles had no secular terror to affright their proselytes; no secular rewards to bribe them; no dazzling eloquence to enchant them; on the contrary, all these were in a powerful manner pleading against the apostles; yet their testimony was received: and their new converts were so thoroughly satisfied with the evidence which they gave them of their mission, that they encountered great persecutions, and cheerfully ventured estate, liberty, and life itself, on the truth of the facts they asserted: as plainly appears from the many passages in the Epistles, which none can think the apostles would ever have written, if those first Christians had not been in a persecuted condition.

Nor will it signify any thing to object, that most of these converts were persons of a low rank and ordinary education, who therefore might be more easily imposed upon than others. For, not to mention Sergius Paulus, Dionysius the Areopagite, or domestics of Cæsar's household, (with others of superior station in life) it is sufficient to call to mind, that the apostles did not put their cause on the issue of laboured arguments, in which the populace might quickly have been entangled and lost; but on such plain facts as they might judge of as easily and surely as any others; indeed, on what they themselves saw, and in part too, on what they felt.

Now this might be sufficient to bring the matter to a satisfactory conclusion. It has been shown, that there is no reason to believe, that the apostles, who certainly knew the truth, would have attempted a fraud of this kind—so, if they had attempted it, they could not possibly have succeeded; nevertheless, they did succeed in a very remarkable manner. Whence it plainly follows, that what they testified was true.

Admitting the facts which they testified concerning Christ to be true, then it was reasonable for their cotemporaries, and is reasonable for us, to receive the gospel, which they have transmitted to us, as a divine revelation.

The great things they asserted were, that Jesus was the Christ; and that he was proved to be so, by prophecies accomplished in him, and by miracles wrought by him, and by others in his name. Let us attend to each of these, and we shall find them no contemptible arguments; but must be forced to acknowledge, that these premises being established, the conclusion most easily and necessarily follows. And this conclusion, “that Jesus is the Christ,” taken in all its extent, is an abstract of the gospel revelation; and therefore is sometimes put for the whole of it.

The apostles, especially when disputing with the Jews, frequently argued from the prophecies of the Old Testament, in which they say many things were expressly foretold, which were most literally and exactly fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth. Now greatly to the evidence, confirmation, and advantage of Christianity, so it is that these prophecies are to this day extant in the original language; and this in the hands of a people most implacably averse to the gospel. So that an attentive reader may still in a great measure satisfy himself as to the validity of the arguments drawn from them.

On searching these ancient and important records, we find not only in general, that it appeared the wisdom of God to raise up for his people an illustrious deliverer, who, among other glorions titles, is sometimes called the Messiah, or the Anointed One; but we are more particularly told, that this great event should happen before the government ceased in the tribe of Judah, while the second temple was standing; and a little before its destruction, about four hundred and ninety years after a command given to rebuild Jerusalem; which was probably issued out in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, or at least within a few years before or after it. It is predicted that he should be of the seed of Abraham, born of a virgin, of the house of David, in the town of Bethlehem; that he should be anointed with an extraordinary effusion of the divine Spirit; in virtue of which he should not only be a perfect and illustrious example of universal holiness and goodness, but should also perform many extraordinary and beneficial miracles. Nevertheless, that for want of external pomp and splen-dour, he should be rejected and insulted by the Jews, and afterwards be cut off and slain by them. It is added, that he should rise from the dead, before his body should be corrupted in the grave, and should be received up to heaven, and there seated at the right hand of God, from whence he should, in a wonderful manner, pour out his Spirit on his followers; in consequence of which, though the body of the Jewish people perished in their obstinate opposition to him, yet the Gentiles should be brought to the knowledge of the true God, and a kingdom established amongst them, which from small beginnings should spread itself to the end of the earth, and continue to the remotest ages.

Besides these most material circumstances, there were several others relating to him, which were either expressly foretold or at least hinted at; all which, with those already mentioned, had so evident an accomplishment in Jesus, that we have no reason to wonder that they should receive the word with all readiness who searched the scriptures daily, whether these things were so predicted there, as the apostles affirmed. For we are persuaded that no wise and religious person could imagine, that God would permit an impostor to arise, in whom so great a variety of predictions, delivered by so many different persons, and in so many distant ages, should have an exact accomplishment.

When the apostles were preaching to heathens, it is indeed true, that they might wave the argument from prophecy, because they were not capable judges of it. But when they insist on another, which might as soon captivate their belief, and as justly vindicate; we mean "the miracles performed by Christ, and those commissioned and influenced by him;" many of these were of such a nature, as not to admit of any artifice or deceit; especially that most signal one of his resurrection from the dead, which may be called a miracle performed by, as well as upon, Christ; because he so expressly declares, that he had himself a power to resume his life at pleasure. The apostles well knew, that this was a fact of such a nature, that those who believed this, would never doubt of the rest. They often therefore single this out, and lay the whole stress of their cause upon it. This they proved to be true by their own testimony miraculously confirmed: and in proving this, they established Christianity on an impregnable rock. For we may safely refer it to any judge, whether it is an imaginable thing that God should raise the dead body of an impostor, especially when he had solemnly appealed to such a resurrection, as a grand proof of his mission, and had expressly fixed the very day on which it was to happen.

From these undeniable observations it is evident, that those who on the apostles' testimony believed that the prophecies of the Old Testament were accomplished in Jesus, and that God bore witness to him by miracles, and raised him from the dead, had abundant reason to believe that the doctrine which Christ taught was divine, and his gospel a revelation from heaven. And if they had reason to admit this conclusion, then it is plain that we who have such satisfactory evidences on the one hand, that the testimony of the apostles was credible, and on the other, that this was the substance of it, have reason also to admit this grand inference from it, and embrace the gospel as a faithful saying, and well worthy of acceptance. This is the thing we have attempted to prove; and here we should finish the argument, were it not for the confirmation it may receive from some additional considerations, which could not properly be introduced, under any of the preceding heads.

We therefore add, in the last place, That the truth of the gospel has received farther and very considerable confirmation, from what has happened in the world since it was first published.

And here we must desire the reader to consider, on the one hand, what has been done to establish it, and on the other, the methods which its enemies have been taking to destroy it.

1. Consider what God has been doing to confirm the gospel, since its first publication; and we will venture to assert, that it will prove a farther evidence of its divine original.

We might here argue at large from its surprising propagation in the world; from the miraculous powers with which not only the apostles, but succeeding preachers of the gospel, and other converts, were endowed; from the accomplishment of the prophecies recorded in the Old Testament; and from the preservation of the Jews, as a distinct people, notwithstanding the various difficulties and persecutions through which they have passed.

It might be particularly urged in confirmation of the truth of Christianity, the wonderful success with which it has been attended, and the surprising propagation of the gospel in the world.

We have endeavoured, under a former head, to show, that the gospel met with so favourable a reception in the world, as evidently proved, that its first publishers were capable of producing sufficient evidence of its truth; evidence absolutely incompatible with imposture. But we shall now carry this remark farther, and assert that, considering the circumstances of the case, it is amazing, that even truth itself, under so many disadvantages, should have so illustrious a triumph; and that its wonderful success so evidently proves such an extraordinary interposition of the Almighty in its favour, as may justly be called a miraculous attestation of it.

There was not only "one of a family, or two of a city, taken and brought to Zion: but the Lord so hastened it in its appointed time, that a little one became a thousand, and a small one a strong nation." And as the apostles themselves were honoured with very remarkable success, so this divine seed was propagated so fast in the next age, that Pliny testifies, "He found the heathen temples in Achaia almost deserted;" and Tertullian afterwards boasts, "That all places, except those temples, were filled with Christians; so that were they only to withdraw, cities and provinces would be depopulated." Nor did the gospel only triumph thus within the boundaries of the Roman empire; for long before Tertullian was born, Justin Martyr, in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, which seems to have been written not much above a hundred years after Christ's death, declares, "That there was no nation of men, whether Greeks or Barbarians, not excepting those savages that wandered in clans from one region to another, and had no fixed habitation, who had not learned to offer prayers and thanksgivings to the Father and Maker of all in the name of Jesus, who was crucified."

Now how is it possible to account for such circumstances as these, but by saying the hand of the Lord was with the first preachers of the gospel, and therefore such multitudes believed, and turned to the Lord? How was it possible for so small a fountain to have swelled immediately into a mighty river, and even have so extensively spread itself on the face of the earth, if it had not sprung from the sanctuary of God, and been rendered triumphant by his Almighty arm.

Had this new religion, so directly contrary to all the prejudices of education, been formed to soothe men's vices, to countenance their errors, to defend their superstitions, or to promote their secular interest, we might easily have accounted for its prevalence in the world. Had its preachers been profound philosophers, or polite and fashionable orators, many might have been charmed, at least for a while, to follow them: or had the princes and potentates of the earth declared themselves its patrons, and armed their legions for its defence and propagation, multitudes might have been terrified into the profession though not a soul could by such means have been rationally persuaded to the use of it. But without some such advantages as these we can hardly conceive, how any new religion should so strangely prevail; even though it had crept into the world in its darkest ages, and the most barbarous countries; and though it had been gradually proposed in the most artful manner, with the finest veil industriously drawn over every part which might at first have given disgust to the beholder.

But every one knows that the very reverse of all this was the cause of Christianity. It is abundantly evident, from the apparent constitution of the religion of Jesus, that the lusts and errors, the superstitions and interests of carnal men, would immediately rise up against it as a most irreconcilable enemy. It is known that the learning and wit of the Greeks and Romans were early employed to ridicule and obstruct its progress. It is known that as all the herd of heathen deities were to be discarded, the priests, who subsisted by the superstitious worship paid them, must in interest find themselves obliged to oppose it. It is known that the princes of the earth drew the sword against it, and armed torments and death for the destruction of its followers. And yet it triumphed over all, though published in ages and places celebrated for learning and elegance; and proposed not in an ornamental and artificial manner, but with the utmost plainness; the doctrines of the cross being always advanced as its grand foundation, though so notorious a stumbling-block both to Jews and Gentiles: and the absolute necessity, not only of embracing Christianity, but also of renouncing all idol worship, being insisted on immediately and in the strongest terms, and which must have made the religion of the gospel appear to them the most singular that had ever been taught in the world.

Had one of the wits or politicians of the present age seen the apostles, and a few other plain men, who had been educated among the lowest of the people, as most of the first teachers of Christianity were, going out armed with nothing but faith, truth, and goodness, to encounter the power of princes, the bigotry of priests, the learning of philosophers, the rage of the populace, and the prejudices of all; how would he have derided the attempt, and said with Sanballat, "What will these feeble Jews do?" But had he seen the event, surely he must have owned with the Egyptian Magi, in a far less illustrious miracle, that it was the finger of God; and might justly have fallen on his face, even among those whom he had insulted, with an humble acknowledgment "that God was with them of a truth."

We must not forget to mention the accomplishment of several prophecies, recorded in the New Testament, as a further confirmation given by God to the gospel.

The most eminent and signal instance under this head, is that of our Lord's prediction concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, as recorded by St Matthew, in his twenty-fourth chapter. The tragical history of it is most circumstantially described by Josephus, the historian, who was an eye-witness of it; and the description which he has given of this sad calamity, so exactly corresponds with the prophecy, that one would have thought, had we not known the contrary, that it had been written by a Christian, on purpose to illustrate it. And one can never enough admire that series of amazing providence, by which the author was preserved from most imminent danger, that he might leave us that invaluable treasure which his writings contain.

We have no need of further evidence than we find in Josephus, of the exact accomplishment of what was prophesied concerning the destruction of Jerusalem. But our Lord had also foretold the long continued desolation of the temple. And we cannot forbear mentioning the awful sanction which was given to that part of the prediction. For it is well known, that a heathen historian has assured us, that when Julian the apostate, in deliberate contempt of that prediction, solemnly and resolutely undertook to rebuild it, his impious design was frustrated, miraculously, again and again; the workmen consumed by globes of fire, which broke out from the foundations.

The prediction of St Paul, concerning the man of sin, and the apostasy of the latter times, is also well worthy of our remark; and though a great part of the book of Revelation be still concealed under a dark veil, yet the division of the Roman empire into ten kingdoms; the usurpation, persecution, and idolatry of the Romish church, and the long duration of the papal power, with several other extraordinary events, which no human prudence could have foreseen, and which have happened long since the publication of that book, are so clearly foretold there, that we cannot but look on that part of the scripture as an invaluable treasure: and it is not at all improbable, that the more visible accomplishment of some of its other prophecies, may be a great means of reviving the Christian cause which is at present so much on the decline.

The preservation of the Jews, as a distinct people, is another particular, under this head, which well deserves our attentive regard.

It is plain that they are very numerous, notwithstanding all the slaughter and destruction of this people, in former and latter ages. They are dispersed among various and most distant nations, and particularly in those parts of the world where Christianity is professed; and though they are exposed to great hatred and contempt, on account of their different faith, and in most places subject to civil incapacities, if not to unchristian severities; they are still most obstinately tenacious of their religion: which is the more wonderful, as their fathers were so prone to apostatize from it; and as most of them seem to be entire strangers to piety or humanity, and pour the greatest contempt on the moral precepts of their own law, while they are so attached to the ceremonial institutions of it, troublesome and inconvenient as they are. Now let us seriously reflect, what an evident hand of Providence is here, that by their dispersion, preservation, and adherence to their religion, it should come to pass, that Christians should daily see the accomplishment of many remarkable prophecies, concerning this people; and that we should always have amongst us such a crowd of unexceptionable witnesses to the truth of these ancient Hebrew records, on which so much of the evidence of the gospel depends: records, which are many of them so full to the purpose for which we allege them, that, as a celebrated writer very well observes, "Had it been represented that the whole body of the Jewish nation had been converted to Christianity, men would certainly have thought the assertion had been forged by Christians; and have looked upon them in the same light with the prophecies of the Sibyls, as made many years after the events which they pretended to foretell."

And to add no more here, the preservation of the Jews, as a distinct people, evidently leaves room for the accomplishment of those Old and New Testament prophecies, which relate to their national conversion and restoration: whereas that would be impossible in itself, or at least impossible to be known, if they were promiscuously blended with other people. On the whole, it is such a scene in the conduct of Providence, as we are well assured, cannot be paralleled in the history of any other nation upon earth: and affords a most obvious and important argument in favour of the gospel.

Thus has Christianity been further confirmed since its publication by what God has done to establish it. It only remains that we consider,

2. What confirmation it receives from the methods which its enemies have taken to destroy it.

And these have generally been, either persecution, or falsehood, or cavilling at some particulars in the revelation, without entering into the grand argument on which it is built, and fairly debating what is offered in its defence. Now, who would not think the better of a cause for being thus attacked?

At first it is known, that the professors, and especially the preachers of the gospel, were severely persecuted. In every city bonds and imprisonment awaited them. As soon as ever the apostles began to preach Jesus and his resurrection, the Jewish rulers laid hold on them; and having confined and scourged them, strictly prohibited their speaking any more in his name. A little while after, Stephen was murdered; and afterwards James and some other of the apostles. Now certainly such a conduct evidently betrayed a consciousness that they were not able to answer the apostles, and to support their own cause by the fair methods of reason and argument, to which, so far as the history informs us, they made no pretence: but attempted to bear them down by dint of authority, and to silence them by brutal force.

It would be needless to attempt showing particularly how these unrighteous methods were pursued in succeeding ages and distant countries. The savage cruelties of Nero to these innocent and holy men were such as raised the pity even of their enemies. Yet this was one of the least extensive and destructive of the ten general persecutions, which arose in the Roman empire, besides several others in the neighbouring countries, of which ecclesiastical history informs us.

These early enemies of the gospel added falsehood and slander to their inhumanities. They endeavoured to murder the reputations of Christians, as well as their persons; and were not ashamed to represent them as haters of the whole human species, for no imaginable reason, but that they would not associate themselves in their idolatrous worship. Nay, they charged them with human sacrifices, incest, idolatry, and all the crimes for which themselves and their false gods were indeed justly detestable; but from which the Christians knew how to vindicate themselves, highly to their own honour, and the everlasting reproach of these malignant and pestilent accusers. And they have not failed to do it in many noble apologies, which through the divine Providence are transmitted to us, and are incomparably the most valuable of any ancient uninspired writings.

Such were the infamous, the scandalous methods, by which the gospel was opposed in the earliest ages of the church; and it must be added, that the measures more lately taken to subvert it, especially among ourselves, seem rather to reflect a glory on it. The unhappy enemies of the gospel of the Son of God have been told again and again, that we put the proof of it on plain facts. They themselves do not, and cannot deny, that it prevailed early in the world, as we have shown at large. There must have been some man or body of men who first introduced it; and even themselves, notwithstanding all their obstinacy and perverseness, generally confess that Christ and his apostles were the persons, which is a manifest acknowledgment of the most forcible argument they can give against their own debased principles.

Now which of these schemes will the unbelievers take? It seems that the deists of the present age fix on neither, as being secretly conscious they cannot support either; but they content themselves with cavilling at some circumstances attending the revelation, without daring to encounter its grand evidence; that is, they have been laboriously attempting to prove it to be improbable, or absurd, to suppose that to have been, which nevertheless plainly appears to have been facts. One of them most weakly and sophistically attempts to prove, in defiance of the common sense of mankind, that the light of nature is a perfect rule, and therefore, that all revelation is needless, and indeed impossible. Another disguises the miracles of Christ by false representations of them, and then treats them as idle tales. A third takes a great deal of fruitless pains to show, that some prophecies, referred to in the New Testament, are capable of another sense, different from that in which the apostles have taken them.

These things have been set in a very artful and fallacious light by persons, whose names will perhaps be transmitted to posterity, with the infamous stigma of having been leaders in the cause of infidelity; but not a man of them undertakes to ascertain the grand fact. Nay, they generally take no more notice of the positive evidences by which it is even demonstrated, than if they had never heard it proposed: though they cavil at incidental passages in those books in which it is most clearly stated. And as for what they have urged, though perhaps some who were before weary of Christianity may have taken occasion to reject it, and others, for want of consulting the answers to them, may have been unwarily ensnared; yet the examination of these points has been greatly for the honour and vindication of the truth, which seems on this occasion to have been set in a clearer and stronger light than ever, at least in these latter ages.

The cause of Christianity has greatly gained by debate, and the gospel comes like fine gold out of the furnace, which the more it is tried, the more it is approved. It must be owned, that the defenders of the gospel have appeared with very different degrees of ability for the work; nor could it be otherwise among such numbers of them, but, on the whole, though the patrons of infidelity have been masters of wit, humour, and address, as well as of a moderate share of learning, and generally much more than a moderate share of assurance; yet so great is the force of truth, that (unless we may except those writers who have unhappily called for the aid of the civil magistrate in the controversy) we cannot recollect to have seen any defence of the gospel, which has not, on the whole, been sufficient to establish it, notwithstanding all the sophistical arguments of its subtle antagonists.

This is an observation that is continually gaining new strength as new assaults are made upon the gospel; and we cannot forbear saying, that, as if it were by a kind of judicial infatuation, some who have distinguished themselves in the wretched cause of infidelity, have been permitted to fall into such gross misrepresentations, such senseless inconsistencies, such palpable falsehoods, and, in a word, into such various and malignant “superfluity of naughtiness,” that to a wise and pious mind, they must appear like those venomous creatures, which are said to carry an antidote in their own objections, particularly a noble lord, who has given up several of the deistical objections, and even acknowledged the divine original of the gospel: for he asserts, “That no religion ever appeared in the world, whose natural tendency was so much directed to promote the peace and happiness of mankind.” He declares, that “No system can be more simple and plain than that of a natural religion as it stands in the gospel.” He avers, that, “he will not say, that the belief that Jesus was the Messiah is the only article of belief necessary to make men Christians. There are other things doubtless contained in the revelation he made of himself, dependent on, and relative to this article, without the belief of which, I suppose our charity would be very defective. But this I say, that the system of religion which Christ published, and his evangelists recorded, is a complete system to all the purposes of religion, natural and revealed. It contains all the duties of the former, it enforces the whole law of faith, by promising rewards and threatening punishments, which he declares he will distribute when he comes to judge the world." The same writer alloweth, that the gospel is in all cases one continued lesson of the strictest morality, of justice, of benevolence, and of universal charity. He professeth a great concern for true charity, in opposition to theology, and says, that "genuine Christianity was taught of God." And not to multiply passages to this purpose, he pronounces, that, "the Christian system of faith and practice was revealed of God himself, and it is absurd and impious to assert, that the divine Being revealed it incompletely and imperfectly. Its simplicity and plainness show, that it was designed to be the religion of mankind, and also manifest the divinity of its original." After reading those quotations, and a great variety of others, which might be produced from his lordship's writings, the reader may easily judge what religion has to fear from this noble writer's arguments, and we will venture to assert, that he has himself entirely confuted his own objections.

Thus have we given the reader a brief view of the chief arguments in proof of Christianity; and the sum of the whole is this—

The gospel is probable in theory; as considering the nature of God, and the circumstances of mankind, there was reason to hope a revelation might be given; and if any were given, we should naturally apprehend its internal evidence would be such as that of the gospel is, and its external such as it is said to be. But it is also true in fact; for Christianity was early professed as it was first introduced by Jesus of Nazareth, whose life and doctrines were published by his immediate attendants; whose books are still preserved in the original language, and in the main are faithfully translated into our own; so that the books of the New Testament now in use may be depended upon as written by the persons whose names they bear; and admitting this, the truth of the gospel follows by a train of very easy consequences; for the authors certainly knew the truth of the facts they related; and considering what appears in the characters and circumstances, we can never believe they would have attempted to deceive us; or if they had, they could not have gained credit in the world; but they did gain it in a very remarkable manner! Therefore the facts they attested were true, and the truth of the gospel evidently follows from the certainty of those facts, and is completely confirmed by what has happened in the world since the publication of it.

This is the sum of what we flatter ourselves we have sufficiently proved; and shall now conclude what we have to say on this subject, with a few words by way of reflection.

1. Let us gratefully acknowledge the Divine goodness, in favouring us with so excellent a revelation, and confirming it to us by such ample evidence.

We should daily adore the God of nature, for lighting up the sun, that glorious, though imperfect image of his own unapproachable lustre; and appointing it to gild the earth with its various rays, to cheer us with its benign influences, and to guide and direct us in our journeys and our labours. But how incomparably more valuable is that "day-spring from on high, which hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, and to guide our feet in the way of peace?" Oh ye Christians, whose eyes are so happy to see, and your ears to hear, what reason have ye for daily and hourly praise! When your minds are delighted with contemplating the riches of gospel grace; when you view with wonder and joy the harmonious system of your redemption; when you feel the burden of your guilt removed, the freedom of your address to the throne of grace encouraged, and see the prospect of a fair inheritance to eternal glory opening upon you; then, in the pleasing transports of your souls, borrow the joyful anthem of the Psalmist, and say, with the humblest gratitude and self-resignation, "God is the Lord, who showeth us light; bind the sacrifice with cords even to the horns of the altar. Adore God, who first commanded the light to shine out of darkness," that by the discoveries of his word and the operations of his Spirit, he hath "shined in your hearts to give you the knowledge of his glory, as reflected from the face of his Son." Let us all adore him, that this revelation hath reached us, who live in an age and country so distant from that in which it first appeared; while there are to this very day, not only dark corners, but regions of the earth, that "are full of the habitations of idolatry and cruelty."

Let us peculiarly address ourselves to those whose education and circumstances of life have given them opportunities of a fuller inquiry into the state of those ancient or modern nations, that have been left merely to the light of unassisted reason, even to those who are acquainted with the history of their gods; the rites of their priests, the tales and even the hymns of their poets; nay, we will add, the reasoning of the sagest philosophers; all the precious, and all the erroneous things they have said where religion and immortality are concerned. It may be imagined, that God gave to some of the most celebrated pagan writers that uncommon share of genius and eloquence, that they might, as it were, by their art, embalm the monsters of antiquity; that so succeeding ages might see, in a more affecting view than we could otherwise have done, how weak the human mind is in its best estate, and the need which the greatest as well as the meanest of mankind have of being taught by a revelation from above. While we are daily conversing with such monuments as these, and are also surveying the evidences of Christianity, in a large and more distinct view than it was possible for us here to suppose them, we are under peculiar obligations to be very thankful for the gospel ourselves, as well as to compassionate the cause of those to whom it has never been offered, or by whom it is slighted. And this leads us to another reflection.

2. What reason have we to pity those who reject this glorious gospel, even when they have opportunities of inquiring into its clearest evidences!

Such undoubtedly we have in our age and nation: and surely we should sometimes bestow a compassionate thought upon them, and lift up humble prayers for them, that God, peradventure, may give them repentance to the acknowledgment of the truth, that they may recover themselves out of the snares of the devil, who are now led captive by him at his pleasure; we should pity heathens and Mahometans under their darkness and errors; but how much more deplorable is the cause of these, who though they dwell in Emmanuel's land, and in the valley of Zion, turn it into the valley of the shadow of death, by closing their eyes against so bright a lustre, and stopping their ears against the voice of the charmer? They are, indeed, in their own conceit, the only wise people, but their wisdom will die with them: so that to be sure, they will scorn our pity. But who can forbear it? Is there a more melancholy thought than this, that the Son of God should have done so much to introduce and establish the gospel, and his Spirit so much to perpetuate and increase its evidence; and that, after all, it should be contemptuously despised, even by creatures who are perishing without it? This is not only done, though we believe most frequently, by men of profligate and abandoned lives; but sometimes by persons who have the appearance of external morality, decency, and humanity, (for such are to be found among them) as well as men of wit and genius, of politeness and learning, of human prudence and experience in worldly affairs. It may also be added, that it is the case of some who were the children of pious parents, who were trained up in religious exercises, who once discovered serious impressions, and gave very encouraging hopes. Alas, whither are they fallen! How shall we shelter those that were once our brethren, that are perhaps still our friends, from the awful sentence which the gospel pronounces against all that reject it, without any exception? As to the wretches that add insult and derision to their infidelity, we tremble to think of that load of guilt which they are bringing upon themselves; and how near their approach to the unpardonable sin, if they have not already committed it. For the rest, who behave in a modest and sober manner, it will, no doubt, be a very difficult task to convince them; and so much the rather, as some of them, by too easy a transition, have renounced many of the most important principles of natural religion: nay, it might be added, even the whole of it, together with the Christian revelation. But the influences of Divine grace are almighty. Let us recommend them to it, and omit no other proper method, either of recovering such as are already seduced, or at least of securing those who are not yet infected; but may be, as most of the youth are, especially in the most populous places, in imminent danger of the contagion. To this end let us add,

3. How reasonable it is that Christians should form a familiar acquaintance with the great evidences of our common faith.

It is what we so apparently owe to the honour of God, to the interest of Christ, to the peace of our own souls, and the edification of others, that we hope we need not urge it at large, especially considering what has been said before. In consequence of all, let it be your care to make evidences of Christianity the subject of your serious reflection and frequent converse. Especially study your Bibles, where such marks of truth and divinity are to be found, that we hope few who have familiarly known them, and have had a relish for them, were ever brought to make shipwreck of their faith as it is in Jesus. Above all, let it be your care to act on the rules which are here laid down: and then you will find your faith growing in a happy proportion, and experience the truth of our Saviour's declaration, that if any man will resolutely and faithfully do his will, he shall know of the Christian doctrine, whether it be of God. We verily believe, that it is the purity of its precepts which lies at the bottom of most men's opposition to it; or a natural pride of heart, which gives them an aversion to it: or a fond affectation of seeming wiser than others, in rejecting what most of their neighbours do, and profess to believe. When these unhappy prejudices and conceptions are, by Divine grace, conquered and rooted out, the evidence of truth will daily appear with increasing lustre: as the light of the sun does to an eye recovering from a film with which it hath been overgrown; and which before had veiled it with midnight in the midst of noon.

4. How solicitous should we be to embrace and obey that gospel, which comes attended with such abundant evidences!

We may undoubtedly address ourselves to most of our readers, and say, as Paul did to king Agrippa: "Believest thou the prophets? I know thou believest:" yet let me entreat and charge you not to rest here; but attentively to examine how far your hearts are affected, and your lives regulated by such a belief. The Christian revelation is a practical thing; and is heard, believed, and professed in vain, if it be not obeyed.

In this gospel "the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all the ungodliness of men:" but it is revealed with redoubled fury against that audacious sinner, "who holds the truth in unrighteousness." In this gospel the blessed Jesus is exalted as a Prince and Saviour; and it is not with impunity, that the impenitent rebel can reject his yoke, and trample on his blood. What must they expect, who have poured contempt on such a Sovereign, and on such a Redeemer?

Let it be earnestly and frequently recollected, that this gospel is the touchstone by which we are one day to be tried; the balance in which an impartial Judge will weigh us: and must, on the whole, prove our everlasting triumph, or our everlasting torment. The Almighty did not introduce it with such solemn notice, such high expectation, such pompous miracles, such awful sanctions, that men might reject, or dishonour it at pleasure; but it will certainly be found, to the greatest and meanest of those that hear it, "a savour of life unto life, or a savour of death unto death."

Let it therefore be your immediate care to inquire, which of these it is likely to prove to your souls; remember it is so far from being a vain thing, that it is really your very life. If it has been hitherto despised, and that blessed Redeemer, in whom it so evidently centres, has been neglected, assure yourselves, that all we have said in confirmation of its truth proves only that the hand-writing of God is set to your condemnation. Allow yourselves therefore not a moment's rest, till you have with humble submission applied to his throne, while there is yet hope that it may be reversed.

And for you who have hitherto believed and obeyed the gospel, let it be your care to defend and adorn it; "be blameless and harmless, the children of God without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, shining among them as lights in the world:" perhaps your example may not only serve to entertain their eyes, but "to guide their feet into the way of peace," and engage them also to join with you in "glorifying your Father which is in heaven:" above all, be careful to hold fast the form of sound words, and to adorn the doctrine of your blessed Saviour in all things.

INTRODUCTORY DISSERTATION.

PART II.

HAVING taken a rapid survey of the Evidences of Christianity in the previous Part of this Dissertation, we pass now to a consideration of a special department of the argument which has not yet been considered in this Dissertation. We refer to the practical effects of Christianity both upon nations and individuals. To this part of our inquiry it is perhaps all the more important that we should direct the attention of our readers, as being that portion of the Evidences which stands palpably out before the eyes of all mankind. An abstract argument, stated however clearly, reaches conviction to the minds of those only who are capable of comprehending its meaning; but an argument drawn from the outward and obvious effects of a system all can feel the force of, because all can understand its true nature and bearings. Hence our blessed Lord himself, when he was pointing out the utter hollowness of false pretensions to revelation, laid down the following criterion by which true prophets might be readily and most effectually distinguished from the false: "By their fruits ye shall know them. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit, but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit." This test is one which all men admit to be at once easy and effectual. In judging of a tree we may be deceived by the appearance of its bark and its leaves and its branches and its blossoms, but it is by the fruit that we may really discover the quality of the tree. In proof of the accuracy of the test which Jesus proposes, He appeals to the common experience of men. We expect the fruit invariably to correspond with the nature of the tree. "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" And our Lord assures us that, in this instance, the experience of men is founded on a sound principle. "For every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit." The fruit of the tree is its natural produce; and Christianity, if it exist in the soul, will influence the life. Religion is a living operative principle. Wherever it is found the heart has been changed, a new creation has sprung up in the soul; "instead of the thorn has come up the fir-tree, and instead of the briar has come up the myrtle-tree, and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off." In such a case the fruit shall assuredly be unto holiness, and the end shall be everlasting life.

Nor is the test which the Redeemer proposes, applicable only to individuals; it is equally applicable to communities. The beneficial influence of Christianity upon a country will make itself manifest in the advanced civilization, good morals, and social prosperity of the people. If such be the condition of a population who have embraced the Christian faith, we cannot fail to perceive in this moral and social transformation a strong argument in favour of our holy religion as having its origin from above. It has been well remarked—"Whenever you have ascertained the true results of any system of doctrine, you have found a plain and certain expression of its intrinsic character. It is good in proportion as the fruit is good. If its fruit be godly, it must itself be of God."

The proposition then which we lay down is that Christianity may be known by its fruits to be a divine revelation, a religion which has come from God.

Let us, in the first instance, test the Christian system by the character of that influence which it exerts upon communities. The religion of the ancient Greeks and Romans was a splendid system of fable and romance. It has been recommended to the study of the learned with all the attractions of eloquence and the charm of verse; but if we would know the actual state of the people upon whom this much-vaunted religion was inculcated, we have only to turn to the melancholy description which Paul gives of the actual state of the heathen world in his own time—"filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant-breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful." Could that religion be the work of God which resulted in a morality so polluted and impure? Even at their very altars the Greeks and Romans might learn the lessons of the foulest vice. If the gods who were adored taught and authorized immorality by their own example, the errors of inferior beings would naturally be excused and even vindicated by an appeal to the corrupt wanderings of superior natures; and heaven itself was thus made to lend a ready and infallible sanction to the weaknesses and even the guilt of men. But the gods of ancient heathenism not merely taught crime by example; they produced and promoted it by their influence. We find them perpetually interfering to kindle the evil passions and prompt the evil designs of men. No wonder that with such noxious influences brought to bear upon a people in many respects the most refined and civilized upon the earth, one of their own authors should describe the character of the youth of Rome in the time of Cicero, in such language as the following: "Luxury, avarice, and pride, enslaved them; they wantoned in rapine and prodigality; undervalued their own and coveted what belonged to others; trampled on modesty, friendship and continence; confounded things divine and human, and threw off all manner of consideration and restraint." If such was the character of the most cultivated people of the ancient world under the practical operation of heathenism, how much darker and more revolting would have been the picture had we described the actual condition in point of morality of other pagan nations! No doubt, even amid the darkness of Paganism, we may find rare exceptions of men, such as Socrates, who taught, and of others, such as Cato, who practised precepts of pure morality. These, however, were not the fruits of the religious system which prevailed in the country and age in which they lived, but single, solitary instances of men here and there, who had framed for themselves a system of faith and morals widely different from that which reigned around them. Neither these men nor any other ever taught sound morality or lived a virtuous life under the influence of a false religion.

From ancient we turn to modern systems of religion. The Persians and Mahomedans, it must be admitted, have made some advances in moral teaching and conduct beyond those of purely Pagan countries. Zoroaster abolished idolatry among the ancient Persians, and so also did Mohammed in more modern days. But while the Persian religion for centuries held an undisturbed sway over multitudes of people, it failed to make men virtuous, pure, and holy. The prophet of Arabia taught the knowledge of the one God, and inculcated lessons of justice and charity. Alms-giving was set forth as one of the highest of duties, and from a tenth to a fifth of a Mussulman's income was demanded by the Koran to be paid in charity. Prayer five times a-day, ablutions numberless, and fastings the most rigid, were enjoined upon all believers. But the same religion which contained these precepts laid it down as a truth of undoubted certainty to be proclaimed to the people, that the blood of their enemies was a sure passport to the Mohammedan paradise; and that every Mussulman, however wicked, would be admitted into heaven after expiating his sins in purgatory for a period not exceeding five thousand years. "The sword," such is the language of the prophet of Mecca, "is the key of heaven and hell; a drop of blood shed in the cause of God, a night spent in arms, is of more avail than two months spent in fasting and prayer. Whoso falleth in battle, his sins are forgiven at the day of judgment, his wounds shall be resplendent as vermillion and odoriferous as musk, and the loss of his limb shall be supplied by wings of angels and cherubims. They who have suffered for my sake and been slain in battle I will surely bring them into a garden watered by rivers." Under the pretence of compelling the heathen to embrace his faith, the follower of Mohammed was enjoined to proceed in his onward course from the plunder of caravans and the extermination of tribes and villages to the overthrow and devastation of states and empires. Thus were the most unholy passions nourished, and a people taught by the preaching of an ambitious schemer to find in the very piety and devotion of their faith the justification and the encouragement of all the crimes of intolerant barbarity.

Equally powerless in the production of a sound public morality has been the Brahminical religion. Wise and salutary doubtless are many of the precepts inculcated by Hindu moralists. But however good in themselves, these precepts are scattered through the pages of a vast variety of volumes difficult of access and of doubtful authority. Sometimes they are said to have issued directly from the lips of the gods, sometimes to have been promulgated by the inspired favourites of heaven or compiled from the records of ancient tradition. And yet while such is alleged to be their origin, these excellent moral truths are perpetually blended and mixed up with the wildest and most absurd doctrines. Thus while charity is declared in the moral code of the Brahmins to be the most essential of all duties, it is pronounced in the same breath to be a far higher and holier virtue to retire from the world and embrace the life of an ascetic in the deserts. The man is said to be wise who goes forth among his fellows to protect and to bless them, but he is declared to be wiser still who abandons finally and for ever the companionship of men and takes up his abode with the beasts of the field. The former is worthy to be praised, but the latter has acquired perfection in this world and secured perfection in the next. According to the moral system of Hinduism the distinctions of right and wrong are utterly confounded. That which is deeply criminal in a man of a lower caste is a light and venial trespass in a man of a higher. The worst and most unpardonable crime in a despised Sudra becomes expiable in a Brahmin by the payment of a trifling fine. The Pariah who simply breathes upon his superior is declared worthy of death by the same code which enforces compassion and tenderness to the crawling worm; and while the protection of the irrational animal is enforced under the heaviest penalties, the aged parent is permitted to be abandoned on the river's bank by an unnatural son, and to be left to perish unpitied and alone amid the retiring waters. The influence and effects of such a religious system cannot fail to be pernicious in the highest degree. "Acts," says Dr. Duff, "which in a Christian land would be treated as wilful murder,—far from being regarded as dishonourable or criminal or deserving of public execration—are reputed holy and meritorious, and demonstrative of the greatest possible affection and kindness." Such is the stupifying power of a baleful superstition. Cruelty and obscenity are transformed into devotional virtues. The gravest votary is not ashamed to witness the wantonness which dances round his altars; and the Gentoo, while he treads cautiously on the earth lest he should crush a reptile, and diffuses his charities as his priest requires, and performs his task of oblation and prayer with pious scrupulosity, is found to delight in the sacrifice of the funeral pile and to mingle in the mercenary impurities which are encouraged for priestly gain in the pagodas of his idols.

How complete the contrast, in point of pure morality and beneficial influence upon the minds, the character, and conduct of men, between the religion of Christ and all the other systems of religion which have existed upon the earth! Let us descend to particulars, and the contrast will become more strikingly apparent."

One of the most important and thoroughly practical principles of all religion is that which refers to the Being and Attributes of God. On this point the false religions we have alluded to are at utter variance with one another. According to one system God is a Being wrapped up in eternal contemplation and repose; according to another, an ethereal flame pervading and animating the universe; according to a third, a Being composed of parts perpetually emanating from his person, and destined finally to return to it. Such views of Deity are little more than metaphysical speculations, having not the remotest bearing upon the conduct of mankind. But the God of Christianity and the Bible, while He is a spirit far removed from the weaknesses and imperfections of His creatures, is the Father of Spirits who keeps mercy for thousands of them that love Him, who compassionates and embraces the returning sinner, who makes the sun to rise upon the just and the unjust, and who wills not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wicked ways and live. By such views of God our affections are awakened; our trust and fortitude confirmed; a light is kindled which warms and animates the soul; and a confiding faith is implanted in the heart which fills us with a peace that passeth all understanding, and a joy that is unspeakable and full of glory. The Christian's God is great and glorious, but He is also merciful and kind; holy, and yet loving; a just God, and yet a Saviour; just, and yet the justifier of the ungodly who believe in Jesus. In the contemplation of such a Deity as this, hope and joy are blended in the soul of the worshipper with sacred reverence and salutary fear. We tremble even while we trust, and the confidence that reposes in the divine mercy and love is tempered by a dread of the divine majesty and holiness which leads us to "stand in awe and sin not." The god of other systems of religion is degraded into a being of contemptible weakness and inconsistency. Often was the Zeus of the Greek mythology seen to descend from the heights of Olympus and to exhibit all the imperfections and foibles and even sins of "one like unto ourselves;" habitually does the god of the Mussulman blend maxims of high, practical wisdom with the deliberate and solemn sanction of lust and impurity; and ever and anon may the god of the Hindu be found assuming the most grotesque and ludicrous shapes, fitted, instead of awing, to amuse the worshipper. But in the God of Christianity all is sublime consistency and harmony in the perfections of his nature. No feebleness limits his power, no prejudice controls his will, no error impairs his designs, and in his dealings with his sinful creatures who have thrown themselves upon his compassion as manifested through Christ, "mercy and truth meet together, righteousness and peace embrace each other." In regard then to this first and fundamental point of all religion, the being and attributes of God, Christianity stands out in bold relief from the numberless religious systems which are, or ever have been, known among men, as the only one that reveals the Divine Being in His own perfections and in His relationship to man, so as to correspond with our highest conceptions, and to exert the holiest influence upon our minds and hearts in all circumstances and in all situations.

Another fundamental truth of all religion respects the Providence of God, and in this point also Christianity sets forth such views as clearly show it to be divine. Here, the false religions of men completely differ among themselves. One system represents God as exercising no superintendence over the creatures of His hand, sitting separate and apart in sullen majesty, and leaving all events to the capricious and fitful movements of blind, uncertain chance; another tells us of a principle of evil dividing the government of the world with a principle of good, both conflicting for a superiority denied to either; another still informs us of demons and genii interposing with fantastic levity or resistless power in the affairs of men. But Christianity makes the sublime annunciation of a Providence which carefully superintends and actively regulates all and every event which happens throughout the wide domains of universal nature, embracing alike in His all-comprehending care the loftiest archangel that stands before the throne in heaven, and the meanest insect that crawls upon the surface of the earth. There is nothing so great as to resist His power, nothing so minute as to escape His notice. He numbers the very hairs of our heads; He appoints the bounds of our habitation.

Not a sparrow falls to the ground without His knowledge and express permission.

And in addition to this common providence which God exercises over all His creatures, Christianity tells us further of a special providence which is the covenant privilege of true believers. God is in heaven infinitely exalted above all the works of his hands, enwrapped in the contemplation of his own ineffable glory; but to the true Christian he is more than all this—He is a Father in heaven. He looks down with approbation from the throne of his glory upon each one of that blessed people whom He hath chosen for himself. He knows their condition with the utmost minuteness. He pities their weakness, their helplessness, their poverty. He supplies all their wants both temporal and spiritual. He hath given them a sufficient pledge that He will withhold no good thing from them that love him. "If God spared not his own Son, but freely gave Him up unto the death for us all, will He not with Him also, freely give us all things?" Thus Christianity unfolds to us a scheme of Providence the most consolatory and improving, for it assures us that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to them that are the called according to his purpose."

The consideration of the providence of God suggests an additional topic which may well form a test by which to try the divinity of a religion—whether it is fitted to comfort the heart amid the numberless trials of this valley of tears. In this respect also Christianity may be plainly discerned to be of God, for it alone, of all the religions that ever existed, imparts true comfort to the afflicted soul. We have already seen that in the system of Providence which it unfolds, the particular is not lost in the universal; and the government which watches over and preserves all, equally watches over and preserves each. But in the arrangements of the Almighty Governor a wise discrimination is maintained; for while to the wicked He increaseth sorrow, "He giveth to the man that is good in his sight wisdom and knowledge and joy." One system of religion speaks to the afflicted, only of the ever-varying empire of time and chance which happen alike to all; another tells him that he is under the stern dominion of unbending fate; and another reminds him that there are conflicting deities who send down prosperity or adversity, affliction or joy, happiness or misery, with a blind partiality and fitful caprice which baffles all calculation. The Christian, however, knows well that, according to the consolatory teachings of his religion, no event happens by chance, affliction springs not from the ground, all things are working together for his good, all the apparent discordances or real calamities which mingle in his life will be found ultimately to have been sent for the wisest and the best of purposes, to promote his spiritual progress on earth, and prepare him for that brighter and better world where all is happiness and peace and joy. These considerations, so well fitted to comfort the troubled spirit, are recommended to us not only by precept but by actual example. Jesus himself, though He was a Son, yet learned obedience through suffering, and accordingly all the followers of Jesus are subjected to the same fatherly discipline. "What son is he whom the Father chasteneth not?" This is the law of the family. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." The religion which opens up such inexhaustible sources of comfort as these must necessarily have come from the God of grace and of all consolation.

A system of religion which asserts a valid claim to be Divine must inculcate the observance of a pure spiritual devotion. This naturally and obviously arises out of the nature of the Being whom we adore. If God be a spirit, He cannot but require those that worship him to worship him in spirit and in truth. This condition of a divine religion Christianity fully meets. Under other religions the Deity is to be propitiated by forms which have little to do with the frame and temper of the mind. But the religion of Christ requires not a mere outward but an inward devotion. Thus its author himself enjoins in reference to true acceptable prayer: "And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are: for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." The hypocrite and the formalist love to perform their religious duties in the most public places and in the most open manner, because they have no higher aim than to be seen of men. When the true Christian prays he stands afar off, as it were, from men—his eyes are towards heaven. And how is his heart engaged in that interesting moment? He feels his entire, his absolute dependence upon God; his desires are towards Him; his highest delight is in his presence, he is pouring out his heart before Him. The hypocrite desires the presence of man, that he may exhibit before him the apparent fervency of his devotions, but the Christian loves to be alone with his God. Prayer is felt by the true believer to be at once a duty, a privilege, a pleasure, and a benefit; not because it is a form but a blessed reality, a true communing of the heart with God. Five times a-day does the Koran enjoin the Mussulman to say his prayers; the Bible however enjoins the Christian to "pray always with all prayer and supplication," but then it must be "in the Spirit." It is this which is the substance of prayer. "My son, give me thine heart," is the command of God to each one of his people; and the religion which holds forth this truth with such prominence and persevering earnestness must have had its origin from Him who is emphatically "the Searcher of hearts."

In treating of the influence of a religion upon a people, it is impossible to overlook its external rites and ceremonies. If these be idle and vain, burdensome and unedifying, the religions creed, however valuable and accurate, will fail in producing a beneficial moral effect upon the people. By this test also Christianity may be safely tried. Not merely may its moral precepts and religious doctrines be submitted to such a scrutiny, but the rites and institutions of the gospel in their reference to the nature and happiness of man. Being essentially spiritual in its character, it seems to attach comparatively little importance to outward rites of any kind. In this respect a remarkable difference may be observed between the style of the Old and that of the New Testament; and not only is this difference apparent in the style of the Jewish writings, but also in the whole spirit of the Jewish economy as compared with the Christian. The whole Jewish ritual being designed as strictly symbolical, was addressed to the senses in the first instance, and conveyed instruction to the Jews, only through a sensible medium. And this adaptation of the truth to our physical nature, which is apparent in the Old, is no less apparent in the New Testament, in the institution of the standing ordinances of the church. In the sacramental symbols an impressive exhibition is made to our bodily senses of some of the most important and interesting truths of the Christian system, and not only are these truths significantly represented, they are also impressively sealed upon the believing children of God. In other words, by the sensible display given in the solemn ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper, ample provision is made for the emblematic exhibition of the truths as well as of the actings of God in reference to his people. The sacramental ordinances therefore of the Christian church may be conceived as holding a place somewhat analagous to that of the typical institutions in the Jewish church, with this important exception, however, that while the symbolical rites of the ancient economy related to events which could only be beheld by the eye of faith penetrating the dark vista of futurity, the emblematic ordinances of the church, under the gospel dispensation, refer to events which are already stamped with the impress of historical certainty, and the bearing of which upon individual believers can on that account be more readily comprehended and felt. In reference to the wisdom and utility of the ordinance of baptism, it is interesting to notice the ultroneous admission of the infidel Bolingbroke. "No institution," he says, "can be imagined more simple or more void of all those pompous rites and theatrical representations which abound in the religious worship of the heathen, than that of baptism in its origin. It is not only an innocent but a profitable ceremony, because it is extremely proper to keep up the spirit of true natural religion by keeping up that of Christianity, and to promote the observance of moral duties by marking a respect for the revelation that confirmed them." Such remarks are peculiarly important as having come from the pen of an avowed unbeliever of revealed religion; and if they are justly applicable to the simple and impressive ordinance of baptism, they are equally, if not still more, applicable to the Lord's supper. That beautiful and instructive ordinance is admirably calculated, in its very nature, to elevate and purify the mind. Under the simple emblems of bread and wine, bread broken and wine poured out, truths the most sublime and affecting are set before the mind and brought home to the heart. Not to speak of engaging in the ordinance, it is scarcely possible even to witness its celebration without feeling that it stamps divinity upon the religion which claims it as one of its leading institutions.

Two other standing ordinances of Christianity might be noticed under a similar aspect—the ordinance of the Sabbath and that of the ministry of the church. Both these institutions exert a most improving effect upon the community among whom they are recognised. Look at the holy, humanizing influence of the Sabbath and the sanctuary upon the unlettered peasantry of a country village. All labour and worldly care has given way to the peaceful and solemn repose of the day of holy rest. Nature herself seems to sympathize with the stillness which pervades the homes of the simple villagers. The morning is ushered in with the delightful exercise of family worship, in which, having offered up their hymn of praise, and read together a portion from the sacred page, the whole assembled household kneel in earnest prayer to the Lord of the Sabbath. With hearts thus solemnized and elevated, the humble pious group go up to the house of God. The public exercises of the day are in beautiful harmony with the private devotions of the morning. The pastor, however, has not merely read but expounded the word, and urged its precious lessons upon the consciences and hearts of the people. The living, the life-giving influence of the truth is felt, and the audience retire to their homes not only to ponder and pray over the instructions they have heard, but to exhibit the hallowed effects of the Sabbath and its sacred employments, in their ordinary walk and conversation among men. No religion of man's invention has ever set forth external institutions so simple, yet so efficacious in their operation upon the character and conduct of those who observe them. Here then we possess another evidence of the peculiar excellence of the Christian system.

Hitherto we have been comparing or rather contrasting Christianity with other religions, so as to prove by its obvious superiority to them, in points which are common to both, that it, and it alone, is divine in its origin. But an additional and perhaps more powerful argument in favour of Christianity may be drawn from what may be considered as its peculiarities.

That there are peculiarities in the Christian religion sufficient to mark it out as separate and distinct from all the other modes of religion that either are or have been prevalent in the world, no candid inquirer can fail to perceive. And the first point of this kind to which we refer, is the clear revelation of a future state beyond death and the grave. That the reason of man hath never arrived at any, even the remotest, conception of a life to come, we are far from affirming. Frequent allusions to such a state of existence are found in the most approved authors of antiquity, but withal so obscure and indistinct as scarcely to convey to the mind of the reader the impression, that by any individual in these remote ages the doctrine was steadily and undoubtingly believed. Even Socrates, though a martyr to the comparative purity of his doctrines, and held forth by Bishop Warburton, in his 'Divine Legation of Moses Demonstrated,' as of all the ancient philosophers the only believer in a future state, must needs in his last moments, when his view of immortality might have been expected to have been stronger than ever, remind his friend that he owed a cock to Æsculapius; and Cicero himself, with all his high notions of moral truth, could reach no farther in his belief of a future state than "the ardent longing after immortality."—Si erro, libenter erro! It would be as improper as it is unnecessary to deny the existence of vague conceptions among the ancients in reference to this important doctrine; it is sufficient to establish the doctrine, however, as a peculiar tenet of the Christian system, if it can be shown that never before was it proposed to man as a matter of general and well-grounded practical belief. And yet it has been alleged, in opposition to any argument of this kind, that the Jews under the law were entirely unacquainted with this all-important doctrine. That obscure intimations of a future state may be afforded even by unassisted reason is sufficiently obvious, we think, from the fact, that it has been in all ages a matter of speculation and anxious discussion; and if so, can we believe that a system of policy so complete as that of the Mosaic economy, would have contained not the remotest allusion to a matter of paramount interest to the whole human family? This, it may be said, is the language which has been currently adopted by the sceptic and the infidel when objecting to the Divine authority of the Jewish laws; and yet it is language to which we cannot refuse our entire concurrence. With all deference to Bishop Warburton, we would be far from thinking it necessary to change our position, and endeavour to show his omission of the doctrine of a future state to have been any proof that Moses was divinely inspired. It is giving no undue advantage to the adversaries of our holy faith should we admit the doctrine to be set forth in the law, not prominently and directly, but by implication. This is precisely the mode in which a priori we should have expected the revelation of a future state to have been made to the Jews. It must never be forgotten, that, never since the fall of man could the motives of human actions, founded on eternal rewards and punishments, have been fairly urged without a clear and explicit proclamation of all the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel which are necessarily connected with it; and as it did not seem consistent with the purposes of God in the ancient economy to give such a clear and simple and spiritual revelation of his will as was afterwards given, was it not more in accordance with the partial obscurity which pervaded the other parts of the Jewish system that "life and immortality" should be covered with a veil of mystery and darkness? Should the infidel press his objection from the difficulty of finding in the law any allusion to a future state, we would remind him that it is equally difficult to discover in the law any of those peculiar doctrines which are unfolded to us with such simplicity and clearness in the Christian Scriptures. It is not enough to affect surprise that a truth, in some degree discoverable by human reason, should have so rarely, if at all, been mentioned by the Jewish legislator. We admit the doctrine, absolutely speaking, to form a part of the religion of nature, but we unhesitatingly deny that in the form and connexion in which it is set forth in revelation, it either has been, or ever could be, discovered by the most persevering efforts of human reason. It is this then which we allege to constitute it a peculiarity of the Christian system, and one which distinguishes that system from all other religions whatever. In this view of the matter we would be warranted in expecting a priori that it should share in the obscurity which covers all the other peculiar doctrines of Christianity, in so far as they are referred to in the law of Moses. The time of full and unclouded revelation was not yet come. To imagine therefore that any other than the darkest reference would be made to the doctrine of eternal rewards and punishments, is to indulge the idea that Moses, as a divinely inspired writer, would have imparted to the Jews a distorted view of the divine arrangements. He must either have simply stated the fact that such rewards and punishments would be hereafter awarded without stating the principles of the divine government on which they would be bestowed, and in this case he would have conveyed a false impression to the minds of the Jews in reference to a subject of infinite moment; or he must have stated the fact in connexion with the full details of the Christian scheme—a proceeding which would have been entirely subversive of the end and design of the ancient dispensation. Either the one mode of acting or the other would, if adopted, have been alike unworthy of a divinely commissioned legislator. Moses, however, on this as well as on other points, has been completely consistent. He has referred to a future state of retribution just as frequently and with as much clearness as to the other peculiarities of the later and more spiritual dispensation.

The great importance of the doctrine of immortality arises from its practical bearing upon the heart and the conduct of men. Now, it must be borne in mind that no statement can produce a legitimate moral effect upon man unless presented under an aspect of truth. But supposing the doctrine to which we allude simply revealed as a fact, without unfolding the principles connected with it, the impression of the fact conveyed to the minds of the Jews would have been decidedly erroneous. It is not true, abstractly speaking, that men are rewarded for their virtuous in the same sense as they are punished for their vicious actions. Yet such would have been the belief on our present hypothesis prevalent among the Jews; and in order to disabuse them of such an idea, it would have been absolutely necessary to have stated even the minutest details of the Christian doctrine in reference to justification and acceptance with God. To avoid an alternative of this kind the Jewish legislator wisely placed the doctrine of immortality on a footing with all the other doctrines of Christianity; and while the Jews were thus left in undisturbed possession of all that nature revealed upon the subject, they had an opportunity of gathering additional information upon this and all the other parts of the Christian dispensation, from their own obscure and emblematic economy.

It is rather surprising that some eminent divines should have rested the exclusive claim of Christianity to the revelation of a future state on a single clause of sacred Scripture, which, when viewed in connexion with the preceding context, appears to afford not the slightest ground for the inference which they have sought to deduce from it. The passage in question occurs in 2 Tim. i. 9, 10. "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began; but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." Now the whole scope of the passage warrants us in considering the last clause, not absolutely as referring to the revelation of a future state, but as modified in its meaning by what has gone before. The apostle, it may be perceived, is speaking, in the 9th verse, of salvation as being founded not on the good works of the believer, but on the absolute and sovereign election of God in "Christ Jesus before the world began;" which election, he goes on to say, "is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who abolished death," which evidently awaited the sinner, "and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel," or, in other words, promulgated not life and immortality, absolutely speaking, as belonging to every man, but as the peculiar inheritance of believers through Christ their living head. From these two verses then we would hardly think of inferring the doctrine of a future state, simply and by itself as a peculiarity of the Christian religion. There are several circumstances however, connected with the doctrine as propounded in this passage, which are, in the strictest sense of the word, peculiar to Christianity; and we would prefer, therefore, in consonance with this and other texts, grounding the peculiarity on the mode in which, and the design for which, life and immortality are set forth in the gospel, rather than on the simple fact that the doctrine itself is therein exclusively revealed. There is enough in the mode of its revelation in the Scriptures to distinguish it from all other announcements of the fact which either have been or may be supposed to have been made.

In intimate connection then with this doctrine of a future state, we would next refer to the doctrines of atonement and justification as most striking and prominent peculiarities of Christianity. Whether we look to the feeble and inadequate views entertained in all ages in reference to expiation for sin, or contrast with these abortive attempts of unaided reason, the clear revelation made to us in the Christian Scriptures, we would be inclined to regard the doctrines of atonement and justification as par excellence the grand peculiarities of Christianity; and to rest our argument on these two points alone were perhaps the most effective and unsailable position we could possibly occupy. In most of the other articles of religion, especially those connected with Christian ethics, it is so difficult to draw the line of separation between that which originates in the exercise of human reason and that which is simply discovered to us by revelation, that the force of our conclusions is often completely destroyed by selecting our arguments from matters of doubtful disputation. By far the safest mode of defence, if we choose to resort to that plan of warfare, is to occupy some impregnable fortress from which our foes, neither by art nor by arms, can possibly drive us. Nature hath made known to man many valuable and essentially important truths; but in reference to the doctrine of atonement and the true mode of acceptance with God, that is, through the merits and mediation of a Redeemer, nature hath been utterly silent. These are the grand arcana of the Christian scheme, and it is only as connected with these that any doctrine can be considered as peculiar to Christianity, whether as opposed to the religion of nature or to the numberless systems of false religion which have existed in the world. When we view, therefore, the doctrine of a future state in intimate and close connexion with salvation through a Redeemer's merits and atonement, we discover a peculiarity of a most remarkable kind which distinguishes Christianity from all other systems of religion—that while “the wages of sin is death, the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.” This is the grand principle which pervades the revelation of God's will to sinful man. “God is now in Christ reconciling a guilty world unto Himself, not imputing unto men their trespasses.” No other system of religion has ever given anything approaching to a satisfactory solution of the awful problem how a sinner may become just before God. Christianity hath removed the difficulty, by teaching us the consolatory truth that “Christ once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God.”

There is a peculiarity also in the mode in which Christianity proposes to operate upon men, and which clearly shows it to be the work of Him who “knows what is in man.” On this subject Archbishop Whately makes the following valuable remarks: “Human ethics and natural religion may be sufficient to satisfy the understanding as to the nature and the claims of virtue; but to engage the feelings on the same side belongs, in an especial manner, to the gospel. It is necessary, indeed, to convince men's reason and to point out to them their true interest; but Christ and his followers were not satisfied with this; they knew that it is in vain the reason is convinced if the heart be not warmed; and that man will not follow his own interests if all his affections lie the other way. That this should be the case with rational beings is the great paradox which we in vain endeavour to explain, though daily experience compels us to acknowledge it. And to find a remedy for this weakness—to induce men to pursue the line of conduct which their own sober judgment admits to be the best—has been admitted by all moralists; though not very successfully and not always judiciously. Our Lord and his followers, ‘who knew what is in man,’ were well aware that such a being could not be practically influenced by an appeal to his understanding alone.

They did not therefore make religion a matter of mere prudent calculation, but of affectionate zeal. When Christ was committing to Simon Peter the care of the beloved flock which He had Himself redeemed, He meant him indeed to understand no doubt that he would be punished if he neglected this charge, and that great would be the reward of diligent obedience; but these were not the topics he chose to insist upon. 'Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?' Peter replied, 'Lord, thou knowest that I love thee.' Jesus said unto him, 'Feed my sheep.' Thrice was this injunction given, and thrice was the appeal made, not to the hopes and fears, but to the affections of the apostle. In like manner, the apostle Paul, in exhorting the churches, alludes occasionally only to the rewards and punishments of a future state, and the folly of not preparing for it; but he insists continually on the mercies which God has already shown us, and the gratitude we ought to feel for them; and strives to fill us with an earnest desire of pleasing Him and an abhorrence of sin as odious in his sight. For example, when he tells the Colossians to 'forgive one another if any man have a quarrel against any,' it is on this ground—'even as Christ forgave you;' and again, 'Children, obey your parents in all things, for this is well-pleasing unto the Lord.' And again, 'Be ye followers of God as dear children; and walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given Himself for us.'

The prevailing motive then in the heart of the Christian is the love of the Redeemer, which is more powerfully effective than any that could possibly be addressed to man; and in no other system of religion has any motive of action been set forth which, in the slightest degree, could admit of a comparison with it. Whether in prosperity or adversity, in health or sickness, in life or death; the love of Christ is all-powerful in its influence over the believer. It strengthens him for the performance of duty, it sustains him in the season of trial, it enables him to meet with composure all the vicissitudes of this changeful scene, and it smooths his pillow in the hour of dissolution. Various and diversified are the motives by which worldly men are actuated, but in the Christian this one principle reigns supreme over all the desires and affections of his heart, and regulates his conduct in the minutest details of ordinary life. It is certainly a peculiarity of no slight importance thus to propose a principle of action admirably fitted to operate upon our moral constitution with all the impelling and constraining influence of a ruling passion. "O thou bleeding Lamb, the true morality is love of Thee."

It forms a truly interesting characteristic of our holy faith that, amid all the rich and varied illustrations of its doctrines which the Bible contains, the main design is uniformly kept in view—to operate with effect upon the heart and conscience of the human being, and thus most powerfully to influence the character and conduct. To this all the truths of Revelation, however important in themselves, are rendered subservient. By too many writers on the subject, as well as private Christians, the religion of the Scriptures is viewed entirely apart from that practical bearing which it uniformly has in the record itself. There we find no doctrines presented as matters of merely curious speculation—no abstract metaphysical disquisitions; but a plain statement of truths in their relative connection with the nature and actual condition of the human being. Whatever is a matter of curiosity, not of practical utility, is carefully suppressed. Some are extravagant enough to expect from the Scriptures full information on points of natural as well as of moral science; but the latter alone fall properly within the scope of the Bible. There are many allusions no doubt to subjects connected with strictly natural phenomena, couched however in such language as plainly shows that there is no intention to explain at length objects of that kind, but to pass with as much rapidity as possible to the purely spiritual and divine. The truths of natural science are far from being fixed and determined with certainty in any one of its great departments; facts have been accumulated, theories have been devised and multiplied, but to every one of the varied departments of human inquiry within the sphere of the natural sciences may the oracular dictum of Bacon be applied at this day with equal justice as in his own time—"I note it deficient." In these circumstances, while men are struggling to attain more enlarged and correct views on such subjects, it is well that revelation has not interposed its resistless authority in favour of any particular theories or modes of explaining the phenomena of nature. The Ptolemaic system of astronomy held sway for ages over the minds of men, and to have mooted, much less maintained, an opposite theory, might have been fatal to the unhappy speculator; at length the Copernican system hath effectually and for ever destroyed its rival and gained the assent and concurrence of all. But amid all this clashing and conflict of human opinions the Word of God hath stood untouched, giving forth its lessons not in consonance with the theoretical sentiments of particular men, but in consonance with the obvious views of the great mass of men. It is no doubt a mighty offence to some ignorant sciolists that the Bible should speak of such an astronomical absurdity as the sun standing still in the heavens; when the merest tyro in such subjects knows full well that it is the earth itself and not the sun which is in motion. We have often smiled at the frivolity and utter thoughtlessness which have generally characterized the proposers of such an objection. Let us suppose the inspired writer to have adopted different language, and the objection would have come, not from a few pretenders to astronomical information, but from the great multitude of men who are regulated in their notions simply by what is sensible and apparent. They see that the sun rises in the east and sets in the west, and hence they naturally imagine that he has completed his daily course; and should we endeavour to undeceive them in this particular point, the attempt were utterly hopeless in so far as their practical actings, nay, even their ordinary language, is concerned. The inspired writers accordingly, never losing sight of the grand object for which revelation has been imparted, express themselves on every other subject in such a way as shall be perspicuous and plain to the most illiterate among men. It ought never to be forgotten that the Bible is intended to instruct us not in natural philosophy, astronomy, geology, or any other science which is conversant simply with mere natural phenomena, but its grand design is to make men wise unto salvation, to instruct them in these things which belong to their everlasting peace.

Christianity we have found adapting itself above all other religions to the true nature and constitution of man. There is, however, a peculiarity to which we cannot refrain from adverting, and which is found in the fact that it regards not more the constitution than the actual condition of the human family. It views man in a twofold aspect as to his spiritual condition—as subject to the divine law, and as a transgressor of that law. It takes for granted his possession of such powers and principles of action as constitute him a moral and responsible agent, and it also takes for granted that he has availed himself of these very powers and principles to violate the laws and to trample on the authority of his great and gracious Creator. The Bible sometimes addresses us as subjects of the law, and at other times as breakers of the law. It commands our obedience to its precepts in the one case, and urges our acceptance of its offered blessings on the other. By the proclamation of the former, sinners are humbled to the dust; by the proclamation of the latter their faith is elevated, their hearts are purified, their souls are comforted and refreshed. The whole human family then, considered in their relation to God, are at once subjects and rebels, and the Divine revelation regards them in both these capacities. We are responsible agents, and yet we are ruined transgressors; and to treat the human being in either aspect to the exclusion of the other, were to act unfaithfully by the word of God and the soul of man. As moral agents the law must be proclaimed to us in all its spirituality of extent and of application, and the more completely it is felt to be "weak through the flesh," so much the more certainly will the conscious transgressor be led to trust implicitly in Him who by a sin-offering condemned sin in the flesh. It is the consciousness of our inability to comport ourselves aright as those who are subject to the law, which leads us to feel our wretched and ruined condition as breakers of the law. It is by a proper and judicious combination, therefore, of these two separate and distinct parts of Divine truth, or in other words, by a proper judicious combination of law with gospel, that the truth will be most successfully commended to every man's conscience as in the sight of God. That system of religion which addresses itself with such complete adaptation to the nature and to the condition of man, cannot be from man, but must be from man's Almighty Maker.

The morality itself of the Christian system is obviously the highest and the purest; it must be of God. Not so the morality of the Koran; not so the morality of the Hindu Shasters; not so the morality of Confucius. No doubt there are many excellent moral precepts in the writings of almost every false prophet that has ever lived. Even a Balaam could say, "Let me die the death of the righteous, let my last end be like his." But Christianity teaches a morality which in all its principles commends itself to us as pure, exalted, sublime, having its origin evidently from the highest and the holiest of Beings. What is the first and fundamental point of all religion and of all true morality? The supreme love of God. This in Christianity is the first and great commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy strength, and with all thy mind." This, however, is not a natural principle inherent in the corrupt heart of man. We may, it is true, by the exertions of our own reason discern evident proofs of the existence and the natural attributes of a Supreme Being. From the things which are seen we may learn His eternal power and Godhead. But Christianity alone hath unfolded to us the true character of God, and the intimate relation which binds us to Him as our Creator, our Preserver, our Benefactor, and above all, our Redeemer. And before we can rightly recognize the solemn obligations which arise out of these relations, and before the whole current of our affections, in consequence of this recognition, can flow forth toward Him, this principle of love to God must be implanted in our hearts. The natural heart of man, instead of breathing love to the loving Jehovah, is enmity to God, and is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. Unless an entire change then be wrought by God himself in the heart and soul and mind of man, the love of God cannot possibly dwell in him. Hence the Apostle Paul teaches that "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost given unto us." And the manner in which the Spirit produces this love in the soul, is by enabling us to recognize and believe the love of God in Christ Jesus. Thus we learn to love Him, because He first loved us. The holiest Being in the universe takes the highest place in the Christian's affections and assimilates him to His own likeness. We are so framed that it is a necessity of our nature to love. We must have some object on which to place our affections, and a celebrated writer, Madame de Stael, throws out the suggestion that probably the element of saddest anguish in the place of final torment will be the awful feeling that the lost soul has none to love, and none to be loved by. Our nature being thus formed to love, the Christian's God comes forth with the demand, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart." None other can wholly engage the affections, none other can satisfy the desires of an immortal soul. God is infinitely worthy to be loved. In Himself He is altogether lovely, nay, He is love itself, the essence, the source, the centre of love. This great duty would have been required of us though we had been sinless beings, and our duty in this respect remains the same even after we have sinned, for our sin changes neither the character of God nor His claim upon our affections and obedience.

This heaven-born principle, supreme love to God, is the mainspring of the Christian's moral conduct in the world. For if it be the first and great commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," the second is like unto it, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." Every man is in one view distinct and separate from every other, and therefore each man has a distinct accountability. The natural advantages of men are widely different even from their very birth. To one man God hath given wealth, to another a powerful intellect, to another bodily strength, and all in different degrees. It is not true, therefore, as has sometimes been alleged, that in point of natural advantages all men are born alike, and that the inequalities of man's condition are to be traced to the perverse influences of our social state. Men are born on an equality, it is true, not, however, in respect of natural advantages, but in respect of natural right to use the advantages which an all-gracious Creator hath bestowed upon them. And there is an inherent principle in every man's nature, self-love, which leads him to use these advantages as far as possible for the promotion of his own happiness. In this manner he loves himself. And Christianity makes this self-love a standard by which we are to regulate our conduct to our fellow-men, not restricting the word neighbour to any particular class of men, but as our Lord teaches us in the parable of the good Samaritan, giving it a range of meaning so wide as to comprehend even the alien and the enemy. Every man is our neighbour, and toward every man we must so act as to leave to him unviolated the right to use his own natural advantages for the promotion of his own happiness. This principle, then, when minutely examined, resolves itself into the golden rule, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them;" and this rule points out the manner in which the law of loving our neighbour as ourselves is to be applied in every individual case. The standard is within us, easy of application, at all times and in all circumstances, and we have simply to suppose the condition of our neighbour as our own, and to apply the standard to that condition, and we shall have no difficulty in knowing how to act. Such a principle, if carried into operation both by individuals and communities, would avert injury at the outset, and lead us invariably to return good for evil, and blessing for cursing.

In the case of the second, as well as in that of the first and great commandment, we may plainly perceive, that to fit us for obedience to this pure and benevolent precept, we must be renewed in the spirit of our mind. In the unrenewed heart self-love has degenerated into selfishness, and therefore the very standard by which we would measure our neighbour's rights has become perverted and erroneous. An entire change, therefore, must be effected by the Spirit of God in our own souls, before we can be prepared rightly to act toward our neighbour. The standard within must be regulated by the word of God without us, before it can be safely applied to the case of another. And hence every true child of God, though under the indwelling operation of the Holy Spirit, rejoices in being able to say, "Thy word is a light unto my feet, and a lamp unto my path."

It is well worthy of being noticed, that there appears a singular propriety in self-love being selected as the principle by which Christianity would have us to regulate our conduct to our fellow-men. This is a strong impelling principle, and thus there is no danger in a well regulated mind, of benevolence or love to our neighbour excelling in degree our love to ourselves. The command is not to love our neighbour as much as ourselves, but as ourselves, pointing to the manner in which the love is exercised rather than the degree. We are enjoined to cherish and cultivate a love similar in kind rather than equally intense with that which we exercise toward ourselves. The very same God who hath issued the command, hath secured us by the very framework of our moral constitution against all possibility of excess. I cannot, neither am I commanded, to love my neighbour better than myself, but if the balance in point of natural advantages should be even in the slightest degree in my favour, I am bound to see to it that, as far as lies in my power, my neighbour's comfort be promoted. On this principle an apostle puts the question, "Whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother have need, how dwelleth the love of God in him?"

These two great principles of true morality, love to God and love to our neighbour, are the grand principles which lie at the foundation of the morality of the Christian system, and what better evidence could be adduced in favour of Christianity as a divine religion than the place which these principles occupy in its moral code! "On these two commandments," declares Christ himself, "hang all the law and the prophets." In other words, the Old Testament, and by consequence the New, rest on these as the basis of their whole system. These are the foundation-truths, the essential elements alike of Judaism and Christianity. No other religion enunciates them in the same connection, or professes to build its whole framework upon them as one harmonious system of consistent moral truths. Even the spiritual theology of the Christian dispensation is simply an expansion of these two commandments. For what is either faith in Jesus Christ or repentance unto life but a most expressive mode of manifesting our cordial obedience to the command to love the Lord our God. For this is specially the commandment of Him whom we are commanded to love, "That we should believe on the name of his Son, Jesus Christ." And no stronger proof could we give that we are strangers to the love of God than if we set at nought the great salvation.

Not only in its fundamental elements, but in the whole of its moral precepts, Christianity is pure and holy like its Divine Author. The morality and the religion of the Bible are not only coherent and consistent; they are one and the same. "This is the love of God that we keep his commandments." There is no love to God without keeping His commandments, and there is no keeping His commandments without love to God. It is in regard to the principle of morality that moral philosophers have so egregiously erred. "It is striking to observe," says John Foster, "how small a portion of the ideas which distinguish the New Testament from other books many moral philosophers have thought indispensable to a theory in which they professed to include the entire duty and interests of men. A serious reader is constrained to feel that there is either too much in that book or too little in theirs." We agree to the latter alternative. Moral philosophers try to construct their systems of morality independently of Christianity and the Word of God; the consequence is that their theories want strength, coherence, and a solid substratum on which to rest. There are no sound ethical principles but those which are recognized in the Christian system. There all is pure, lofty and immutable. The question occupied for ages many a profound enquirer, What is the summum bonum, the greatest good of man? Varro tells us that previous to his time nearly three hundred different opinions had been held upon the point. Christianity has settled the question in one single sentence, "Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." Many and keen were the disputes, more especially among the Jewish writers, on the question—What is the greatest duty of man? This also has been answered definitively by Christianity in the announcement of the first and great commandment. Love to God, carrying with it in its train love to man, is the all in all of Christian morality, the fulfilling of the whole law.

The objection, however, has often been started to the Christian system that the place which morality occupies is such as deprives it of all its efficacy, inasmuch as it is made to follow, not to precede, our justification and acceptance with God. We do not, according to the teaching of the Bible, earn the favour of God by our good works, but justification is wholly of grace, being made to rest not upon our righteousness but upon the righteousness of Christ our surety. On this point we quote the following admirable remarks of Dr. Gardiner Spring: "If this is so, of what avail, it is asked, are all the moral virtues, and what encouragement have men to do the will of God? We need only reply to this, that the foundation of man's acceptance and justification before God is one thing, and the character or moral condition in which he is justified is another. The foundation of his justification is the finished atonement, the obedience unto death of God's eternal Son. The character, or moral condition in which he is justified, is that of a repentant sinner, an humble believer in Jesus Christ. But what is the faith which is thus the condition of his acceptance? Is it a cold assent to the truths of the Gospel? Or is it a warm, vivifying sentiment of the heart, working by love and putting all the powers of the soul into vigorous action in deeds of righteousness? 'What doth it profit, though a man say he have faith and have not works?' Do the Scriptures recognise any such faith as this, even though a man may say he have it, and that it is the true faith? 'Can such a faith save him?' Never. If it have not works, 'it is dead, being alone.' It is no faith. Works of righteousness are not merely the fruits of faith, but they enter into the nature of all the faith that lives, and breathes, and throws its animating pulsations throughout his moral frame. So that the method of gratuitous justification by faith in the Son of God, instead of annihilating, confirms; instead of diminishing, augments; and instead of countervailing, gives a new impulse to the primeval obligations and motives to moral virtue. 'How shall we who are dead to sin live any longer therein?' Is this undermining the obligations to moral virtue? 'Ye have been bought with a price, and that not of silver and gold, but with the precious blood of the Son of God, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot; wherefore glorify God in your bodies and spirits, which are his.' Is this diminishing the motives to moral virtue? 'The love of Christ constraineth us, because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but to him that died for them, and rose again.' Is this weakening the force of moral obligation? 'Do we make void the law through faith? Yea, we establish the law.' 'This do, and thou shalt live,' is to the transgressor an impracticable condition. It is too late for a sinner to dream of being justified by deeds of law. But there is another law. 'Believe, and thou shalt be saved.' Under the first covenant, obedience secures salvation; under the second, salvation secures obedience. He 'loves much who has much forgiven;' and he only obeys who loves."

The argument we have thus far conducted in favour of the divine origin of the Christian system has been drawn from the subject viewed in two different lights, first, Christianity as compared with other religions in those points which belong to all religions; and, secondly, Christianity viewed in what may be considered its distinctive peculiarities. We feel, however, that an argument of this nature must necessarily be incomplete unless we can establish that in the actual results which it has accomplished it has shown itself to be a religion designed, and fitted to promote, the best interests of the human family. It is not enough to show that the system is theoretically good, unless we can demonstrate also that it has proved itself to be practically beneficial. Like the works of nature, it proclaims with a loud voice that the hand which made it is divine. The doctrines which it teaches are full, pure and perfect, forming a system to which nothing can be added without debasing the spirit of the whole, and from which nothing can be taken away without impairing its just and fair proportions. The more Christianity is examined, the more does its excellence become manifest, and the more completely adapted is it seen to be to the state and condition of mankind. What more suitable to a fallen race than the plan of salvation which it discloses? What more fitted to give relief to the sin-burdened soul than the glad tidings of great joy which it so freely proclaims? Other religions partake of a local and temporary character, but the religion of Christ is obviously designed for men of all ages and of all nations. "Philosophers," says Dr. Olinthus Gregory, in his 'Letters on the Evidences of the Christian Religion,' "recommend the cultivation and diffusion of the sciences because of their tendency to sharpen the intellectual faculties of man and meliorate his condition in society. With how much greater reason and earnestness then should Christians recommend the dissemination and adoption of 'pure and undefiled religion,' considering its direct tendency to enlarge the understanding and yet fill it with the contemplation of Deity; to purify and harmonize the passions, to refine the moral sense, to qualify and strengthen for every function in life; to sustain under the pressure of affliction, to afford consolation in sickness, and enable us to triumph in death! What other science can ever make a pretension to dethrone oppression, to abolish slavery, to exclude war, to extirpate fraud, to banish violence, to revive the withered blossoms of paradise? Such are the pretensions and blessings of genuine Christianity, and wherever genuine Christianity prevails, they are experienced. Thus it accomplishes its promises on earth where alone it has enemies; it will therefore accomplish them in heaven where its friends reign."

Of which of all the religions that have existed upon the earth can it be said with truth that it can stand the test of the inquiry,—has the world been the better for it? The reply is at hand, Christianity, and Christianity alone. Other religions have marched in triumph from nation to nation, propagated by fire and sword. But Christianity has made its silent, onward course, bearing the olive-branch of peace, spreading comfort and happiness all around. Destitute of every adventitious advantage, indebted for support to no secular arm, with no other recommendation but its own intrinsic excellence, the religion of Christ has shed its benign and heavenly influences on almost every part of the globe. Wherever it has found its way, blessings innumerable have followed in its train.—Multitudes once plunged in heathen darkness and superstition, are now rejoicing in the light and life of the gospel. The moral transformation thus wrought upon the face of society in those countries which have embraced Christianity is palpable even to the most prejudiced unbeliever. Civilization has taken the place of savage barbarism. Freedom reigns where cruel despotism held her iron sway. The yoke of the oppressor has been broken. The degraded idolater has been converted into the humble and devoted worshipper of the true God. Sanguinary laws have been abrogated; mild, peaceful, humane institutions have been established. Literature and the arts are now eagerly and successfully cultivated. Rivers have been opened in high places and fountains in the midst of the valleys. The wilderness has become a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water. "Instead of the thorn has come up the fir-tree, and instead of the briar has come up the myrtle-tree, and it shall be to the Lord for a name, an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off."

In answer to all this, however, the infidel is wont to adduce the explicit declaration of the Great Author of Christianity: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I come not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household." Does not the author of this much-boasted religion, says the unbeliever, assert plainly in these words that its effects will be disastrous, not beneficial to the human family; that it will be the source of wars and contentions, not of peace upon the earth? Undoubtedly he does. But to understand this statement of Christ, we must bear in mind a distinction of the utmost importance—that which exists between the tendency of a system, and the occasional effects of a system.—When the creation at first sprang from the hand of the Almighty, He pronounced it good, very good. Its original tendency and design was only good. But no sooner did man fall into sin than the aspect of matters, even in reference to the eternal world, became entirely changed. From that moment the whole creation has been groaning and travailing together in pain until now. The fallen creature, to whom was committed the dominion of the earth, has been uniformly converting that which is good in itself into the instrument and occasion of ten thousand evils. The gifts of God have been turned into weapons of rebellion against the Giver; the Providence of God has been made the occasion of denying the high and holy attributes of Him who ruleth over all; and what wonder is it if the Gospel of peace has been perverted by the evil passions of men into a source of strife and contention in families, in neighbourhoods, and large districts of the world? No animosity is deeper than that which has its origin in hatred to the truth, and no wars have been more fierce and bloody than those which have been miscalled religious wars.

Christ, then, in the passage to which we have referred as frequently quoted by infidels, must be viewed as warning his apostles of the abuse which men will make of the very best gifts of God. Even His own coming, He declares, fraught though it was with blessings to a lost world, would be perverted into an occasion of evil by the very men whom he had come to save. No sooner would the truth be faithfully and fearlessly proclaimed, than the evil passions of man would rise in rebellion against it; no sooner would the truth be received and cordially embraced by any individual, than he must straightway gird himself for a contest the keenest and the most persevering. The hatred which the ungodly world bears to the truth will be poured forth upon every man who steadfastly believes it. Nor will even the strongest earthly ties, those which are designed to bind together in harmony and love the members of the same family and household, prevent the outbreaks of this deadly enmity to the truth of God. Nay, such is the malignity which dwells in the unrenewed soul against God and godliness, that the closer the tie in such a case, the stronger the hatred. Let the child of ungodly parents have been converted by the resistless power of the Spirit of God, and instantly the yearnings of a father's love, and the warm gushings of a mother's fondness have been seen to give place to a hatred so virulent that the youthful follower of Jesus has been rudely thrust from his father's house and cast upon the cold charity of an unfeeling world. So true is it that while Jesus hath made peace by the blood of his cross, while peace hath been proclaimed upon earth and good will towards the children of men, Jesus has indeed "come to set a man against his father, and a daughter against her mother."

But while such have been the occasional and accidental influences of the introduction of Christianity into a fallen world; it is no slight proof that the system comes from above, when, instead of seeking, like all false religions, to please the world, it follows out, with unfaltering steps, in the midst of all opposition of men and of devils, its one grand design of saving and restoring a ruined world. It might have been expected that a religion which waged unflinching war against the passions and the prejudices, and even the ordinary maxims and manners of men, would not only have been persecuted and retarded in its progress, but speedily extirpated from the earth. It was not so. This religion is of God, and therefore no created power can ever overthrow it. Christianity hath taken effectual root in the earth, and when we consider the hostility that has in all ages arrayed itself against it, we may well trace a striking proof of the divine origin of the system, in the remarkable and undeniable fact that it hath not only maintained its ground in the face of all opposition, but is silently yet surely advancing throughout the world. And wherever it is diffused its blessed effects are manifest, both upon individuals and communities. To what but to the leavening influence of Christianity are we indebted for the marked civilization and refinement which characterize nations professing to believe it? What has any mere human system of religion ever done to promote the comfort of men and the happiness of nations? Human wisdom has tasked itself to produce schemes of extensive improvement with the view of enlightening and regenerating the world. But after all that has been devised and done, statesmen have yet to learn that the fundamental principle of all good government lies in the maxim that "righteousness exalteth a nation, and sin is a reproach to any people." To promote the progress of Christianity in the earth is to employ the grand, the appointed means of advancing the happiness of the human family both in time and through eternity. Shut up the Bible, abolish Christianity, and we know not whence can be obtained effectual comfort for man amid the sorrows and the trials of this brief span of time. Christianity sustains the soul in the hour of deepest affliction, and even when the very flesh and the heart begin to faint and to fail, Christianity enables its disciple to lift up the eye of faith to his Father in the heavens and to say—"Thou art the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever."

The humanizing effects of the Christian religion were early apparent and obvious to all. Paul tells us of its hallowed influence upon the primitive Christians, when after enumerating "idolaters, effeminate, thieves, covetous, drunkards, revilers, extortioners," he adds, "and such were some of you, but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God." Similar have been its effects in all ages wherever it has been known and received. The change thus produced in any individual soul affords, where the soul is conscious of it, a strong, an irrefragable testimony, that the religion which produced it is from God. "Come see a man," exclaimed the woman of Samaria in reference to Jesus, after she had conversed with him at the well, "Come see a man which told me all things that ever I did, is not this the Christ?" This self-evidencing power of the truth is the privilege of every believer, and ever and anon, as he makes progress in the divine life, this powerful convincing evidence becomes stronger and stronger. He perceives that Christianity depicts his natural character in the very light in which he himself has been led to see it, and describes the Spirit's work in the soul precisely as he himself has felt it. Every step he advances in his heavenward journey he is refreshed by the clear perception of a most beautiful and consistent harmony between the statements of Christian truth and the facts and phenomena of his own experience. Thus he is able to say of Christianity in language analogous to that which the woman used concerning Christ, "Behold a system of religion that tells me all that I have ever done, all that I have ever felt, all that I have ever known; is not this system the very truth of God? Let any other man deny it, I never can. I have the witness in myself that Christianity is of God."

To this view of the religion of Christ as exerting a transforming influence upon individuals and societies of men, the objection has sometimes been started by the infidel that the progress of the gospel is slow, and that a remedy of more rapid and powerful effect, one which would have eradicated the disease, suddenly and in a moment, would have afforded a readier a more striking proof of the skill and capacity of the Great Physician. In reply to such an objection, we would hint to the infidel that we have no right to found an argument on what God might have done, but must from the very nature of the case be limited to what he has done. But passing from this preliminary demurring to an argument of this kind as against Christianity, we have no hesitation in admitting that it was quite in the power of the Almighty to have accomplished the restoration of the human family to His own favour and image by the express and immediate fiat of His will without the co-operation of any means whatever; but the very fact that he has not done so is a strong presumption that the adoption of the means suggested by the objector was not consistent with the great purposes of Infinite Wisdom. And not only so, but we are happily in a condition to turn the very objection itself into an argument in favour of the divine origin of Christianity. For is not this very slowness of operation one of the elements which the great author of Christianity Himself predicted would characterize His gospel? What are His own words: "Another parable spake he unto them; The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened." In this parable Jesus plainly likens Christianity to leaven hid in meal operating slowly yet surely, silently yet powerfully. The process of leavening with the grace of God, whether in the case of individuals or communities, we are here taught, on the best of all authority, will be tardy but certain in its effects. The whole lump will in due time be leavened. "We are renewed," not suddenly, and all at once, but gradually and without fail, "renewed in the whole man after the image of God." And this is true not only of the work of grace in the individual soul, but of the diffusion of the gospel in the world. The work of evangelization is progressing slowly, but we may rest assured that God's promise will be fulfilled in his own time. "As I live, saith the Lord, the whole earth shall be filled with my glory."

If the religion of Christ be thus accomplishing its great design in the very manner predicted by Christ himself, is there not in this very fact, instead of, as the infidel would have it, an argument against, a powerful and effective argument rather in favour of, its divine origin?

It were no difficult matter to show, reasoning from the ordinary mode of the Divine procedure, that by a slow and gradual operation the gospel will best accomplish its grand object, the preparation of man for a state of perpetual and unchangeable bliss. On this subject Dr. Inglis, in his able 'Vindication of Christian Faith,' makes the following judicious and conclusive remarks: "A sudden restoration to the perfection and bliss, which we had lost, might have an effect similar to what is produced by the indulgence of a fond but injudicious earthly parent towards a child who is ever offending and ever forgiven, without being rendered duly humble for his past folly and presumption. But the discipline, through which Christians have to pass in this world,—the various troubles which here accrue to us from the present disordered state of our moral frame, and the imperfect success of our best endeavours to recover the perfection and happiness of our nature,—are well calculated to correct every tendency to that proud and froward spirit, with which we are so unhappily infected, and even to clothe us with humility—with that permanent character of humility, which appears so essential to a future state of permanent perfection and bliss." And again, viewing the same objection in still another aspect, the same author adds: "Though the Divine Being still looked upon us with the pity and the distinguishing love of a father,—such an immediate restoration as it was, no doubt, in his power to accomplish, might have been inconsistent with the natural means of impressing us with such a sense of its value as to qualify us for a permanent and unchangeable state. If we must now be taught more highly to value, and more duly to maintain, that conformity to the Divine Image to which we shall yet be restored, any recovery of our disordered frame, produced without labour and difficulty on our part, could but little operate as a natural mean of advancing this design of Heaven. But, left for a time to feel and lament the prevalence of indwelling sin,—stimulated by the strongest motives to contend against its power,—deriving from Heaven such measures of Divine aid, as serve to cherish our hopes and invigorate our endeavours, but never in this world completely to fulfil our wishes,—struggling, therefore, with the weakness of our nature, and slowly advancing in our arduous work,—yet at length attaining, by the grace of God, the whole object of our unwearied desire in the blessed mansions above,—we shall never account ourselves able to value, sufficiently, that perfection and bliss to which we are restored,—we shall never forfeit or lose our renewed possession."

But no sooner do we set aside one objection, than straightway the infidel puts forth another. The fact is, that the rejection of Christianity by unbelievers arises not so much from the state of the understanding as from the state of the heart. Infidelity in its true character is moral rather than intellectual. True, arguments are addressed to him in favour of the Divine origin of Christianity, but, however strong, and even apparently irresistible, these arguments may be, he shuts his eyes upon the light, and deliberately surrenders himself to the full influence and melancholy effects of a state of spiritual darkness. In this he is chargeable with a perversion of intellect which is culpable in the extreme; and yet his criminality lies deeper than in any mere abuse of his reasoning powers; it is to be traced to the moral habits and actions of the man. That our perception of truth, whether in its real meaning or its true excellence and value, is affected to a great extent by our moral character, no one acquainted with the ordinary workings of the human intellect can possibly deny. But this is more especially the case in regard to what is called Moral Truth. Hence the remarkable declaration of our Saviour, "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." The responsibility of man for his belief or disbelief of Divine truth is founded on the fact that his moral is strictly and indissolubly connected with his intellectual nature, and it is at his peril, therefore, if, through self-induced obliquity of mind, he shall reject the evidence in favour of Christianity and become ensnared in the mazes of a reckless infidelity. Unbelief is not, as some would try to persuade themselves, a mere error in judgment; it is a moral crime, and that too accompanied with greater aggravations than any other. The evidence in favour of Christianity is strong. "There is light enough," says Pascal, "for those who sincerely wish to see," but he adds in words of great significance, "There is darkness enough for those of an opposite description." Moral evidence, however powerful, is in no case entirely irresistible. Though we could succeed in convincing a man, by dint of argument alone, that Christianity was of God, still if the native enmity of the heart to the truth were unsubdued he would no doubt fall back upon one plausible objection after another in excuse for his unbelief. His infidelity lies deeper than in the mere processes of mind; it lies hid, yea, hid even it may be from his own consciousness, amid the emotions and feelings and desires of the heart. It is not a mere speculative denial of truth, the evidence of which has been carefully and candidly examined, but a moral aversion to the truth which refuses to examine, and therefore will not be convinced. Hence arises the necessity of the Spirit's operation in opening the eyes to a clear perception of the truth and the excellence of Christianity. Were the reception of Christianity a purely intellectual act, we would put the man upon his own resources, but being fundamentally a moral act dependent on the state of the heart as well as of the understanding, we must look upward for the direction of a supernatural agency which can reform and renovate the heart, for, in strict accordance with this view of the subject, it is declared by an Apostle: "The natural man understandeth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned."

These remarks on the nature and origin of infidelity are peculiarly appropriate in closing our argument in proof of the Divine origin of the Christian system drawn from the internal character of the system itself, more especially as being designed to operate with salutary effect upon individuals and communities. Such an argument supposes obviously, in order to its right appreciation, a sound moral condition on the part of the man to whom it is addressed. Without this, neither its meaning nor force would be understood or felt. The reasoning throughout the whole of this second part of our Introductory Dissertation is decidedly moral in its nature. It treats of Christianity as a moral system, and on its decided superiority to all other systems of morality we have founded a confident appeal in favour of its divinity. Its palpable adaptation to the moral nature of man, we have put forward as an irrefragable proof that it could only have sprung from man's Creator. We have carefully tested other religions in reference to the points which we might naturally be authorized in expecting every religion to possess; and in these points we have found all of them wanting. Christianity alone has stood every one of the tests applied, and has thus vindicated its claim to a complete superiority to all other religious systems. As a religion simply, and in points common to it with all religions, it bears away the palm of honour as being the religion which contains, in the highest degree of purity and excellence, all that we conceive a religion ought to contain. Not only, however, have we compared Christianity with the other leading religious systems which have prevailed upon the earth; we have made a rigid examination of Christianity itself, in its characteristic doctrines and precepts, scrutinizing narrowly those points which may be termed its peculiarities. The result of this minute investigation has been that we have found each of these special and peculiar points stamped with the impress of Divinity. Here the argument might have come to a close;

but in such a case it might have been regarded as imperfect. To render it complete, therefore, we have followed up the theoretical with the practical aspect of the matter. Having pointed out what Christianity is, both as compared with other religions, and in its own peculiar doctrines and precepts, we have also endeavoured to point out what Christianity has done, tracing its practical effects upon the hearts and consciences, the character and conduct of men, both as individuals and social masses. These effects we have found to be such as we might expect to arise from the promulgation of a heaven-born system of religion.

What then is the conclusion to which we are irresistibly brought by the whole argument? It is simply this, that CHRISTIANITY, AND CHRISTIANITY ALONE, IS A RELIGION WHICH HAS COME FROM GOD.

CHRISTIAN CYCLOPÆDIA.

A, THE simplest of all sounds, and therefore used as the first letter in almost all alphabets. In the Hebrew language it is called Aleph; in the Greek, Alpha. It is probable that the power of this letter, in ancient times, was that of an unaspirated H; or, in other words, used for the purpose of enouncing the vowel following it, without any audible aspiration. This, indeed, is the opinion of the Jews generally, and of all who read Hebrew with the vowel points. In Arabic, Aleph is used to designate any vowel constituting or beginning a syllable. But whatever may have been the original use of the letter Aleph, it came in process of time to designate one of the most frequent sounds in all languages. Both the Hebrews and Greeks used their letters as numerals. Hence A (Aleph) came to signify the first; as did also Alpha, a distinguishing title assumed by our Lord. Thus, in Rev. i. 8, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord;"—ver. 11, "I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last." Nearly the same expressions occur in Rev. xxi. 6, and xxii. 13. This was a mode of expression not unfrequent among the Jews, and it is evidently employed by our Lord to indicate the perfection of his nature, as being not only eternal and underived in so far as his own existence is concerned, but the source of existence to all other beings. It was probably to denote the high reverence entertained for the Lord Jesus, and their entire dependence upon him, as the beginning and the end, the source and the consummation of all their hopes, that the primitive Christians were wont to inscribe upon their tombs the letters Alpha and Omega; thus adopting a most significant symbol to distinguish their tombs from those of idolaters.

AARON, the son of Amram and Jochebed, the grandson of Levi, and the brother of Moses. It was from this remarkable man that the Jewish high priesthood had its origin; and accordingly, we find its characteristic, as described by the Apostle Paul, to have been, that it was after the order of Aaron. The etymological derivation of the name is by no means apparent. Being three years older than his brother Moses, he was born some time before the cruel edict was issued by Pharaoh for the destruction of the Hebrew male infants. Not a single incident is recorded in Scripture of the early history of Aaron, nor, indeed, until his marriage to Elisheba, the daughter of Amminadab, by whom he had four sons,—Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. He was selected by the Almighty to assist his brother Moses in the deliverance of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage; and, from his eloquence, he was appointed to plead with the Egyptian ruler the cause of his poor oppressed countrymen, and to denounce those fearful judgments which Jehovah was pleased to execute by the hand of Moses. For a time the heart of Pharaoh was hardened against the arguments of Aaron, as well as the miracles of Moses. But at length the efforts of God's faithful servants were successful, and the Israelites were led forth from the land of bondage under the immediate protection of Jehovah, who had rescued them with a strong hand and a stretched-out arm. Moses and Aaron were the leaders of the Israelitish host in their journeying through the wilderness; and we find it declared, that on one solemn occasion, when Moses was absent on the mount, receiving the law from the hand of God, Aaron was guilty, in accordance with the wishes of the people, of making and setting up a molten calf, as an object of idolatrous worship. Accustomed as the Israelites had been, when in Egypt, to witness, and perhaps on some occasions to participate in, the grossest forms of idolatry, some excuse might perhaps be found for the clamorous demand on the part of the ignorant among them; but, instead of yielding to their importunate desires, it certainly might have been expected that Aaron would have resisted, and firmly repressed their idolatrous propensities. It was not so, however. He aided and encouraged the people in their heinous transgression; and had not Moses stood in the breach, Aaron and the whole army of the Israelites would have perished by the hand of the Lord. As it was, three thousand fell by the sword; the tribe of Levi, which seems to have stood aloof from the horrid sin, being employed as the instruments for the destruction of their brethren. Aaron repented of his sin, and was restored to the favour and friendship of God. He was ordained to the office of high priest, and that sacred office was limited to his family; although two of his sons, Nadab and Abihu, proved themselves very unworthy of the high distinction.

In tracing the history of Aaron, we find him, along with his sister, Miriam, guilty of rebelling against Moses, and claiming an authority equal to his. The Almighty, in vindication of his servant, smote Miriam with leprosy; and although, for reasons which seemed good to the All-wise, Aaron was exempted from this disease, he was far from escaping punishment, a similar rebellion having been raised against himself, by Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, along with their followers, amounting to two hundred and fifty persons. On this last occasion the judgment of God was remarkably displayed,—the leading conspirators having been swallowed up by an earthquake, and their followers consumed by fire from heaven. In consequence of this same conspiracy a pestilence was sent among the people, destroying multitudes, and threatening to destroy multitudes more, had not Aaron, by his intercession, prevailed with God, and the plague was forthwith stayed. In memorial of this event, the censers offered by Korah and his company were made broad plates for a covering of the altar, that no stranger, who is not of the seed of Aaron, come near to offer incense unto the Lord. And besides, the princes of the different tribes were commanded to bring their rods, or sceptres, to Moses, with their names inscribed upon them. Aaron's name was written upon the rod of Levi; and all the rods were laid up in the ark of the congregation, before the testimony. Next morning, Aaron's rod "was budded, and brought forth buds, and blossomed blossoms, and yielded almonds." At the command of Moses this rod was laid up before the testimony, in token of God's obvious interposition in vindication of his anointed high priest.

Aaron was also implicated in the sin of Moses at the waters of Meribah. The people murmured for want of water at the wilderness of Sin. Moses and Aaron were commanded to speak to the rock, and water would gush forth. Instead of speaking to the rock, however, they spoke to the people, saying, "Must we fetch you water out of this rock?" and struck the rock, as if triumphantly glorying in their power, and forgetting that the glory of this, and every other wonderful work, is due only to the Lord. It was on account of this sin that Aaron, as well as his brother, was prevented from entering the promised land. He survived this prohibition only one year, when the Almighty having commanded him to come up to mount Horeb, he was there divested of his priestly robes, which were put upon his son Eleazar. Aaron then expired upon the mountain, at the age of one hundred and twenty-three, and was buried there.

It might perhaps be useful to mention some particulars in reference to the history and character of Aaron, which point him out as an eminent type of Christ; but his official distinction, as the first HIGH PRIEST of Israel, being the chief, if not the only, ground on which the typical resemblance rests, this point falls to be considered under that article.

AARONITES, Levites of the family of Aaron, of whom Eleazar was the chief. To them was committed the charge of the sanctuary. These appear at one time to have been a very numerous body; for we find them mentioned in 1 Chron. xiii. 27, among the bands that came to David to Hebron, to turn the kingdom of Saul to him, as amounting to no fewer than three thousand and seven hundred.

AB, the eleventh month of the civil year among the Jews, and the fifth month of their ecclesiastical year. It has thirty days, and corresponds with part of our July and August. On the 1st day of this month a fast is held by the Jews, on account of the death of Aaron, the high priest; and on the 9th another fast is observed, in commemoration of the destruction of the first temple by Nebuchadnezzar, and of the second by the Romans; which, according to Josephus, occurred on the same day.

ABADDON (Hebrew, corresponding to Apollyon, Greek, and signifying Destroyer), the angel of the bottomless pit, and king over the symbolical locusts. Rev. ix. 11. (See Locust.) There is considerable difference among commentators in expounding this passage. Some explain it as denoting Satan. Le Clerc, Grotius, and Hammond, interpret these locusts of the zealots and robbers who, under John of Gis-chala, desolated Judea, before the destruction of Jerusalem. But Mr Mede remarks, that the title Abaddon alludes to Obodas, the common name of the ancient monarchs of that part of Arabia from which Mahomet came; and considers the passage as descriptive of the inundation of the Arabians or Saracens, under Mahomet and his successors. Mr Lowman, and after him Bishop Newton, adopts and confirms this interpretation. He shows that the rise and progress of the Mahometan religion and empire exhibit a signal accomplishment of this prophecy. All the circumstances correspond to the character of the Arabians, and the history of the period that extended from A.D. 612 to A.D. 762, being five prophetic months, or one hundred and fifty years. The title of Destroyer, given to their king, was peculiarly suitable to a succession of caliphs, who, in propagating the Mahometan imposture by fire and sword, destroyed at once both the bodies and the souls of men; and seemed to be the visible representatives of Satan himself, who was "a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth." John viii. 44.

An opinion is advanced by many expositors of this passage, that by the locusts are to be understood the various orders of the Romish clergy; and by their king Abaddon, the Romish pontiff, as the head of that corrupt hierarchy. But, on a careful consideration of the whole passage, we are inclined to coincide in sentiment with those who consider Mahomet as here called the angel or messenger of the bottomless pit. He was emphatically the Destroyer, for innumerable are the multitudes who have perished under the fatal influence of his delusions. There are supposed to be one hundred and forty millions of Mahometans upon the earth; and when we consider that more than twelve hundred years have elapsed since this system of error was first promulgated, we may well recognise in the Arabian deceiver the great Abaddon or Apollyon, the destroyer of the souls and bodies of men.

ABAGTHA, one of the seven chamberlains of king Ahasuerus, mentioned in Esther i. 10. Nothing further is known concerning this individual.

ABANA and PHARPAR, rivers of Damascus, in Syria. The name Abana is formed from Aben, a stone. This name may appear significant when it is known that the Abana is probably that branch of the Barrady, or (as the Greeks called it) Chrysorroas, which runs through the city. The Pharpar, there is reason to believe, is not the Orontes, as some have supposed, but another branch of the Barrady, which watered the gardens without the walls of Damascus. The Barrady itself, according to Maundrell, springs from the foot of Mount Lebanon, or Libanus, eastward. Its name seems derived from the refreshing coolness and purity of its waters.

The river Barrady at present divides itself into three branches, of which the middle one, Abana, runs through the middle of Damascus; and the other two run on either side of the city. It is probable that when Naaman the Syrian used the indignant language, "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? may I not wash in them and be clean?" (2 Kings v. 12) he had in view the numerous and important advantages which Damascus derived from the streams of the Barrady. The proud soldier was enraged that the prophet should issue so simple a command as to go and wash in Jordan seven times—just as if there were not streams in his own native land which might have proved far more efficacious in healing the leprosy. He simply viewed the act of washing in Jordan as a means of cure, without adverting to the all-important circumstance, that it was God's appointed means, and deriving all its efficacy from him alone.

ABARIM, a range of mountains in the land of Moab, between the rivers Arnon and Jordan. One part of these mountains was called Nebo and Pisgah. That these were not two separate ridges, but names for two different portions of the same ridge, is indicated by these words, "And Moses went up from the plains of Moab unto the mountain of Nebo, to the top of Pisgah, that is over against Jericho." Deut. xxxiv. 1. It is very probable, from this description, that Pisgah was the highest peak of mount Nebo, belonging to a range of mountains termed Abarim. Wells, in his 'Historical Geography,' states that Eusebius and Jerome mention the names of Abarim and mount Nebo as both of them in use in their time. Nebo is chiefly remarkable as the spot where Moses died. Dr Milman, in his 'History of the Jews,' describes, in the following graphic language, the splendid prospect which Moses enjoyed from mount Pisgah:—"From the top of mount Abarim, or Nebo (the former of which names may, perhaps, be traced in Djebel Attarous, the highest point in the district), the lawgiver, whose eyes were not yet dimmed, and who had suffered none of the infirmities of age, might survey a large tract of country. To the right lay the mountain pastures of Gilead, the romantic district of Bashan; the windings of Jordan might be traced along its broad and level valley, till, almost beneath his feet, it flowed into the Dead Sea. To the north spread the luxuriant plains of Esdraelon; the more hilly, yet fruitful country of Lower Galilee. Right opposite stood the city of Jericho, embowered in its groves of palms; beyond it, the mountains of Judea, rising above each other till they reached the sea. Gazing on this magnificent prospect,—beholding, in prophetic anticipation, his great and happy commonwealth occupying its numerous towns and blooming fields,—Moses breathed his last. The place of his burial was unknown; lest, perhaps, the impious gratitude of his followers might ascribe divine honours to his name, and assemble to worship at his sepulchre."

ABBA, an Aramæan or Syriac word of endearment, signifying My Father. It is often applied to God. David Levi, in his 'Lingua Sacra,' derives it from a root denoting desire, delight, complacency, satisfaction. The learned Selden has proved, from the 'Babylonian Gemara,' that a slave or menial servant was not permitted to employ this appellation in addressing the ab,—that is, the lord and head of the family; because it was indicative of the closest relationship and the tenderest reciprocal affection. Its use was restricted to such as sustained this intimate relationship, and was regarded as the appropriate language of children, whether by birth or adoption. Its use in the New Testament seems to correspond exactly with the facts here stated. It is employed by our Lord himself during his agony in the garden of Gethsemane, "when he offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears," and "said, Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee; take away this cup from me: nevertheless not what I will, but what thou wilt." Mark xiv. 36. What filial adoration, submission, tenderness, confidence, breathe in these words! So, when recounting to the Roman and Galatian Churches the peculiar privileges of those in whom the Spirit of Christ dwells, the apostle describes this as their peculiar distinction, above such as still continue slaves to sin, or in the bondage of a legal state, that through that Spirit they cry, "Abba, Father!" In other words, true believers address God in a language of filial love and confidence, corresponding to that new and endearing relation which they sustain as "children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." Hence it appears that all Christians, by virtue of their relation to God in Christ, are authorised to employ this language of filial hope and tenderness in their approaches to their heavenly Father. "Because they are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into their hearts, crying, Abba, Father." This is the cry, the tender, affectionate, loving cry, of a true child of God. "This feeble crying," to use the language of Luther, "is a mighty noise in the ears of God, and so filleth heaven and earth that God heareth nothing else; for it drowneth the cries of all other things whatsoever." It has been observed, that the title "Abba" was not allowed to be used by slaves when addressing the head of the family, this privilege being reserved for the children; and thus we may perceive a peculiar force and beauty in the apostle adverting to this, as a characteristic of the redeemed family of God. They feel a peculiar, childlike confidence in approaching their reconciled Father. The feeling of bondage and restraint is removed, and "they have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby they can cry, Abba, Father."

The word Abba, in after ages, came to be used in the Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic Churches, as a title given to their bishops. The bishops themselves bestow the title "Abba" more eminently upon the bishop of Alexandria; which gave occasion for the people to call him Baba, or Papa,—that is, grandfather; a title which he bore before the bishop of Rome. From this word is obviously derived the English title of Abbot, given to the superior of an abbey.

ABBE', a term, when used in a monastic sense, equivalent to the title Abbot (which see). When used in a modern sense, the word is used to indicate a class of men in France, who, before the French Revolution, were possessed of considerable weight. They had devoted themselves to the study of theology, in the hope of obtaining from the king a share in the revenues of a monastery. They were men, in general, possessed of considerable literary attainments, and contrived to acquire no small influence in society. Since the Revolution, towards the end of the eighteenth century, the order to which we now refer, though still employed as public and private instructors of youth, are no longer viewed with the same respect as formerly.

ABBESS, the superior or ruler of a convent of nuns. She possesses the same authority as that which is exercised by an abbot over the monks belonging to his monastery.

ABBEY, a monastery to which the deluded votaries of popish superstition sometimes retire, with the professed view of shutting themselves out from the vanities and follies of the world, and devoting themselves exclusively to exercises of devotion. These religious houses, as they are termed, are under the authority of an abbot or abbess, who has full power to enforce all the regulations of the institution, however stringent. Previous to the Reformation, abbeys abounded both in England and Scotland, and they generally succeeded in procuring grants of the richest lands in the whole country. Thus both the State and the nobility were impoverished, to enrich these receptacles for idle and profligate monks or nuns. In describing the state of religion in Scotland before the Reformation, Dr McCrie remarks, in his 'Life of Knox,'—"Through the blind devotion and munificence of princes and nobles, monasteries, those nurseries of superstition and idleness, had greatly multiplied in the nation; and though they had universally degenerated, and were notoriously become the haunts of lewdness and debauchery, it was deemed impious and sacrilegious to reduce their number, abridge their privileges, or alienate their funds. The kingdom swarmed with ignorant, idle, luxurious monks, who, like locusts, devoured the fruits of the earth, and filled the air with pestilential infection,—with Friars, white, black, and grey; Canons regular and of St Anthony, Carmelites, Carthusians, Cordeliers, Dominicans, Franciscan conventuals and observantines, Jacobins, Premonstratensians, Monks of Tyrone and of Vallis Caulium, and Hospitallers, or Holy Knights of St John of Jerusalem; Nuns of St Austin, St Clair, St Scholastica, and St Catherine of Sienna; with Canonesses of various clans." If such was the state of Scotland before these nests of corruption were removed by the Reformation, England was in an equally deplorable condition. At length light began to shine upon the benighted land. Henry VIII. instituted an inquiry into the state of matters in the monasteries; and the exposure was such, that the whole system was brought to an end. The Crown became possessed of the abbey lands, and grants were made of many of them to various noble families. The suppression of the monasteries in both ends of the island was the natural effect of the introduction of the pure doctrines of the Reformation. It was no longer accounted either a privilege or a duty for a man to bury his talents in the earth, and, instead of seeking to benefit his fellow-men, to flee like a coward from the duties of his station, and render himself utterly useless, and a cumberer of the ground. At the same time, these institutions, though in a religious point of view utterly indefensible, were, in the dark ages, the store-houses of literature, and the seminaries where alone knowledge could be procured. Valuable books and national records in these turbulent days were generally lodged in monasteries, as in safe places. The monks, many of them though professedly devoted to religious exercises alone, spent their whole time in literary pursuits,—transcribing manuscripts, keeping careful records of passing events, and comparing and storing up the histories of former days. Thus it is that much valuable knowledge has been preserved which would otherwise have been lost; and these very institutions, which had their origin in a distorted view of religion, were overruled by a gracious and all-wise Providence as means, to some extent, of good. They were hospitals for the sick and poor, and served as places of entertainment, when there were no inns. They were also asylums for aged and indigent persons of good family. (SEE MONACHISM.)

ABBOT, the chief ruler of a monastery or abbey. Originally a name applied to every aged monk, but after the eighth century it was applied to the chief ruler. At first they were laymen, and subject to the bishop and ordinary pastors. Their monasteries being remote from cities, and built in the furthest solitudes, they had no share in ecclesiastical affairs; but there being among them several persons of learning, they were called out of the deserts by the bishops, and fixed in the suburbs of the cities, and at length in the cities themselves. From that time they degenerated, and learning to be ambitious, aspired to be independent of the bishops, which occasioned some severe laws to be made against them. At length, however, the abbots carried their point, and obtained the title or lord, with other badges of the episcopate, particularly the mitre. Hence arose new distinctions among them. Those were termed mitred abbots who were privileged to wear the mitre, and exercise episcopal authority within their respective precincts, being exempted from the jurisdiction of the bishop. Others were called crosiered abbots, from their bearing the crosier, or pastoral staff. Others were styled œcumenical or universal abbots, in imitation of the patriarch of Constantinople; while others were termed cardinal abbots, from their superiority over all other abbots. At present, in the Roman Catholic countries, the chief distinctions are those of regular and commendatory. The former take the vow and wear the habit of their order; whereas the latter are seculars, though they are obliged by their bulls to take orders when of proper age. Since the Revolution, when the abbeys became national property, abbots have diminished in France; but they still abound in Italy, where young scholars are called abbots, merely from having undergone the tonsure, though not in orders.

ABDA. A person of this name is mentioned in 1 Kings iv. 6, as being the father of Adoniram, whom Solomon appointed over the tribute. Another of the same name appears, from Neh. xi. 17, to have been one of the Levites employed in the service of the second temple, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity.

ABDON, one of twenty-two large cities belonging to the tribe of Asher, which occupied the north-west province of Palestine. It was one of the four cities assigned as a residence to the Levites of the family of Gershom, as mentioned in Josh. xxi. 30.

ABDON was also the name of the tenth judge of Israel, who lived about 1160 B. C. He judged Israel eight years. Nothing is recorded of him, except that he had forty sons and thirty grandsons, who rode upon seventy asses' colts. Another person of the name of Abdon is recorded as being one of those whom Josiah sent to Huldah the prophetess, to inquire of the Lord how he and his people were to avoid the punishments written in the book of the law.

ABEDNEGO, the Chaldean name given to Azariah, one of the three noble Hebrew youths, who, animated by an unshaken attachment to the true religion, refused to render homage to the idol of Nebuchadnezzar, in the plain of Dura. They were therefore cast into the fiery furnace, heated, through the wrath of the tyrant, seven times hotter than usual. The splendid miracle by which it pleased God to honour this consistent and fearless piety, together with its powerful effect upon the mind of the Chaldean monarch, is recorded in the third chapter of Daniel. Azariah is supposed by some to have been the same with Ezra; but this opinion is by no means probable, Ezra not having sprung from the royal line of Judah, but having been a priest of the tribe of Levi. There is a circumstance connected with the change of name, which is worthy of attention. It has been thought that the motive of the Chaldeans in giving the new name, was, in fact, more religious than political. The Hebrew and the Chaldean languages were very similar. The Chaldeans perfectly understood the Hebrew names; and they knew also how tenacious Hebrew parents were to give names to their children which bear some relation to Jehovah, the god of their fathers. (See DANIEL—SHAD-RACH—NEBUCHADNEZZAR.)

ABEL. The second son of Adam and Eve, born probably very shortly after the fall of man and his banishment from Eden. His name, which signifies vanity or mourning, was singularly appropriate to the period of his birth, as well as to the melancholy events of his history. The occupation which he followed was that of a shepherd, while his brother Cain, like their father, was a tiller of the ground. Trained by their parents to the worship of God after the newly appointed mode of sacrifice, we are informed that “in process of time,” or, as it is often rendered, “at the end of days,” both the brothers presented an offering to the Lord, Cain bringing “of the fruit of the ground,” and Abel “the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof.” The result of their respective acts of worship is mentioned, Gen. iv. 4–7. Whence these different results? The Apostle Paul expressly informs us where the difference of the two sacrifices lay—“By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts: and by it he being dead yet speaketh.” We are not informed in what manner the Lord manifested his acceptance of the sacrifice, but not improbably it might be as in after times by fire from heaven. The result, however, was that Cain, instead of being humbled by the non-acceptance of his offering, was “very wroth, and his countenance fell.” He envies his brother—is enraged against him—and slays him. Thus, about the year of the world 130, was Abel murdered, the first in the long line of martyrs who have fallen as victims to the persecuting intolerance and bigotry, and ruthless unrelenting cruelty and rage of the seed of the serpent.”

ABEL (mourning), sometimes called The Field of Joshua, a place near Beth-shemesh, a city in the tribe of Judah, which belonged to the priests. The name of Abel was given to the place by the Israelites, on account of the mourning which took place when multitudes were struck dead for looking into the ark. On that occasion a great stone was raised, in commemoration of that melancholy event, which was called “Abel the Great.”

ABEL (the plain), a prefix to several Hebrew names. Thus,—

1. ABEL-BETH-MAACHAH, or plain of the temple of Maachah; the same as Abel, or Abila, a city in the tribe of Manasseh, north-west of Damascus, between Libanus and Antilibanus. According to other geographers, and probably with greater correctness, it is regarded as a city belonging to the tribe of Naphtali, on the north of Palestine. It was to this city that Sheba fled (2 Sam. xx. 13–22), to escape from the soldiers of David; and the inhabitants, afraid that the place would be besieged on his account, cut off his head, and threw it over the wall. About eighty years afterwards it was taken and ravaged by Benhadad, and, long after, by Tiglath-pileser, by whom its inhabitants were carried captive into Syria. It was subsequently rebuilt, and became the capital of the tetrarchy of Abilene, under the government of Lysania. Luke iii. 1. Josephus calls it Abel-Machea. (See ABILA.)

2. ABEL-KERAMIM, or the plain of the vineyards, originally a village of the Ammonites, situated, according to Eusebius, six Roman miles north-west of Philadelphia, or Rabbath-Ammon; the ruins of which village were discovered by the traveller Burckhardt. The same writer mentions another place as bearing the same name, situated beyond the Jordan, twelve miles east of Gadara. The ruins of the latter are still extant.

3. ABEL-MAIM, the same as Abel-beth-Maachah. 1 Kings xv. 20; 2 Chron. xvi. 4.

4. ABEL-MEHOLAH (the place of dancing), the birth-place of Elisha. It is said by Eusebius to have been about sixteen miles south of Scythopolis (1 Kings iv. 12), and celebrated for Gideon's victory over the Midianites. Judges vii. 22.

5. ABEL-MIZRAIM (the mourning of the Egyptians), a name given to the threshing-floor of Atad, in consequence of the lamentations which attended the burial of the patriarch Jacob, in which all the nobles of Egypt united with Joseph. Gen. l. 11. Jerome places it between Jericho and the Jordan, three miles from the former and two from the latter, where Bethagla afterwards stood. Josephus says it was in Hebron, about twenty miles south of Jerusalem, and that Joseph's brethren were buried there.

6. ABEL-SHITTIM was in Moab, about eight miles east of the Jordan, and opposite Jericho. Eusebius says it was in the neighbourhood of mount Peor. Josephus says it was sixty furlongs from Jordan. It is sometimes called Shittim only; Shittim, probably, being the name of the town,—and Abel of the plain on which it stood. Here Moses encamped. Numb. xxv. 1, xxxiii. 49. Here, seduced by Balak, the people fell into idolatry, and worshipped Baal-Peor; for which they were severely punished. Numb. xxv.

ABELA, a city in Peræa, on the Batanæa, in the half tribe of Manasseh, about twelve miles east of Gadara. 2 Sam. xx. 14.

ABELIANS, or ABELONIANS, a sect in the diocese of Hippo in Africa, who professed to regulate marriage after the example of Abel, who, they pretended, was married, but lived in a state of continence. They therefore allowed each man to marry one woman, but enjoined them to live in the same state. To keep up the sect, when a man and woman entered into this society, they adopted a boy and girl, who were to inherit their goods, on condition that they followed the principles of the sect. As might be supposed, a sect originating on principles so false, and opposed to the divine institution of marriage, was not of long continuance. It arose in the reign of Arcadius, and ended in that of Theodosius; but its memory remains among the proofs of human weakness, when affecting to be wiser and purer than the revealed wisdom and purity of the Word of God. The same foolish notions prevail among the Shakers, in North America.

ABEN-BOHAN, the name of a boundary-stone between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, to the east, in a valley leading to the town of Adummim. It derives its name from Bohan, a descendant of Reuben.

ABESTA or AVESTA, the name of one of the sacred books of the Persian Magi, which they ascribe to their great founder Zoroaster, or Zardusht. Though the Zend-Avesta, as it is more frequently called, was undoubtedly the most ancient sacred record of the Persians, it is more properly, in its fundamental principles, a system of philosophy. The system proceeds on the notion of a kind of dualism, or the existence of two original principles equally powerful, the principle of light and of good, which he termed Ormuzd, or Oromasdes, and the principle of darkness and of evil, which he termed Ahriman, or Arimanius. These two he regarded as the principles of all things. For three thousand years was the contest between the two to be carried on, and the lordship of the world divided between them. In the next three thousand years, Ahri-man, the principle of evil, would prevail; but after that his power would be broken, the wicked would disappear from the earth, the dead would rise, and the principle of good would finally be predominant for six thousand years longer, at the end of which period the world would come to an end. The author of this strange philosophical system of religion is generally supposed to have been a Mede by birth, and to have lived about the time of the Babylonian captivity. His system, absurd though it was, maintained its ground for a long period, and had numerous and learned supporters. Though they worshipped fire, they regarded it as simply a representation of the intellectual fire, a supreme deity whom they termed Mithra, and from whom all other beings come forth by a kind of emanation.

ABETTORS, ACCESSARIES, ACCOMPLICES, in criminal cases, such as support another in his designs by connivance, encouragement, or help. In these cases the abettors are universally regarded as involved in the guilt of the principal. Ps. l. 18; Prov. xiii. 20; 2 John 11.

ABEZ, a city mentioned in Joshua xix. 20, and belonging to the tribe of Issachar.

ABGAR, or Abgarus, a name given to several of the kings of Edessa in Syria. None of them are mentioned in the Bible; but one of them, the seventeenth of that name, is alleged by Eusebius to have written a letter to our Saviour, and received an answer from him, both of which may be found in 'Lardner's Works,' and in 'Jones on the Canon,' and in the 'Encyclopædia Britannica.' They are curious documents, as being very ancient forgeries, and although their genuineness has been denied by most writers, it is admitted by Cave and Grabe, and a few others. Eusebius, who translated them from the Syriac, says that they were taken from the archives of the city of Edessa.

ABHOR, to hate, Lev. xxvi. 11, 30; Deut. vii. 26; Rom. xii. 9.

ABHORRED, loathed, Exod. v. 21; Zech. xi. 8; rejected, Lev. xx. 23.

ABI or ABIJAH, the wife of Ahaz, king of Judah, and mother of king Hezekiah. 2 Kings xviii. 2.

ABIA, in the New Testament, is the Greek form of Abijah in the Old.

ABIAH or ABIJAH, the name of one of the twenty-four courses of the priests among the Jews. 2 Chron. xxiv. 10. This was the name also of the second son of Samuel, and by whom he was appointed one of the judges over Israel. Both he and his brother Joel, being partial in their judgments, the indignation of the people was roused, and after a time the elders desired a king.

ABIATHAR, the son of Ahimelech, and the tenth high priest among the Jews, being the fourth in descent from Eli. 2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Chron. xviii. 16. When Saul sent to Nob to murder all the priests, Abiathar escaped the massacre, and fled to David in the wilderness. There he continued in the quality of high priest; but Saul, out of aversion to Ahimelech, whom he imagined to have betrayed his interests, transferred the dignity of the high priesthood from Ithamar's family into that of Eleazer, by conferring this office upon Zadok. Thus there were at the same time two high priests in Israel, Abiathar with David, and Zadok with Saul. In this state things continued until the reign of Solomon, when Abiathar being attached to the party of Adonijah, was by Solomon divested of his priesthood, A.M. 2989; and the race of Zadok alone performed the functions of that office during the reign of Solomon, to the exclusion of the family of Ithamar, according to the word of the Lord to Eli. 1 Sam. ii. 30, &c.

A difficulty occurs in the history of this individual, which is thus satisfactorily explained in 'Horne's Critical Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures':—"A difficulty arises from the circumstance that in 1 Kings ii. 27, Abiathar is said to be deprived of the priest's office by Solomon; while in 2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Chron. xviii. 16, xxiv. 3, 6, 31, Ahimelech, the son of Abiathar, is said to be high priest along with Zadok. The most probable solution is, that both father and son each bore the two names, Ahimelech and Abiathar; as was not at all unusual among the Jews. In this way also we may remove the difficulty arising from Mark ii. 26, where Abiathar is said to have given David the shew-bread, in allusion to 1 Sam. xxi. 1, &c., where it is Ahimelech." This is the opinion of some eminent commentators,—among others, of Kninoel and Heumann.

ABIB, the name of the first month in the Jewish sacred year, and of the seventh in their civil year. Exod. xiii. 4. This month was afterwards called Nisan; it contained thirty days, and answered to part of our March and April. It signifies green ears, and was so named because grain, particularly barley, was in ear at that time. It was an early custom to give names to months from the appearances of nature; and the custom is still in force among many nations. The year among the Jews commenced in September, and consequently their jubilees and other civil matters were regulated in that way, Lev. xxv. 8-10; but their sacred year began in Abib, according to the Divine command, "This shall be to you the beginning of months." Exod. xii. 2. The Feast of the Pass-over was celebrated on the fourteenth day of this month, between the two evenings, or between three and six o'clock.

ABIDAN, the son of Gideoni, prince of the children of Benjamin. He is described, Num. vii. 60, as having presented offerings of different kinds, when Moses set up the tabernacle in the wilderness.

ABIDE. This word in the Scriptures means more than mere passive or temporary residence. It is used for voluntary vital attachment, dependence and adherence, the result of the most intimate and permanent union. Thus John xv. 4, our Saviour says, "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine; so neither can ye, except ye abide in me." See also 2 Tim. ii. 13; 1 John ii. 17, 28; John xv. 4, 10, xiv. 16; but particularly Col. ii. 6, 7. Christians often speak of living near to Christ; the Bible speaks of living IN HIM.—What force is there in this idea!

If this term, then, be used to signify a settled residence, how awful is that passage, John iii. 36: "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God ABIDETH on him." Withering idea! that a human soul should be a home for the residence of the wrath of God!

ABIEL, the father of Kish and grandfather of Saul.

ABIEZER, one of the thirty chiefs in David's army. He is mentioned in 2 Sam. xiii. 27 as an Anethothite, or a native of Anethoth.

ABIGAIL, the wife of Nabal the Carmelite. She is described in Scripture as "a woman of good understanding, and of a beautiful countenance." Her husband, who was a man of wealth, "was churlish and evil in his doings." This unhappy disposition was remarkably manifested on one occasion, and would have been followed by the most serious consequences, had not the superior prudence and sagacity of Abigail averted the threatening calamity. David, when he fled from his relentless enemy, Saul, had taken refuge in the neighbourhood of Nabal's residence. Unwilling to resort to plunder for the support of himself and his followers, he sent a respectful message to Nabal, to entreat his kindness. The message arrived at a time of festivity and rejoicing, and the wealthy churl, probably heated with wine, not only denied the request, but returned a most insulting reply. David, enraged at the conduct of Nabal, both threatened and prepared to destroy him and every male in his family, before the morning. Abigail, hearing of the imprudent and harsh conduct of her husband, and dreading the vengeance of David, took upon herself the task of appeasing his wrath. She succeeded in her attempt, and thus warded off from her house apparently impending ruin. Her husband, meanwhile, engaged in revelling and drunkenness, was utterly insensible to the danger which threatened himself and his family; but when he recovered from his fit of intoxication, and became aware of what had happened, "his heart," we are informed, "died within him, and he became as a stone." Ten days afterwards Nabal was cut off suddenly by the hand of God; and David, probably struck by the remarkable discretion, good sense, and piety which Abigail had shown so recently before, asked and obtained her in marriage, immediately after the days of mourning for her husband were ended. From the date of her marriage to David we learn nothing more of the history of Abigail from the Sacred Scriptures, except that her son is called, in 2 Sam. iii. 3, by the name of Chileab, and in 1 Chron. iii. 1, by that of Daniel. This is probably one example, among many, of the same person bearing two names; a fact which solves several seeming contradictions in the Old and New Testaments.

ABIGAIL, the sister of David, the wife of Jether the Ishmaelite, and mother of Amasa.

ABIHAIL. Several persons bearing this name occur in Scripture. 1. The father of Zuriel, who was the father of the families of Merari, belonging to the tribe of Levi. Numb. iii. 35. 2. The son of Hnri, of the tribe of Gad. 1 Chron. v. 14. 3. The wife of Rehoboam, king of Judah, and the daughter, or rather the descendant of Eliab, the son of Jesse. 2 Chron. xi. 18. 4. The father of Queen Esther, and the uncle of Mordecai. Esther ii. 15.

ABIHU, one of the sons of Aaron, who, with his brother Nadab, was destroyed by fire from God for presuming to offer incense to Him with strange fire, instead of that from the altar of burnt-offering. Lev. x. 1, 2. This awful event occurred only eight days after their consecration; and their sin seems to have been occasioned by wine, which was afterwards forbidden to priests, when about to minister in the sanctuary. A punishment so sudden and severe, was designed to impress all God's ministers with the immense importance of fidelity in discharging the duties of their office; observing his will in every particular, that He may be glorified.—But had it not also a deeper meaning? May it not be regarded as a standing example of that divine wrath which shall consume all who pretend to serve God, except with incense kindled from the one altar and offering by which He for ever perfects them that are sanctified?

ABIJAH. Four persons of this name are found in the Sacred Writings. 1. A son of Jeroboam, the first king of Israel. He was attacked with a dangerous disease, and his mother repaired to Shiloh, for the purpose of consulting Ahijah, as to the issue of the disease. Ahijah assured her that her son would die. "And all Israel," the prophet added, "shall mourn for him, and bury him; for he only, of Jeroboam, shall come to the grave, because in him there is found some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel in the house of Jeroboam." 2. The son of Rehoboam, king of Judah. He succeeded his father, but his reign was only of three years' duration. He is called also Abijam in 1 Kings xv. 1. 3. The wife of Ahaz, and mother of Hezekiah, king of Judah. She is also called Abi in 2 Kings xviii. 2. 4. A descendant of Eleazar, one of the sons of Aaron, and of the twenty-four companies of priests. 1 Chron. xxiv. 10.

ABILA, or ABELA, called by the Greeks Leucadia, that is "white rock town," the capital of Abilene. Luke iii. 1. It was situated in a plain adjacent to the river Chrysorhoas, or Abana. Several medals, still extant, serve to identify its site, and to show that it was a place of considerable magnitude and importance. Two of these are given by Calmet. Some antiquities and inscriptions are mentioned by Pococke as still remaining in the neighbourhood, which confirm the fact of its former consequence. It is now called Bellinas.

ABILENE, a province of Cœlosyria, bounded on the east and west by Libanus and Antilibanus. It derived its name from its chief town, Abila, signifying verdant spot. Lysanias was tetrarch, or governor, of this province in the fifteenth year of the reign of the Emperor Tiberius.

ABILITY, worldly substance. Lev. xxvii. 8; Acts xi. 29. Talents. Dan. i. 4; Matt. xxv. 15.

ABIMELECH, My father the king: from Abi, my father, and Melech, king. It seems to have been the title of the kings of Philistia, as Cæsar was of the Roman emperors, and Pharaoh of the sovereigns of Egypt. Two kings under this name are mentioned in Genesis, one of whom appears to have been the son of the other. Gen. xx. and xxvi. The first of these two was king of Gerar, and contemporary with Abram. While that illustrious patriarch resided in Gerar, he was guilty of deceit and falsehood, in pretending that his wife, Sarah, was his sister. He was afraid that the people of that land would put him to death, that they might obtain possession of his wife, who appears to have been a woman of remarkable beauty. It is worthy of notice, that in attempting, by improper means, to avoid an imaginary evil, he plunged himself into the very calamities which he dreaded. His sin was followed by almost immediate punishment. Sarah was taken from him under the impression that she was not his wife; and had not the Almighty mercifully interposed, she would inevitably have fallen into the hands of the king. Abimelech was warned of God, in a dream, to restore Sarai to her husband, under pain of death. In obedience to the Divine command, he presented gifts to Abram, and restored to him his wife. It has been thought strange, as Calmet remarks, that a miraculous interference should have been necessary to convince him of his criminality in detaining the wife of Abraham ; and equally strange that Abraham could not procure Sarah's release by proper application and request. But such thoughts arise only from ignorance of the customs of the east. Whenever a woman is taken into the harem of an eastern prince, with the design of making her his wife, she is secluded without a possibility of coming out, at least during the life of the prince on the throne. Nor is communication with women in the harem in ordinary cases to be obtained. The late editor of Calmet has given an affecting instance in the case of Colonel Pitt, an officer of the Russian army, whose wife and daughter, both beautiful women, fell into the hands of the Tartars, and were presented to the grand signior at Constantinople. The efforts of the distracted father and husband to procure their release, only resulted in his own imprisonment in a dungeon, with the dreadful assurance that when any of the sex were once taken into the seraglio, they were never suffered to quit it more.—Critical Review, vol. iii. p. 332. This anecdote places the propriety of some exertion of Providence in behalf of Abraham in the strongest light. It seems also to explain the fears of both Abraham and Isaac, arising from the remarkable beauty of Sarah and Rebecca, and tempting them both to use culpable dissimulation.

The name Abimelech seems to have belonged to another king of Gerar, probably a son of the former, and it is remarkable that a similar event to that which we have just noticed appears to have occurred in his reign also. Isaac, like his father Abraham, had left Canaan on account of a famine, and gone to reside in Gerar. While there, he was guilty of resorting to the same artifice as his father had adopted, calling his wife his sister. In this instance, however, Abimelech, who appears to have been a man of greater acuteness than his predecessor, detected the stratagem, and therefore, instead of taking Rebecca from Isaac, he sharply reproved the patriarch for his dissimulation, and issued a proclamation, discharging all his people from doing injury to Isaac or his wife. At length the Lord so prospered the patriarch, that he became so rich as to become an object of jealousy to Abimelech, who dismissed him from the place ; and even when Isaac removed to Beersheba, he pursued him thither, and there they entered into a covenant with each other.

A third person bearing the name of Abimelech was one of the seventy sons of Gideon, a usurper and a murderer. On the death of his father, he went to Shechem, where his mother's family lived, and having contrived to get possession of some money, he hired some profligate abandoned characters to aid him in his schemes ; and by this means he seized upon his brothers, and put them to death. One only escaped, viz., Jotham, the youngest. Imagining that the way to the throne was now open, he had influence sufficient to procure an assembly of the people in the plain of Shechem, at the foot of mount Gerizim, with the view of proclaiming him king. On that occasion, Jotham, having heard of the design, repaired to the spot, and addressed the people,—introducing in his speech the celebrated fable of the trees assembling to choose a king. Judges ix. 8-20. This is the oldest fable on record, and shows with what power the reason and conscience can be addressed through the medium of the imagination. But however appropriate the parable was to the circumstances in which it was spoken, it seems to have failed in its purpose. Jotham was compelled to flee from the face of Abimelech. Only three years from this period had elapsed, when the Shechemites rose in rebellion against Abimelech ; but the cruel usurper was too powerful for them. He razed the city to the ground, and utterly destroyed the people. Flushed with success, he next attacked Thebez, a city about fourteen miles from Shechem. But the guilty career of this wicked man was now destined to close. While attempting to set fire to the door of the tower, a woman threw down a piece of a mill-stone, which fractured his skull. Feeling that death was near, and unwilling to have it said of him that he had died by the hand of a woman, he commanded his armour-bearer to thrust him through the body with his sword. This was accordingly done, and Abimelech died. Thus did the judgments of God follow this aggravated transgressor throughout the whole of his brief course ; and upon him, as well as upon the treacherous Shechemites, came the curse of Jotham, the son of Jerubbaal.

There is still another individual mentioned in the Sacred Writings of the name of Abimelech, who appears to have been a high priest in the reign of David. He is generally thought to be the same with Ahimelech, and he is said, in 1 Chron. xviii. 16, to have been the son of Abiathar. This seems to have been the person that gave the sword of Goliath to David, when he fled from Saul.

ABINADAB. This name frequently occurs in the Old Testament. It was borne by a Levite belonging to the city of Kirjath-jearim, to whose care the ark was committed, after it had been restored by the Philistines. 1 Sam. vii. 1. One of the sons of Saul, who fell with his father at the battle of Gilboa, was called Abinadab ; and also one of the brothers of David. The name occurs, besides, in 1 Kings iv. 11, as applied to one of the principal officers of King Solomon.

ABINOAM, the father of Barak, one of the judges of Israel, and the conqueror of Sisera. Judges iv. 6, v. 1.

ABIRAM, a prince of the tribe of Reuben, who was one of the leaders of the conspiracy against Moses and Aaron in the wilderness. He, along with Korah and Dathan, the other heads of this rebellious movement, was visited by the marked judgments of the Almighty. Numb. xvi.

There is another person of the name of Abiram, who was the eldest son of Hiel the Bethelite, and who was visited with sudden death, because his father had attempted to rebuild the walls of Jericho, contrary to the express prohibition of God, through his servant Joshua,—“Cursed be the man before the Lord, that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho : he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it.” This prophecy was literally fulfilled five hundred and thirty-seven years after it was spoken. 1 Kings xvi. 34 ; Josh. vi. 26.

ABISHAG, the young and beautiful wife of David, selected to nurse him in his old age. After David's death, his son Adonijah demanded her in marriage ; but Solomon, justly supposing that this was only a step towards his assumption of the regal power, refused his solicitation, and punished his treasonable design with death. 1 Kings i. 3, ii. 13-25.

ABISHAI, son of Zeruiah, David's sister, was one of the most valiant men of his time, and a chief general in David's armies. Some of his exploits are mentioned in 2 Sam. xxi. 17, and xxiii. 18. He was brother to Joab and Asahel ; but in his character and services to his uncle the king, he seems to have surpassed them both, and to have been through life David's favourite general and friend. 1 Sam. xxvi. 7-11; 2 Sam. ii. 18, 24, x. 10, xvi. 9, xviii. 2, xx. 6, xxi. 17, xxiii. 18; 1 Chron. xi. 20, 21, xviii. 12, xix. 11, 15.

ABISHALOM, the grandfather of Abijam, one of the kings of Judah. 1 Kings xv. 2.

ABISHUA, the son of Phinehas. He was the fourth in succession who filled the office of high priest among the Hebrews. The Chronicon of Alexandria places him in the days of Ehud, judge of Israel. Judges iii.; 1 Chron. vi. 50. Josephus calls him Abiezer.

ABITAL, the sixth wife of David, and the mother of Shephatiah. 1 Chron. iii. 3.

ABIUD, the son of Zorobabel, and the father of Eliakim mentioned in Matt. i. 13.

ABLUTION, or bathing of the body in water, has been a custom prevalent in all ages, and appears to have its origin in a natural feeling. In hot climates more especially the practice is resorted to for the sake of the refreshment afforded to the surface of the body, and to promote health and cleanliness. But ablution even from the earliest times was also a religious ceremony, intended for the purpose of purification, and to point out the necessity of inward purity in the service of God. There were two kinds of washing among the Jews, one of the whole body by immersion, which was used by the priests at their consecration, and by proselytes at their initiation; the other, which was in daily use, of the hands or feet, and also of the cups and other vessels used at their meals. In the conversation between our Lord and Simon Peter, recorded in John xiii., we find an obvious allusion to both these modes of purification. Nor were ablutions confined to the Jews. The Greeks, Romans, and Egyptians, all practised the same mode of purifying themselves. The early Christians had their ablutions before partaking of the Lord's Supper. On these occasions, before the sacramental elements were distributed, the deacons brought a basin of water, in which the presiding ministers washed their hands in the presence and in name of the whole congregation,—a practice probably derived from the language of the Psalmist, "I will wash mine hands in innocency, and so will I compass thine altar."

ABNER, the son of Ner, uncle to King Saul, and general of his armies. After the death of Saul, he supported Ishbosheth for seven years; but conceiving himself injured by him, he went over to David. He was treacherously slain by Joab under the pretence of his being a spy; but more probably either from jealousy of his influence, or to revenge the death of his brother Asahel. David highly disapproved the conduct of Joab (see JOAB), and composed an elegy on the death of Abner. 2 Sam. ii. iii. —A. M. 2956.

ABOMINATION, or ABOMINABLE. These terms always denote things which are hateful and detestable to the last degree. Gen. xliii. 32; Lev. vii. 18; Deut. vii. 25, 26. They are the strongest terms the language affords. Hence,

1. SIN IN GENERAL, being the reverse of the divine perfections and law, and the object of God's most awful and unchangeable displeasure, is frequently styled AN ABOMINATION. Prov. iii. 32, viii. 7, xvii. 15; Jer. vii. 10, xlv. 22. To be holy as he is holy, we must penitently view it in the same light; and hate, avoid, and oppose it, with the same inflexible constancy. This is in fact the precise sense of the precept, "Let love be without dissimulation: ABHOR THAT WHICH IS EVIL; cleave to that which is good." Rom. xii. 9. That is, the proof of the sincerity of your love, whether to God or man, lies in its being invariably attended with a lively abhorrence of sin, and an ardent attachment to holiness.

2. PARTICULAR SINS are in various passages of scripture stigmatized as ABOMINATIONS. For example, Pride, Prov. xvi. 5; Lawlessness, or a contentious, unteachable, ungovernable spirit, Prov. iii. 32; False doctrine, Rev. xvii. 4; Hypocrisy, Prov. xv. 8, xxi. 27, xxviii. 9; Scorning, Prov. xxiv. 9; False swearing or perjury, Jer. vii. 9, 10; Murder, adultery, and theft, Jer. vii. 9, 10; Falsehood, Prov. xii. 22. Things that are highly esteemed among men, particularly Covetousness, Luke xvi. 14, 15; Idolatry, with all its instruments and appendages, Exod. viii. 26; Deut. xvii. 2-7, xii. 31, xviii. 9-14.

3. VARIOUS FORMS OF PARTICULAR SINS, especially when of a very gross description, are marked out as ABOMINATIONS—as, Offering blemished or deformed sacrifices, Deut. xvii. 1; eating forbidden kinds of food, Lev. xi.; every species of unchastity, Lev. xviii. 29, 30; wearing the dress of the opposite sex, Deut. xxii. 5; a false balance, false weights, and measures, Prov. xi. 1, xx. 10, 23; a proud look, a lying tongue, murderous hands, a heart of wicked imaginations, feet swift to mischief, a false witness, and he that soweth discord among brethren, Prov. vi. 16-19.

4. EMPHASES, or distinctive uses of the term. To "make an abomination," is to make an idol, Deut. xxvii. 15; to "commit abomination," is to practise idolatry, or unnatural crimes, Ezek. xvi. 50; Rev. xxi. 27. "Abominable works," are actions tainted and corrupted by impiety, Ps. xiv. 1. "The abominable," mentioned as a distinct class, Rev. xxi. 8, are probably such as are guilty of unnatural crime; a character mournfully prevalent throughout the heathen world, Rom. i. 26-32; 1 Cor. v. 9-11.

The most usual application of the word in Scripture is to idols, and idolatry. Thus, in Exod. viii. 26, we find Moses declaring, "We shall sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians to the Lord our God."

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. This phrase seems to be used Dan. xi. 31 as a general designation for whatever denotes the triumph of idolatrous power over the sanctuary of God. Its more particular reference, in the New Testament, is to the Roman armies under Titus. Dan. ix. 27, xii. 11, compared with Matt. xxiv. 15. The images of their gods and emperors were delineated on the ensigns themselves, especially the eagles which were carried at the heads of the legions, were objects of worship; and therefore, according to the style of Scripture, an abomination. The horror with which the Jews regarded them, sufficiently appears from two acts mentioned by Josephus—Pilate's attempt to put his troops in winter quarters at Jerusalem, and Vitellius' proposing to march through Judea to attack Aretas, king of Petra. The people supplicated and remonstrated against both, on religious accounts, to such a degree, that Pilate was obliged to remove his army, and Vitellius to march his troops another way. Jerome informs us that the Jews themselves applied Dan. ix. 27 to the Romans. The appearance of their idolatrous banners, therefore, at Jerusalem, was the prophetic sign that "the desolation thereof was nigh." The evangelists Matthew and Mark add to our Lord's prediction in a parenthesis, "Whoso readeth, let him understand ;” hereby intimating that this event was approaching, though yet future when their histories were published, and that the reader who consulted his own safety, would do well to retire seasonably from the devoted city. Matt. xxiv. 15 ; Mark xiii. 14. —In forty years from the time “the Messiah was cut off” by wicked hands, to use the sublime language of Bossuet, “the Roman eagle descended, and Judea was no more !”

ABOUND. The peculiar force of this emphatic word has never yet been sufficiently illustrated. It is generally taken to be equivalent with to increase, or to be full ; but if so, why does so accurate a writer as Paul, in 1 Thess. iii. 12, add the word abound to the word increase, and in Philip. iv. 18, after saying, “I have all,” immediately subjoin, “and abound ?” This use of the word evidently implies, that, in the apostle’s own mind, it conveyed some additional, or stronger idea. What that idea is, may be ascertained by turning to Prov. viii. 24, where the word first occurs, in a connection that clearly unfolds its exact meaning,—“fountains abounding with water.” This peculiarly rich and beautiful idea of the exuberant and overflowing fulness of a fountain, a fulness rising and spreading from deep and inexhaustible springs, is the appropriate meaning of this word, as any one may perceive who will carefully consult all the passages where it occurs in the Bible. In this light, what new force is added to our conceptions of such expressions as the following :—

Rom. v. 20: “Moreover the law entered, that the offence might abound.” This may be taken either positively, or in relation to our conceptions ; since the introduction of clearer light, by the written law, did not only manifest with more distinctness the extent, the power, the criminal nature, pollution, and punishment of sin ; but by encountering the opposition of the human heart, and operating as a test of its sinfulness, did occasion an incalculable increase in the number and aggravations of human transgression. In its light, sin seemed already to have overflowed the whole world, like the waters of the deluge when the fountains of the great deep were broken up,—pervading, filling, overflowing every human heart, lip, and life ; while new obedience to its commands, new violations of its restrictions, new excuses, evasions or blasphemous objections to its threatened penalties, continually rising into existence, swelled yet more and more the appalling and apparently endless flood of guilt and ruin.

“But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound.” Even where the introduction of the written law had charged human guilt with its heaviest aggravations, had so immensely extended men’s conceptions of the universality and evil of sin, and proved its power to be beyond the influence of any light, authority, or sanctions of mere law to repress and subdue ; there the introduction of the Gospel unfolded a depth of contrivance, power, and compassion in the Divine mind, fully and abundantly adequate to the exigencies of the case. He, therefore, though the very chief of sinners, who receives and relies upon the Gospel of Christ, shall find that the grace of God therein revealed, as flowing through the cross, infinitely exceeds his most enlarged conceptions, wants, and desires ; that springing from sources not only apparently, but even absolutely inexhaustible, “the unsearchable riches of Christ,” it overflows, prevails, and triumphs over all his aggravated guilt, corruption, and unworthiness ; not only pardoning, but purifying, not only saving from endless ruin, but exalting to endless joy ! “That as sin had reigned,” under the administration of law, “UNTO DEATH,” even so, under the administration of the Gospel, “might grace reign through righteousness UNTO ETERNAL LIFE, by Jesus Christ our Lord.”

Eph. i. 8: “Wherein he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence.” The apostle here suggests to us that God, in the method of dispensing the riches of his grace, has pursued a course in which his prudence and wisdom appear equally conspicuous as his unfathomable love,—in bestowing his grace on sinners only through a redeeming mediation, lest the law should be dishonoured and made of no effect (Rom. iii. 31) ; in selecting the only fit person to be a Mediator between God and man (John iii. 16 ; 1 Tim. ii. 5) ; in appointing him his proper work, its several offices and periods (Gal. iv. 4, 5 ; Isa. liii. 10–12 ; Heb. iii. 1, 2, viii. 6–12) ; in arranging the circumstances of his incarnation, sufferings, and glory (Isa. xlii. 1–4, lii. 13–15 ; John x. 18, xii. 49, 50, xiv. 31 ; Acts iv. 27, 28) ; in the time, instruments, and manner of publishing the Gospel (Eph. iii. 1–11, iv. 7–16) ; in the measure and ministers of its success, and the glory of its ultimate issues (1 Cor. i. 26–31, iii. 5–9 ; 2 Cor. ii. 12–16 ; Gal. iii. 8 ; 1 John iii. 8 ; Rev. xi. 15, xx. 1–6, xxi. 1–27) ; and lastly, in ordering all the allotments, advantages, afflictions, and deliverances of individual believers, so as to work out their spiritual and everlasting good (Rom. viii. 28–39 ; 1 Cor. iii. 21–23 ; 2 Cor. iv. 15).

Rom. iii. 7: “If the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner ?” In this objection to the doctrine of human responsibility, the truth of God is represented under the image of a perennial and majestic stream, whose depth and force become more visible by means of the obstructions raised against it ; which, however formidable in appearance, it surmounts with the utmost ease, in consequence of its own overflowing fulness. This objection—commonly urged on the admitted fact, that the declarations of God in his Word touching human depravity, are seen to be true, with more abundant evidence in every fresh instance of sin, and especially in the false assumptions of those who deny the Divine testimony—is repelled by the apostle, by appealing to its monstrous consequences. The principle of the objection is, that whatever conduct serves in any way, even by way of contrast, to illustrate the glory of the Divine attributes, cannot be criminal, and worthy of punishment. The apostle says, If such a principle be true (inasmuch as it is certain that the Divine perfections will appear more glorious by opposition to human depravity, and the very lie of him who denies it but confirms the truth of that God who affirms it), then that depravity might be justified and indulged to any extent, under the specious pretext of “doing evil that good might come,”—an abominable maxim, confounding the very distinction between good and evil, scorning every restraint of virtue, sanctioning every crime, and subverting the moral government of God from its foundation. The apostle therefore pronounces the final condemnation of such as adopt it to be just.

Prov. xxix. 22: “A furious man aboundeth in transgression ;” and Matt. xxiv. 12: “Because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold.” In both these passages we may remark the allusion to an overflowing fountain or stream, which breaks over its ordinary limits, and spreads and deepens on every side.

1 Cor. xv. 58: "Always abounding in the works of the Lord." The addition of the word "always," adds to the beautiful idea of this passage the utmost force and magnificence. This, then, is the only scriptural measure, that we be continually rising above measure; not resting in present attainments and usefulness, not satisfied with the standard of our predecessors and contemporaries; but, as circumstances supply opportunity, and experience gives facility, pleasure, and skill, breaking away from the limits of the past, and seeking a wider sphere of action in the future, in the fulness of a heart exuberant with zeal and affection, and "always overflowing in the work of the Lord." Philip. i. 9-11; 1 Thess. iv. 1; 2 Cor. ix. 8.

ABRAHAM. Abram, for such was his original name, was born only two years after the death of Noah, though there were nine generations between them. His parents appear to have been idolaters, and probably he himself continued a stranger to the true God till he was called, when seventy-five years old, to leave his father's house and his native country. In obedience to the Divine command, he departed from Ur of the Chaldees, with his aged parent Terah, his wife Sarai, and Lot, his brother's son, together with all their substance. He was conducted in safety to the promised land; but instead of being put in possession of it, he "had none inheritance, no, not so much as to set his foot on." Palestine was at that time inhabited by the Canaanites, who were idolaters, but Abram maintained his religion, and steadfastly adhered to the worship of the true God. He first settled at Sichem, a valley situated between the mountains of Ebal and Gerizim; thence he removed to a hilly region on the north of Jericho, and at length, in consequence of a famine, he retired into Egypt. After a time he returned to Canaan, and pitched his tent between Bethel and Hai. Here Abram and his nephew Lot agreed to separate from each other, on account of the vast increase of their flocks and herds, and a contention which had arisen between the herdsmen of the two parties. Lot chose the plains of Sodom, and Abram retired to Mamre near Hebron. Some years afterwards, the cities of the plain became the seat of war, and Lot and his family were taken prisoners. No sooner did the intelligence of this calamity reach Abram, than, summoning his numerous attendants, he set out for the rescue of his relative. This, under the Divine protection, he soon accomplished. On his return from this war he was met by a mysterious personage, Melchizedek, king of Salem, supposed to be the city afterwards called Jerusalem. This man, who was not only a king, but a priest of the most high God, blessed the patriarch, and Abram gave him a tithe of the spoil, generously restoring the rest to the king of Sodom.

Abram was designed for very eminent services, and accordingly he was distinguished by a title of high honour, for "he was called the Friend of God." On various occasions, he experienced remarkable visions of the Almighty. It was during one of these seasons of communion that the promise was given him that, though now childless, and Sarai far advanced in years, they should nevertheless have a son, and that the seed of Abram should be as the stars of heaven for multitude; and, it is added, "he believed in the Lord, and it was counted to him for righteousness." Still the fulfilment of the promise was delayed, and Sarai in her impatience proposed to Abram that he should marry Hagar, one of her handmaids, as his secondary wife. To this unhallowed proposal Abram assented, and the fruit of this marriage was Ishmael. Thirteen years after the birth of Ishmael, when Abram was ninety-five years old, and Sarai ninety, the Lord appeared to him again, changed his name to Abraham, the "father of many nations," and renewing the promise of a son, declared its fulfilment to be near at hand. As the sign of the covenant with Abraham and his seed, God instituted the rite of circumcision, to which the patriarch submitted, as "a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had, yet being uncircumcised."

At length Isaac was born, as had been foretold, (B. C. 1897.) The joy of the parents was great, but the happiness of their family was in a little while disturbed by the jealousies and contentions which arose about the children of the different mothers. The result was, that Abraham was reduced to the necessity of dismissing the bondwoman and her son. The patriarch now appeared to be in a settled state of tranquillity. But his trials were not yet ended. When Isaac had reached his twenty-fifth year, Abraham was commanded by God, for the final trial and illustration of his faith, to offer up his only son in sacrifice on Mount Moriah. The trial was painfully severe, but the patriarch proceeded to fulfil the command of God. "Abraham stretched forth his hand and took the knife to slay his son." This was enough. Abraham had been tried, and Isaac was rescued by the Divine interposition. The angel of God called from heaven and declared his approbation of Abraham's conduct. A ram, miraculously provided for the very purpose, was substituted, and presented to God in Isaac's stead.

The sequel of the patriarch's history is soon told. The time at length came when he was called to mourn the loss of Sarah, his beloved wife, who died in Hebron. As a burial-place for her, he purchased the field of Machpelah, with the cave and sepulchre in it. This was the only possession which, during his life, Abraham ever enjoyed in Canaan. It was the first-fruits and earnest of the fulfilment of the promise. In his old age, the patriarch, having made arrangement for the marriage of Isaac, entered himself again into the married state. He married Keturah, by whom he had six sons, who became heads of different people which dwelt in and around Arabia. To each of these he gave a separate portion, but to Isaac he assigned the chief of all his substance. His temporal concerns being settled, Abraham died, aged an hundred and seventy-five years. (B. C. 1822.)

It would no doubt have been very gratifying had it pleased the Spirit of God to record a detailed account of the death-bed experience of this eminent saint, that we might have listened to his closing testimony to the faithfulness of that God who had been his guardian and his guide throughout a long and chequered earthly pilgrimage. It would have been pleasing and profitable to have heard from the lips of the dying patriarch the solemn assurance that while he had lived in faith, he also died in faith, counting Him faithful who had promised. But the simple statement of inspiration concerning the closing scene of faithful Abraham's life is, that "he was gathered to his people." But if we have no particulars of his death, one thing we do know on the highest authority, that he lives in glory; for we find Jehovah declaring, more than three hundred years after to Moses at the burning bush, "I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob;" and our Lord's own comment upon this saying is, "He is not the God of the dead, but of the living;" while in the only parable which has ever drawn aside the veil from the unseen world, Abraham is represented as an inhabitant of heaven. Luke xvi. 22.

It was a noble testimony which Jesus bore to the strength of the patriarch's faith, when He declared concerning him, "Abraham saw my day afar off and was glad." He could pierce through the darkness and the distance of two thousand years, and losing sight of the types, could hold converse by faith with the great Antitype as a living reality upon the earth, walking, preaching, bleeding, dying; and in his case faith was not only the substance of things hoped for, but the evidence or realization of things not seen. No wonder that "he was glad." The Christ, even amid the darkness of that early period, was as clearly present to the eye of his faith, as afterwards to Simeon when he said, "Now let thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM; a figurative mode of describing the happiness of heaven. Luke xvi. 22. The allusion is to a magnificent feast, at which the redeemed, out of every nation, are represented as sitting down in the kingdom of God. Matt. viii. 11; Luke xiii. 29. To be, or lie on one's bosom, refers to the oriental mode of reclining at table, by which the head of one person was necessarily brought almost into the bosom of the one that sat above him, or at the top of the triclinium. In this manner, John, as the disciple whom Jesus loved, is said to have leaned on his bosom. John xiii. 23.

ABRAHAMITES, a sect of heretics, so called from their founder, who, in the eighth century, revived the errors of the Paulicians (which see). Another heretical sect in the ninth century, or more properly, an order of monks, were called Abrahamites. They were exterminated for indulging in idolatrous practices. There was also a modern sect of the same name, which appeared in Bohemia about the middle of the last century. They denied the divine legation of Moses, and only received the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer. They denied the doctrine of Original Sin, the Trinity, and other peculiarities of Gospel truth. For a time this sect was tolerated, but at length they were banished to Transylvania and the Bannat of Temeswar. There are still remains of this sect in Bohemia, but they no longer bear the original name.

ABSALOM, the son of David by Maacah, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur. He was remarkable for his beautiful countenance, his fine head of hair, and handsome figure. One of his brothers, Amnon, having violated his sister Tamar, Absalom sought an opportunity of avenging his sister's wrongs. Two full years elapsed, during which he harboured in his mind the horrid design of murder. At length, inviting the whole of the royal family to a feast at Baal-hazor, he caused Amnon to be assassinated. After the perpetration of this awful crime he fled to Geshur, taking refuge under the roof of his grandfather. Here Absalom remained three years, when, by the intercession of Joab with David, he was permitted to return to Jerusalem; and, in process of time, he was again received into the royal favour. The perfidious youth took advantage of his position at court, to alienate the people from his father, and to ingratiate himself into their affections. As soon as he imagined that his plans had been successful, he unfolded his rebellious design, and caused himself to be proclaimed king at Hebron. The great mass of the people joined the unnatural usurper; and David was, in consequence, obliged to flee from Jerusalem. Absalom marched against David, and crossed the Jordan, with the view of attacking the king. David's forces were headed by Joab. A battle ensued, in which the rebels were signally defeated, and the rebellious Absalom driven from the field. While seeking safety in flight, his hair became entangled in the branches of a tree, and the mule on which he rode left him suspended. Joab, on hearing of what had happened, hastened to the spot, and thrust the rebel through with three darts. Joab's armour-bearers completed the tragedy, smiting him to death, casting his body into a pit, and throwing over it a heap of stones.

Absalom, like many other vain mortals, was ambitious of posthumous fame. At an early period of life, he caused a pillar to be erected in the king's valley for the purpose of perpetuating his name; "for," said he, "I have no son to keep my name in remembrance." 2 Sam. xviii. 18. It seems he either lived to have three sons and a daughter (2 Sam. xiv. 27) after that time, or they were all dead when he erected the pillar, which is not very probable. True glory has been said to consist "in doing what deserves to be written, or in writing what deserves to be read." Absalom's reputation has indeed survived him; and it will continue while time shall last; but if estimated by that standard, it would be difficult to fix upon any recorded action of his life that would stand the test.

ABSOLUTION, a term generally applied to the act of forgiveness of sins, arrogated by the priests of the Church of Rome. They blasphemously assume the power of absolving the penitent from his sins,—not in a merely declaratory way, but absolutely; grounding their right so to remit sin on their possession of the power of the keys, and quoting in their defence the well-known passage, "And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shalt be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." And again, "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." The interpretation which Romanists would put upon these words goes to assign to the priest an authority equal to that of Him who "hath the key of David, who openeth and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth." Now, who can forgive sins, but God only? The apostles preached through Jesus the forgiveness of sins; but we never find them adopting language in any sense similar to that of the Romish priest, in what he terms the form or essence of the sacrament of penance,—"I absolve thee of thy sins." Following up, therefore, the foolish idea of an absolute power on the part of the priest to forgive sins, remission is made to depend on the mere will of the priest,—so that if he be unwilling, God cannot forgive sin! That an act so obviously belonging to Omnipotence, should be made to rest upon the will of any created being, is so contrary to the plainest dictates of common sense, that we can scarcely conceive it possible that such an idea should ever have been seriously entertained: yet it is plainly taught by the Church of Rome; and if any man shall confess his sins to a Romish priest, he solemnly acquits or absolves him from his guilt. How daring the presumption! Weak, fallible man dares to ascend the tribunal of the great Judge of all, and to dispense or to withhold forgiveness at his pleasure. Even the declaratory forms of absolution which occur in the Liturgy of the Anglican Church are highly objectionable, inasmuch as they are liable to convey to the mind of the hearer an impression, that to the Church has been committed a power which belongs to God alone. The Church may, no doubt, bind or loose, in so far as the external privileges of the Church are concerned; and if her actings in this respect be in accordance with the Word of God, she has reason to believe that they are ratified in heaven; but to forgive sins, she has in no sense the power,—except to adopt the language of the apostle, “Through this man” (Jesus) “is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins.”

ABSTEMII, a name given to such persons as could not partake of the cup of the eucharist, on account of their natural aversion to wine.

ABSTINENCE, in a general sense, is the act of refraining from something to which we are accustomed, or in which we find pleasure. It is more particularly used for fasting or forbearing of customary food. Among the Jews, various kinds of abstinence were ordained by their law. Among the primitive Christians, some denied themselves the use of such meats as were prohibited by that law; others looked upon this abstinence with contempt: as to which Paul gives his opinion, Rom. xiv. 1, 3. The council of Jerusalem, which was held by the apostles, enjoined the Christian converts to abstain from meats strangled, from blood, from fornication, and from idolatry, Acts xv. Upon this passage, Dr Doddridge observes, “that though neither things sacrificed to idols, nor the flesh of strangled animals, have, or can have, any moral evil in them, which should make the eating of them absolutely and universally unlawful; yet they were forbidden to the Gentile converts, because the Jews had such an aversion to them, that they could not converse freely with any who used them. This is plainly the reason which James assigns in the very next words, the twenty-first verse, and it is abundantly sufficient. This reason is now ceased, and the obligation to abstain from eating these things ceases with it. But were we in like circumstances again, Christian charity would surely require us to lay ourselves under the same restraint.”

The Roman Catholic Church has introduced another kind of abstinence,—forbidding the use of particular meats at certain times and seasons. In this respect that Church has realized the description given by Timothy of the apostasy of the latter times,—“Commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth. For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving.” Unless, therefore, Christians shall at any time be placed in circumstances similar to those which are contemplated by Dr Doddridge in the above quoted remarks, it is plain that no such abstinence is warranted by the Word of God. Of late years, however, it has been alleged, that, in so far as all spirituous liquors are concerned, the Christian Church has reached a period when she is situated in the precise position contemplated by the apostle when he said, “I will not eat meat while the world standeth, if it make my brother to offend.” And accordingly, proceeding upon this view, Abstinence Societies, binding their members to abstain from spirituous liquors of every kind, have been formed in great numbers throughout a vast part of the world. That these societies have done much good we are far from denying, and we would be far from discountenancing or discouraging any man from following out what he conscientiously believes to be his duty, in the present circumstances of the age in which we live; but it ought never to be forgotten, that in these matters of duty, not binding universally, but only binding in peculiar circumstances, “every man ought to be fully persuaded in his own mind.” No rule can be laid down on the matter applicable to all, because all do not feel the circumstances to be such as warrant the rule. The position, therefore, which any individual Christian occupies, in so far as respects Abstinence Societies, depends altogether on the view which he is led to take of the expediency or in expediency of such a line of acting as these societies require. If, on a careful consideration of the matter, he conceives it to be his duty to abstain, let him abstain; but if his conviction be otherwise, let him not bind himself where conscience tells him he is free. See FASTING—ANIMALS—BLOOD.

ABSTINENTS, a set of heretics that appeared in France and Spain about the end of the third century. They are supposed to have borrowed part of their opinions from the Gnostics and Manichæans, because they opposed marriage, condemned the use of flesh meat, and placed the Holy Ghost in the class of created beings.

ABUMA, a city of Judah, and, according to Josephus, the birth-place of Zebudah, the mother of king Jehoiakim. This place is also called Rumah in 2 Kings xxiii. 36.

ABUNDANCE, an overflowing fulness. In the passage, Rom. v. 17, “They which receive the abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness,” the expression obviously refers to the fulness of grace which is treasured up in Christ Jesus, and out of which the believer is ever drawing, by faith, those supplies of grace which are needful for him. It may also refer to the overflowing riches of Divine grace, which originated the glorious work of man’s redemption, and which pervade every part of that marvellous scheme.

ABUSE, to use things or persons from wrong motives to wrong ends,—in a sinful or dishonourable manner. Judges xix. 25. Children abuse their parents, when, by disobedience of any kind, or by neglecting to support or comfort them, they shorten or embitter their existence. Such as do these things are called “murderers of fathers, and murderers of mothers.” 1 Tim. i. 9. Men abuse the world, when they use the good things of it to dishonour God, and gratify their own lusts, forgetful of eternity. 1 Cor. vii. 31.

ABYSS, or DEEP. This word sometimes in Scripture language denotes the deepest part of the sea, and in the New Testament the regions of the dead, or Hades. In Luke viii. 31, it seems to mean the place of torment. The Hebrew notion, and indeed the notion of many of the Orientals, was that the earth was founded upon the waters, or at least its foundations were on the abyss. Ps. xxiv. 2, cxxxvi. 6. Under the waters, and at the bottom of the abyss, they supposed the place of eternal suffering was situated. In the Book of Revelation, the abyss is used to indicate the place of wicked spirits. "And the fifth angel sounded, and I saw a star fall from heaven unto the earth; and to him was given the key of the bottomless pit. And he opened the bottomless pit; and there arose a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit. And there came out of the smoke locusts upon the earth: and unto them was given power, as the scorpions of the earth have power.—And they had a king over them, which is the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue hath his name Apollyon." Rev. ix. 1-3, 11. (See ABADDON.) "And when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and shall overcome them, and kill them." Rev. xi. 7. "And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled: and after that he must be loosed a little season." Rev. xx. 1-3. The word in these passages is abyss in the original Greek. Macknight thinks that by the abyss of the New Testament is usually meant Hades, the place of departed souls, so called because it was supposed by the Jews to be as far below the surface of the earth as heaven was thought to be above it. In this sense that learned commentator explains the word as it occurs in Rom. x. 7, "Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead.)" But it seems apparent, from the whole scope of the passage, that the apostle is simply availing himself of a proverbial mode of expressing difficulty, nay, impossibility.

ABYSSINIAN CHURCH. Very little is known of the present state of Christianity among the Oriental nations; and for this little we are chiefly indebted to various travellers, who were far from making it an immediate object of research: of course our information on this subject must be attended with some degree of uncertainty. The seven Churches of Asia, existing in the primitive times, appear to have vanished from the page of history, without leaving scarcely a vestige behind; and nothing remains in their place but the various mutilated forms of Christianity.

Abyssinia, or Ethiopia Superior, is an ancient kingdom of Africa, whose inhabitants are supposed to have received the Gospel from the Ethiopian eunuch, or prime minister of their queen, Candace, though their general conversion was not effected before the middle of the fourth century. Their emperor, who is nominally a Christian, exercises a kind of supremacy in ecclesiastical matters, and confers all benefices, except that of their chief prelate.

The Abyssinians boast themselves as being of Jewish extraction, and assume to imitate the service of the tabernacle and temple of Jerusalem; so that their doctrines and ritual form a strange compound of Judaism, Christianity, and superstition. They practise circumcision, and are said to extend the ceremony to females as well as males. They observe both the first and the seventh day as a Sabbath, and eat no meats prohibited by the law of Moses. They take off their shoes before they enter their churches, and sit on the bare floor. Their worship is said wholly to consist in reading the Scriptures, administering the eucharist, and hearing some homilies of the fathers. They read the whole of the four Gospels every year in their churches, beginning with Matthew, and proceeding to the rest in their order; and when they speak of any event, they say, "It happened in the days of Matthew;" that is, while they were reading Matthew's Gospel in their churches. They observe four fasts in a year with much severity; and on their grand festivals they begin their music and dancing before day-light, in imitation of David, who danced before the ark. They pray for the dead, have a great veneration for the Virgin Mary, invoke saints and angels, and have at least as many miracles and legends of saints as the Church of Rome.

The supreme ruler of the Abyssinian Church is a bishop, styled Abnna, who receives his appointment from the patriarch of Alexandria; but the inferior clergy are appointed by the emperor. The primate has an order of men under him, whom they style Kymos, or Hegumenos. Every parochial church has one of these, who is a kind of arch-priest, and has all the inferior priests and deacons, as well as the secular affairs of the parish, under his care and government. The office of the inferior priests is to supply that of the kymos in their absence, and to assist them in the public service. They have another order of ecclesiastics, called Debtaris, who are a kind of Jewish Levites or chanters, and assist at the public offices of the church. All these orders are allowed to marry, even after they have been ordained priests; and, which is more singular, even some of their religious orders or monks, who are numerous, are allowed the same privilege; but those who observe celibacy are commonly held in greater esteem.

The distinguishing doctrine of the Abyssinian Church relates to the person of Christ. They maintain that the divine and human nature are united in him, without either confusion or mixture; yet though the nature of Christ is really one, it is at the same time twofold and compound. They disown the pope's supremacy, and transubstantiation, though they believe the real presence of Christ in the sacrament. They believe in a middle state, in which departed souls must be purged from their sins; use confession, and receive penance and absolution from the priests.

Various attempts have been made to bring this Church under the Papal yoke, but without success. The Portuguese having opened a passage into Abyssinia in the fifteenth century, an emissary was sent to extend the influence and authority of the Roman pontiff, clothed with the title of the Patriarch of the Abyssinians. The same important commission was afterwards given to several Jesuits, when some circumstances seemed to promise them a successful and happy ministry; but the Abyssinians stood so firm to the faith of their ancestors, that towards the end of the sixteenth century the Jesuits had lost nearly all hope in that quarter.

About the beginning of the seventeenth century, the Portuguese Jesuits renewed the mission to Abyssinia, when the emperor created one of them patriarch; and not only swore allegiance to the Roman pontiff, but also obliged his subjects to forsake the rites and tenets of their ancestors, and to embrace the doctrine and worship of the Romish Church. At length the emperor became so exasperated at the violent proceedings of the patriarch, in subverting the established customs of the empire, for the purpose of confirming the pope's authority, especially in imposing celibacy on some, and requiring divorce of others who had married more than one wife, that he annulled the orders formerly given in favour of Popery, banished the missionaries from his dominions, and treated with the utmost severity all who had any connection with the undertaking. From this period the very name of Rome, its religion, and its pontiff, have all along been objects of peculiar aversion among the Abyssinians; and so lately as about the middle of the last century, the edict prohibiting all Europeans to enter into Ethiopia was still in force, and executed with the greatest rigour. The present state of the Church of Abyssinia, however, is such, that little besides the name of Christianity is to be found among them. Their religion is a motley collection of traditions, tenets, and ceremonies, derived partly from Judaism and partly from Christianity, in its most corrupted form. In their ritual of worship the former seems to predominate; but, like the Roman Catholics, they have festivals and saints innumerable. One day is dedicated to Balaam's ass; another to Pontius Pilate and his wife,—to Pilate, because he washed his hands before he pronounced sentence on Christ,—to his lady, because she warned him to have nothing to do with the blood of that just person. In legends and miracles, too, they are scarcely inferior to the Church of Rome; and, upon the whole, it may truly be affirmed, that the religion of the Abyssinians is a monstrous compound of superstitions, unworthily dignified with the name of Christianity.

ACACIANS, a sect of heretics in the fourth century; so named from Acacius, bishop of Cæsarea, who denied the Son to be of the same substance with the Father, though some of them allowed that he was of a similar substance. Also, the name of another sect, named after Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople in the fifth century, who favoured the opinions of Eutychus. See EUTYCHIANS.

ACADEMICS, a name given to those philosophers who sprung from the school of Plato. They received this name, apparently, from Academia, a grove near Athens, favourable, from its retirement, to philosophical contemplation. There were three schools to which the appellation "Academics" was applied,—the first, the middle, and the new. The first Academics taught the doctrines of Plato nearly in their original purity, as they had received them from the mouth of the philosopher himself. Their system, accordingly, was founded on his esoteric, or secret doctrine; while the systems of the middle and new Academics were more removed from the real opinions of Plato, being founded on his popular, or exoteric doctrine. We shall give a brief sketch of each of these three schools in succession.

The first, or ancient Academics, held the real opinions of their founder, Plato. The system of this eminent philosopher is, on many accounts, not so easily explained as many of the other philosophical systems of Ancient Greece. It was, however, one of the most beautifully connected and consistent systems that the mind of man has ever framed.

The final object and distinctive character of philosophy, in the opinion of Plato, is this: For all that exists conditionally, to find a ground that is unconditional and absolute, and thereby to reduce the aggregate of human knowledge to a system. The first enunciation of such a problem indicated, on the part of this philosopher, a marvellous reach and comprehensiveness of intellect; and the successive steps by which he attempted its solution were worthy of the same gigantic mind. Psychology, or an investigation into the nature, the faculties, and the operations of the thinking principle, was, in his opinion, the natural introduction to philosophy. In opposition to the mere physical principle of life and motion, man is obviously endowed with a spiritual principle, or Mind,—the principle of sensibility and thought. The two great faculties which Mind exercises are Perception and Thought; the one being an exercise of the mind originating in, and dependent on, an impression from without,—the other being a spontaneous exercise of mind itself. The thinking principle may be considered as consisting of understanding and reason. What characterises particularly the thinking faculty, is the power of judging,—of concluding and of uniting ideas. The understanding is strictly connected with sensation; the senses present the materials,—the understanding operates upon them. The objects of thought are images, notions, and ideas; the first belonging to the senses,—the second, to the understanding,—the third, to the reason. The senses exhibit to us individual objects;—the understanding compares and combines them, enabling us to form general notions.

In all this, however, there is nothing peculiar to Plato. The distinctive characteristics of his philosophy were rather to be found in his Doctrine of Ideas. According to the system of Plato, ideas are the eternal copies or types of things as existing in the Divine Mind. They form the essence of things; but they are free from all conditions of space and time, as well as from sensible form. They compose the intelligible world, ever present to the Divine Mind; but they must not be confounded with the Divine Mind itself. They are general notions of the highest order,—they are the true universals of things. They are communicated to the mind of man immediately by God himself, and thus they are innate,—not derived from man's own experience. The philosophy which this eminent thinker taught was a system of lofty idealism. Plato's views were many of them sublime and pure; so much so, that surely he must have been acquainted with the Sacred Scriptures. Josephus, in his desire to exalt his countrymen, alleges that Plato and the other Greek philosophers derived their whole philosophy from the Jews. The idea savours more of national vanity than of a sound judgment. In the early ages of Christianity, Plato's doctrines were no doubt much admired; but that he had ever drawn any of his opinions from the Bible, is in the highest degree improbable. The Bible was, in his days, limited entirely to the Jews themselves, not having been translated even into the Greek language till a later period. It is impossible, however, to shut our eyes to the fact, that the high admiration entertained for this eminent man led to the adoption of expressions, in the first ages of Christianity, which are obviously borrowed from his philosophical system. This is remarkably the case with what is termed the Logos, or Word. (See WORD.) This term, which seems to have been used by Plato to denote an intelligent nature which existed before the creation of the world, is employed by the Apostle John in speaking of Jesus Christ: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." The idea, also, which the Jews held as to the pre-existence of men in another state, before they came into this world, and which is obviously conveyed in the question put to our Lord on one occasion: "Did this man sin, or his parents, that he was born blind?" is identical with an opinion entertained by Plato. Several of the Jewish sects, indeed, particularly the Essenes, held various tenets akin to those of the same philosopher. His influence may be discerned in many of the views held by the Jews, and in some of the expressions employed even by the Christians.

ACCAD, one of the four cities built by Nimrod, the founder of the Assyrian empire. Gen. x. 10. By the Septuagint the word is written Archad. It was contemporary with Babylon, and was one of the first four great cities of the world. Jerome and others say it is the same as Nisibis; and the Targums read it Nisibin. It is not mentioned under its ancient name by any profane author; but modern travellers inform us, that about six miles from Bagdad is a gigantic pile of ruins, called by the Arabs and Turks the Hill of Nimrod, in which the materials and style of building are so perfectly similar to those of ancient Babylon, as to make it certain that here was the site of one of the four cities built by Nimrod. It was not Babylon,—it was not Erech,—it was not Calneh,—the unavoidable inference is, that it was Accad; an inference strengthened by the name of the place, Akarkouff; especially when it is recollected that the Syrian name for Accad was Achar. Dr Wells supposes that some faint traces of the name are to be found in that of a small river called Argades, which flows near Sittace, a town situated at some distance from the Tigris.

ACCEPT, ACCEPTABLE, ACCEPTED. To accept is not only to receive, but to receive with pleasure and kindness. Gen. xxxii. 20. It stands opposed to reject, which is a direct mode of refusal, and implies a positive sentiment of disapprobation. Jer. vi. 30, vii. 29. To receiue, says Crabbe, is an act of right,—we receive what is our own; to accept, is an act of courtesy,—we accept what is offered by another. Hence, "an acceptable time," or "accepted time" (Psal. lxxix. 13; 2 Cor. vi. 2), signifies a favourable opportunity, a time when acceptance is granted, and favours are bestowed.

ACCEPTANCE WITH GOD. A very important point of Christian doctrine.

It is to be observed, then, that the sole ground of a sinner's acceptance with God is not to be found in any good works, whether viewed as wrought in him or by him, but in the infinitely meritorious and accepted work of the Redeemer. That the original mode of acceptance was by man's personal obedience to the law cannot be denied; so that even now, "if there had been a law which could have given righteousness, verily righteousness should have been by the law." But no such law any longer exists. Insecure, however, and inevitably ruinous though the law must now prove, as a ground of hope towards God, it is remarkable with what tenacity man cleaves to the original and now obsolete mode of acceptance. This partiality in favour of salvation by the law was not more conspicuous among the Jews of old, than it is among professing Christians of every age. The very prevalence of such an error, however much to be lamented, shows that its foundation is deeply laid in the principles of the human constitution. And yet the declarations of Scripture are sufficiently explicit as to the mode of acceptance. The law hath exhausted its demands upon Christ, our Surety, and therefore it no longer possesses the power of communicating life or death to the believer. They who are in Christ are no longer under the law, as a covenant promising life or threatening death; but they are one with Him who hath fulfilled the whole law, that they might be accepted as righteous in the sight of God. The righteousness of the law is fulfilled in them, and, consistently with the principles of the Divine government, no further claims can be urged against them. They are complete in Christ,—their persons are accepted, and their natures renewed. They are, therefore, no longer strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens of the saints and of the household of God.

ACCENSORII, or LIGHTERS, a name given to the ancient Acolouthi, because they lighted the candles in the churches.

ACCESS, the privilege of approaching a superior with freedom. It is thus distinguished by Crabbe from admittance:—"We have admittance where we enter; we have access to him whom we address. There can be no access where there is no admittance; but there may be admittance without access. Servants or officers may grant us admittance into the palaces of princes; the favourites of princes only have access to their persons."

In Scripture this important word occurs but three times, and always in connection with our reconciliation to God through Christ. In Rom. v. 2, where it first occurs, it signifies our introduction into a state of settled friendship with God; a state in which we are permitted to enjoy the freest intercourse and communion with him, and can rejoice in hope of his eternal glory, through his Son as our Mediator: "IN WHOM," says the apostle, in that exquisite passage, Eph. iii. 12, "WE HAVE BOLDNESS AND ACCESS WITH CONFIDENCE BY THE FAITH OF HIM."

Under the law, the high priest alone had access to the Divine presence within the mysterious veil of the holy of holies; but when, at the death of Christ, the veil of the temple was rent in twain, it was declared that a new and living way of access was laid open to every true worshipper. By his death, also, the middle wall of partition was broken down, and God became equally accessible to Gentile and to Jew; whereas before, the Gentiles had no nearer access in the temple worship than to the gate of the court of Israel. Thus the grace and privileges of the Gospel are alike bestowed on true believers of all nations.

The Apostle Paul, in one short but comprehensive verse, not only explains this most fully, but at the same time shows how, in the economy of redemption, each glorious person of the Godhead executes a harmonious part in this most sweet and gracious transaction: "FOR THROUGH HIM (the Son of God) WE (Jewish and Gentile believers) BOTH HAVE ACCESS BY ONE SPIRIT UNTO THE FATHER." Eph. ii. 18. Here we see, in the clearest manner, how fundamental to the Christian faith is the view which it reveals to us of the Sacred Trinity; since it is only by the guidance of the Holy Spirit, through the mediation of the Son, that we are enabled to approach the Father, seated on the throne of grace. And it behoves us further to remark the blessedness of this access to God; for we are not simply introduced by Christ, but beheld and accepted also in Christ. He is our peace,—the author both of our access and acceptance; for, to the praise of the glory of his grace, God hath made us "ACCEPTED IN THE BELOVED." Eph. i. 6; 1 Pet. iii. 18. And those words of our Lord cannot be too well remembered: "I am the way, the truth, and the life; NO MAN COMETH UNTO THE FATHER, BUT BY ME." John xiv. 6.

ACCHO, a seaport of Palestine (Judges i. 31), called afterwards Ptolemais (Acts xxi. 7), from the first of the Ptolemies, who enlarged and beautified it. By the Arabs it is still called Akko. Its site enjoys, says Dr Wells, all possible advantage by sea and land. It is situated on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, about twenty-seven miles south of Tyre, on the north angle of a bay to which it gives its name, and which extends in a semicircle of three leagues, as far as the point of mount Carmel. The town was originally surrounded by triple walls, and a fosse, or ditch. On the north and east was a spacious and fertile plain; on the south and west sides it was washed by the sea; and Pococke thinks that the river Belus, which flows from Carmel into the Mediterranean, was brought through the fosse, which ran along the ramparts on the north,—thus making the city an island.

In the first partition of the Holy Land under Joshua, Accho belonged to the tribe of Asher; but it proved to be one of the places out of which the Israelites could not drive the primitive inhabitants. Accho, and all beyond it northwards, was considered as the heathen laud of the Jews. When Syria was subjected by the Romans, it was made a colony by the emperor Claudius.

Mr Taylor has collected several medals of Accho, or Ptolemais. Those bearing its Phenician name, Ok, or Akko, have dates of the era of Alexander; whence it may be inferred that it received favours from that prince,—probably at the time he was detained in Syria by the siege of Tyre. From others, it appears that the city assumed the privilege of asylum and of sanctity, and that it possessed a temple of Diana. Establishments for the purposes of commerce seem also to have been formed here by merchants from Antioch; not unlike the English factories in Smyrna, and other cities of the East, at the present. There was also a bath of Venus here, of great antiquity.

Such was Ptolemais in the days of the apostles. Christianity was planted here at an early period, and here Paul visited the saints in his way to Jerusalem. Acts xxi. 7.

This city, now called Acre, which, from the convenience of its port, is one of the most considerable on the Syrian coast, was during almost three centuries (A.D. 1000 to A.D. 1290) the principal theatre of the holy wars, and the frequent scene of the perfidies and treacheries of the crusaders. By them it was named Acre, or St John of Acre, from a magnificent church which was built within its walls, and dedicated to St John. It was the last fortified place wrested from them by the Turks; who, exasperated by the length of the siege, wreaked a dreadful vengeance in its desolation and ruin.

From this fatal overthrow it has never, under the government of the Turks, been able fully to recover; though, since the time of its memorable siege by Buonaparte, in 1799, it has been considerably improved and strengthened, and, until recently, was considered the strongest place in Palestine. Vast ruins of churches, palaces, monasteries, forts, &c., might be seen extending more than half a mile in length; in all which, says Dr Wells, you may discern such marks of strength, as if every building in the city had been contrived for war and defence. This fine city, however, containing about ten thousand inhabitants, has been nearly reduced to ruins by the British, under Commodore Napier, in the late war in Syria. The troops of Ibrahim having entrenched themselves in Acre, as, in their opinion, an impregnable fortress, they were defeated, and the city almost entirely destroyed.

ACCLAMATIONS (Ecclesiastical) were shouts of joy by which the people in ancient times expressed their approbation of their preachers. Contrary to the quietness and order which decency demands in a Christian assembly, it would appear that in the fourth century it became an extensive custom for hearers, in imitation of the pagan theatre, to show their approval of the preacher by tumultuous applauses, such as stamping of feet, clapping of hands, waving of handkerchiefs, and loud acclamations. Thus the hearers of Cyril cried out in the midst of the sermon, "Orthodox Cyril!" And Chrysostom's in another case exclaimed, "Thou art the thirteenth apostle!" These applauses were in many cases mere matter of form, and were uttered without any intelligent apprehension of what the preacher had delivered. Thus, in one instance, Augustine reproved his hearers for interrupting him in the commencement of his sermon with their loud acclamations, when he had scarcely uttered a single sentiment. But many preachers encouraged these disorders from motives of vainglory. It is well that in modern times audible acclamations are no longer resorted to in our Churches. The best mode of appreciating the discourses of a faithful minister is, by receiving with meekness the engrafted word which is able to save our souls.

ACCOMMODATION; the application of one thing to another by analogy, in consequence of a resemblance real or supposed between them. In the interpretation of Scripture this principle has been often resorted to, when a more direct method of investigation is found to be impracticable. Thus it forms the groundwork of the indirect fulfilment of prophecy, as when passages that originally referred to one event, are quoted as if they referred to another, to which some resemblance may be traced. This mode of interpreting Scripture requires the greatest caution and judgment in its exercise. It is liable to much abuse; and in the hands of some of the German divines has been attended with the most dangerous consequences. There is a sense in which it may be admitted, that the New Testament writers have accommodated passages from the Jewish Scriptures to a meaning somewhat different from that which was primarily attached to them. In these cases, however, they are used simply as the words of the person who quotes them, not as arguments in support of doctrines, or in proof of the fulfilment of a prophecy. Thus, in Rom. x. 18, we find the Apostle Paul quoting from the 19th Psalm, an expression which, though obviously used by David as applied to the works of creation, is accommodated by the apostle to the truths of God's revealed Word,—“their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world.” Here the words are simply quoted by way of convenience, to express a truth which, while it applied to the works of creation, was equally applicable to the written Revelation. It must never for a moment be imagined, that when quotations from the Old Testament are brought forward by the New Testament writers in proof of a doctrine, they are simply accommodations. This were to shake our confidence in the inspiration of the evangelists and apostles. It would imply either that they were ignorant of the primary meaning of the passages which they quoted, or that they wilfully perverted them to serve a purpose. Neither supposition is in the slightest degree warranted by an examination of the quotations referred to. Occasionally they are merely Old Testament expressions, adopted by the writer to express his own thoughts. But wherever they are introduced with such a formula as, "Thus was fulfilled," or, "This was done that it might be fulfilled," or even without any such formal introduction, if they are adduced as arguments in proof of some doctrine, the very circumstance of their being so quoted fixes the real meaning of the passage adduced.

In the writings of some theological authors, passages of Scripture are accommodated to suit the purposes of the writer, and thus the reader is in danger of being deceived by the delusive idea that opinions are countenanced by the Word of God, which are opposed to the whole spirit and genius of the Bible. This is remarkably the case with the writings of many heretics, and more especially of Dr Taylor of Norwich, who, by a display of quotations from Scripture, gives an appearance of truth to the most false and perverted opinions.

ACCORD, the consent of different parts to one result. The word is borrowed from music, and literally denotes the tuning together of the strings of an instrument, to produce a "concord of sweet sounds." Thus, when all the desires and emotions of the soul harmonize in one purpose, without foreign inducements, a man is said to act of his own accord. 2 Cor. viii. 17. Whatever moves without the application of external or visible force, is hence said to move of its own accord. Acts xii. 10. The Christian Church at Jerusalem is said to have been "of one accord;" that is, the different members, amidst all the variety of age, sex, endowments, &c., were actuated by the same spirit, and brought into a most perfect and delightful harmony of judgment, views, aims, and affections. Acts i. 14, ii. 46, v. 12.

ACCOUNTABILITY, the obligation under which every man lies of giving an account of himself to God, in order to future retribution. Rom. xiv. 12; 2 Cor. v. 10. See RESPONSIBILITY.

ACCUBATION, or reclining, which was the usual posture at table among the Orientals. This custom seems to have prevailed in Persia at a very remote period. As practised in the time of our Lord, it is thus explained by Professor Paxton, in his 'Illustrations of Scripture':—"Each guest inclined the superior part of his body upon his left arm, the lower part being stretched out at length, or a little bent; his head was raised up, and his back sometimes supported with pillows. If several persons lay upon the same bed, then the first lay on the uppermost part, with his legs stretched out behind the second person's back; the second person's head lay below the bosom of the former, his feet being placed behind the third person's back; and the rest in like manner: for though it was accounted mean or sordid at Rome to place more than three or four upon one bed, yet, as we are informed by Cicero, the Greeks used to crowd five, and often a greater number, into the same couch. Persons beloved commonly lay in the bosoms of those that loved them. And for the same reason, according to the well-known custom, the beloved disciple lay in the bosom of his Lord, at the celebration of the passover. The head of the second being opposite to the bosom of the first, if he wanted to speak to him, especially if the thing was to be secret, he was obliged to lean upon his bosom: thus the Apostle John, wishing to speak secretly to his Lord, leaned from necessity upon his bosom. In conversation, those who spoke raised themselves almost upright, supported by cushions. When they ate, they raised themselves on their elbow, and made use of the right hand; which is the reason our Lord mentions the hand of Judas in the singular number:—"He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me."

ACCURSED; the word in Hebrew is CHEREM, in Greek ANATHEMA, and always denotes, in Scripture, something devoted: but generally, things devoted to destruction. "Among the ancients," says Jones, "whatever was idolatrous was a CHEREM, that is, it was 'devoted to destruction.' Not only were idols themselves an abomination to the Lord, but whatever had been employed in idolatrous worship became so detestable to the Divine Majesty, that he would not have it converted to any ordinary or common use; even the silver and the gold which had belonged to idols, the Jews were not permitted to bring into their houses, or convert to any private purpose. It was to be regarded as a cursed thing, Deut. vii. 26, which no person might meddle with, ch. xiii. 17; if he did, he himself became a cursed thing, that is, he became devoted to destruction. This was exemplified in the case of Achan, who took a wedge of gold, and a Babylonish garment, to his own private use, when it had been made accursed (cherem) by express Divine command; on which account he was stoned to death. Compare Josh. vi. 17, 18, with ch. vii. 21-26. The cities of king Arad, the seven nations of Canaan, and the sacrifices of idols, were accursed. Num. xxi. 2, 3; Deut. vii. 2, 26. This sufficiently explains the general acceptation of the term. There is, however, an exception to it, which must be noticed. The Hebrew word cherem is sometimes used to denote any sacred gift, which was devoted to God or to holy purposes, as in Lev. xxvii. 28: 'No devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the Lord of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing (cherem) is most holy unto the Lord.' Again, we find that although the city of Jericho was a cherem (devoted to destruction), Josh. vi. 17, yet the metals in it were a cherem, that is, sacred to the Lord, and set apart to holy purposes. Let it be remembered, however, that this use of the word is very rare, and forms an exception to its general signification."

The cherem formed in later times, according to the rabbinical writers, the second degree of excommunication among the Jews,—that by which the excommunicated party was delivered over to Satan, devoting him by a solemn curse. It is to this that the Apostle Paul is supposed to allude, when he wishes that he were accursed for his brethren's sake; that is, he would rather be excommunicated, laden with curses, and suffer all the miseries consequent on the infliction of this punishment, if it could have been of any service to his brethren, the Jews. The word cherem signifies to cut off, and therefore refers, in all probability, to that separation from the body of believers which excommunication implied, and which went so far as to prohibit from eating with the party against whom the curse was pronounced. See ANATHEMA MARANATHA—CURSE.

ACCUSE, to charge with a crime (Dan. iii. 8) in a formal or solemn manner. The word literally signifies to bring to trial. An accusation is made for the sake of ascertaining the fact, or bringing to punishment. Luke xix. 8; 1 Tim. v. 19. Men's thoughts accuse them when their conscience charges their sins on them, and fills them with pain, shame, and fear, on account thereof. Rom. ii. 15. Moses accused the Jews in Christ's time; his law pointed out and condemned them for their transgressions, and for their unbelief in the promised Messiah. John v. 45.

ACCUSED. It was customary among the Jews for the accused person to stand when on his trial, more especially during the examination of the witnesses. The station assigned him was an elevated place in the court, that he might be seen by all, and at the same time might himself hear all the proceedings in his case. This explains the remark made by the Evangelist Matthew concerning the posture of our Lord on his trial: "And he stood before the governor." And it is also said of Naboth, ages before, that he was "set on high among the people."

ACCUSER. It was a common practice, during public trials among the Jews, for the accusers as well as the witnesses to stand when they stated the accusation, or gave their testimony. It is obviously to this custom of the accusers rising from their seats during the reading of the indictment, that allusion is made by our Lord, when he declares, "The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it." Matt. xii. 42. Following the same invariable practice, the Jews who accused the Apostle Paul at the bar of Festus, the Roman governor, "stood round about." The appearance of the accused on his trial is thus stated by Paxton, in his 'Illustrations of Scripture':—"It was usual, especially among the Romans, when a man was charged with a capital crime, and during his arraignment, to let down his hair, suffer his beard to grow long, to wear filthy ragged garments, and appear in a very dirty and sordid habit; on account of which he was called sordidatus. When the person accused was brought into court to be tried, even his near relations, friends, and acquaintances, before the court voted, appeared with dishevelled hair, and clothed with garments foul and out of fashion, weeping, crying, and deprecating punishment. The accused sometimes appeared before the judges clothed in black, and his head covered with dust. In allusion to this ancient custom, the prophet Zechariah represents Joshua, the high priest, when he appeared before the Lord, and Satan stood at his right hand to accuse him, as clothed with filthy garments. Zech. iii. 3. After the cause was carefully examined, and all parties impartially heard, the public crier, by command of the presiding magistrate, ordered the judges to bring in their verdict. The most ancient way of giving sentence was by white and black sea shells, or pebbles. 'It was a custom among the ancients to give their votes by white or black stones; with these they condemned the guilty,—with those acquitted the innocent.' In allusion to this ancient custom, our Lord promises to give the spiritual conqueror a 'white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it' (Rev. ii. 17); the white stone of absolution or approbation, and, inseparably connected with it, a new name of dignity and honour, even that of a child of God and heir of glory, which is known only to himself, or the inhabitants of that world to which he shall be admitted, and who have already received it.—When sentence of condemnation was pronounced, if the case was capital, the witnesses put their hands on the head of the criminal, and said, 'Thy blood be upon thine own head.' To this custom the Jews alluded, when they cried out at the trial of Christ, 'His blood be on us, and on our children.' Then was the malefactor led to execution, and none were allowed openly to lament his misfortune. His hands were secured with cords, and his feet with fetters; a custom which furnished David with an affecting allusion, in his lamentation over the dust of Abner,—'Thy hands were not bound, nor thy feet put in fetters.' "

ACCUSER OF THE BRETHREN, a title given to Satan in Rev. xii. 10, because he, without ceasing, in every age, accuses the saints of manifold crimes towards God, mankind, and their own consciences.

ACELDAMA, a piece of ground said to have lain on the south of Jerusalem, just north of the rivulet Shiloah. It is said to have been the same with the fuller's field, where they whitened their cloth. Isa. vii. 3. It is certain it was the potter's field, whence they digged their materials. Its soil being quite exhausted by them, it was of very small value. When Judas brought back the thirty pieces of silver which he had gotten for betraying his Master, the high priest and rulers pretended that it was not lawful to cast it into the sacred treasury, as it was the price of blood, and purchased with it this field, to bury strangers in; and so it came to be called Aceldama, or Hokeldama, the field of blood. Zech. xi. 12, 13; Matt. xxvii. 8; Acts i. 19. Travellers assure us that it is now covered with an arched roof, in form of a crypt, and will consume a corpse in two or three days. Maundrell, however, says that this grave does not make that quick dispatch with the corpses committed to it which is commonly reported. The Armenian Christians have the control of the burying-place, and also of a magnificent convent on mount Zion. "It is still," says Dr Clarke, "as it ever was, a place of burial, and its appearance maintains the truth of the tradition which points it out as the Aceldama of Scripture." The following account of this remarkable spot is given by the Deputation to Palestine from the Scottish Church in 1839:—"Descending gradually towards the eastern side of the ridge, we came to the spot pointed out as Aceldama, 'the field of blood,' the field bought with the thirty pieces of silver, and 'known to all the dwellers at Jerusalem.' Matt. xxvii. 7, 8; Acts i. 19. It lies opposite the south-east corner of mount Zion. A charnel-house, or square chamber sunk in the earth, is still shown here, and some of the cells have been lately opened; but we found no traces of that peculiar kind of earth said to have been found here, which had the property of causing dead bodies to decay within four-and-twenty hours. A recent traveller, W. R. Wilde, a medical gentleman, visited a sepulchre lately opened here, when he found the skulls to belong, not to Jews, but to individuals of different nations. He gives this fact on personal examination, as affording proof that this is 'the field to bury strangers in.' The only abatement of this interesting evidence, is the possibility or these having been buried in it at a period later than the Jewish kingdom existed. A particular tree is pointed out as the tree on which Judas hanged himself;—a mere tradition, or rather a barefaced invention, but interesting, as showing that to this day the awful doom of the Son of Perdition is not forgotten by the dwellers in Jerusalem."

ACEPHALI or ACEPHALITAE; such bishops as were exempt from the discipline and jurisdiction of their ordinary bishop or patriarch. It was also the denomination of certain sects: 1. Of those who, in the affair of the council of Ephesus, refused to follow either Cyril or John of Antioch; 2. Of certain heretics in the fifth century, who at first followed Peter Mongus, but afterwards abandoned him, upon his subscribing to the council of Chalcedon, they themselves adhering to the Eutychian heresy; and 3. Of the followers of Severus of Antioch, and of all, in general, who held out against the council of Chalcedon.

ACHAIA, a province of ancient Greece. In the age of the apostles it was a Roman province, and Gallio happened to be the deputy or proconsul when Paul travelled through it. In modern geography it is now called Romania Alta. It received the name of Achaia from Achaëus, the son of Xuthus, king of Thessaly, who, when banished from that kingdom, settled at Athens. The chief towns of the province were Athens, Cenehrea, now Kenkri, and Corinth, the capital of the district. Paul not only preached the Gospel in Corinth, where he collected a numerous Christian Church; but, during the eighteen months that he was stationed there, he made excursions throughout the province, and converted many to the faith of Christ. Comp. Acts xviii. 1, 9-11. In writing his second epistle to the Corinthian Church, he includes "the saints in all Achaia," among those to whom he addressed it. 2 Cor. i. 1, xi. 10. "It is worthy of remark," says Calmet, "that Luke, Acts xviii. 12, calls Gallio the deputy, that is, the proconsul, of Achaia, which indeed was the proper title for the chief magistrate there at the time he wrote; but it had not long been so, nor did it long continue to be the case. The propriety of the application, however, confirms, in no small degree, the authenticity of his narrative." Achaia, taken in a larger sense, comprehended the whole region of Greece, or Hellas, now called Livadia; but Achaia Proper is a very small province in the south of Greece, and north of the Peloponnesus. See GREECE.

ACHAN, the son of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah, who purloined a costly Babylonish garment, an ingot of gold, and two hundred shekels of silver, from among the spoils of Jericho, against the express injunction of God, who had accursed, devoted to utter destruction, the city and all that it contained. Josh. vi. 17. The discovery was, according to the very ancient custom, made by lot; and the lot fell first on the tribe of Judah, then on the family of Zarhi, then on the house of Zabdi, and lastly, on Achan himself. On being taken by lot, he was condemned to be stoned to death. The whole history is recorded Josh. vii., and is a perpetual warning against the spirit of covetousness. Watson says "that Achan's family were also stoned; for they were led out with him and all his property,—'And all Israel stoned him with stones, and burned them with fire, after they had stoned them with stones.' Some of the critics have made efforts to confine the stoning to Achan, and the burning to his goods; but not without violence to the text. It is probable, therefore, that his family were privy to the theft, seeing he hid the accursed things which he had stolen, in the earth, in his tent. By concealment, they therefore became partakers of his crime, and so the sentence was justified." In one passage we find Achan called Achar; thus, 1 Chron. ii. 7, "Achar, the troubler of Israel, who transgressed in the thing accursed." A.M. 2553; B.C. 1451.

ACHBOR, one of the early kings of Edom. Gen. xxxvi. 38. Another person bearing this name is mentioned in 2 Kings xxii. 12, as one of those whom good king Josiah sent to inquire of the Lord, concerning the words written in the book of the law, which had been found.

ACHIM. This name occurs in the course of the genealogy of our Lord, as traced in the first chapter of Matthew, from Abraham to Joseph.

ACHISH, a king of Gath, at whose court David took refuge from Saul; and his life being in danger, he feigned himself mad. When war broke out between Saul and the Philistines, David marched with his army; but the lords of the Philistines being afraid that he might turn against them in battle, desired Achish to dismiss him, which he accordingly did, commending him at the same time for his fidelity.

ACHMETHA. See ECBATANA.

ACHOR, valley of, between Jericho and Ai, in the vicinity of Gilgal, so called from the trouble brought upon the Israelites by the sin of Achan,—Achor, in the Hebrew, denoting trouble. The Israelites raised here a heap of stones over the ashes of Achan, his sons and his daughters, which the writer of the book of Joshua says remained in his time.

ACHSAH, the daughter of Caleb, who promised her in marriage to him who should take Kirjath-sepher from the Philistines. Othniel was the successful person, and married Achsah. Josh. xv. 16, 17.

ACHSHAPH, the same as Achzib. Josh. xii. 20, xix. 25.

ACHZIB, a city on the coast of the Mediterranean, in the tribe of Asher, and one of the cities out of which that tribe did not expel the inhabitants. Judg. i. 31. It was called Ecdippa by the Greeks, and is at present termed Zib by the Arabs. It is situated about ten miles north of Aceho, between that place and Tyre. Mr Buckingham, who passed by this place, says that it is small, and situated on a hill near the sea, having a few palm trees showing themselves above its dwellings.

There is another town of this name belonging to the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 44. The Prophet Micah (i. 14) says, that "the houses of Achzib shall be a lie to the kings of Israel;" or, in other words, that the kings of Israel were to be deceived or disappointed by the inhabitants of Achzib, during the Assyrian invasion.

ACKNOWLEDGE; to own, or confess, Gen. xxxviii. 26; to observe, take notice of, Isa. xxxiii. 13; to esteem and respect, Isa. lxi. 9; 1 Cor. xvi. 18; to approve of, 2 Cor. i. 13; Phil. 6; to reeognise, worship, profess, and own as a God, Dan. xi. 39. We acknowledge the Lord in all our ways, when in every matter we request and wait for his direction and assistance; when we observe what direction or encouragement his Word and providence afford us in our affairs, temporal or spiritual. Prov. iii. 6. "I call it Atheism by establishment," says Burke, "when any State, as such, shall not acknowledge the existence of God, as the moral governor of the world."

ACOMETÆ or ACOMETI, an order of monks at Constantinople, in the fifth century, whom the writers of that and the following ages called Akoi-metai,—that is, Watchers,—because they performed divine service day and night, without intermission. They divided themselves into three classes, who alternately succeeded one another, so that they kept up a perpetual course of worship. This practice they founded upon that passage, "Pray without ceasing." 1 Thess. v. 17. Wetstein adopts the opinion of Casimir Oudin, that the 'Codex Alexandrinus' was written by an Acoemet, because it contains a catalogue of the psalms that were to be sung at every hour both of the day and night.

ACOLYTHI or ACOLYTES, servants of the Church who existed at an early period in the Latin Church, but did not appear in the Greek Church till the fifth century. Their office was to light the candles; to carry the tapers in the festal processions; to present the wine and water at the Supper; and, in general, to assist the bishops and priests in the performance of the ceremonies. They belonged to the clergy, and had a rank immediately below the subdeacons. This order is still preserved in the Roman Church, and when any person is ordained to the office, he receives a candlestick and chalice in token of his ancient employment. The duties, however, formerly belonging to the office, are now discharged in the Popish Church by menials and boys taken from the laity.

ACOLYTHI or ACOLUTHI, young people who, in the primitive times, aspired to the ministry, and for that purpose continually attended the bishop. In the Romish Church, Acolythi were of longer continuance; but their functions were different from those of their first institution. Their business was to light the tapers, carry the candlesticks and the incense pot, and prepare the wine and water. At Rome there were three kinds: 1. Those who waited on the pope; 2. Those who served in the churches; 3. And others, who, together with the deacons, officiated in other parts of the city.

ACQUAINT; to get a familiar knowledge and intimacy. Psal. cxxxix. 3. To acquaint one's self with God, is, by repeated endeavours, to get spiritual knowledge of, and intimacy with, him. Job xxii. 21

ACQUITTAL. In ancient times it was customary in courts of justice to present a prisoner, when acquitted, with a white stone, in token of his innocence of the crime laid to his charge. In allusion to this custom, some critics have supposed that our Saviour promises, in Rev. ii. 17, to give the spiritual conqueror "a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it." The white stone of the ancients was inscribed with characters; and so is the white stone mentioned in the Apocalypse.

ACRA (a citadel). "King Antiochus built a citadel at Jerusalem, north of the temple, on an eminence which commanded the holy place; and for that reason it was called Acra. Josephus says that this eminence was semicircular, and that Simon Maccabeus, having expelled the Syrians, who had seized Acra, demolished it, and spent three years in levelling the mountain on which it stood, that no situation in future should command the temple. On mount Acra were afterwards built the palace of Helena, Agrippa's palace, the place where the public records were lodged, and that where the magistrates of Jerusalem assembled." It is still a high elevation in the modern Jerusalem, on which stands the Latin convent of the Terra Sancta; the castle of the Pisans, or citadel of David, as it is popularly called; and the gate of Jaffa, overlooking the whole of the town.

ACRABATENE. This word, which Eusebius derives from akrabim, scorpious, was the name of a district about twelve miles in length between Shechem and Jericho. It was also the name of another district on the frontiers of Idumea, or Edom, a country which, as is well-known, was situated towards the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, or Asphaltic Lake.

ACRE. The English acre is four thousand eight hundred and forty square yards; the Scotch, six thousand one hundred and fifty and two-fifths; the Roman, three thousand two hundred; and the Egypttian aroua, three thousand six hundred and ninety-eight and seven-eighths; but the Hebrew tzemed appears to mean what can be ploughed by one pair of oxen in one day. Ten acres of vineyard yielding one bath, and the seed of a homer, an ephah, import excessive barrenness,—that the best ground should scarce produce the tenth part of the seed. Isa. v. 10.

ACTION. See ORATORY—ELOQUENCE.

ACTIONS AT LAW. At a very early period of the Jewish history, arrangements were made for the just and equitable administration of the laws of Moses among the people. As soon as the Israelites had effected a settlement in the promised land, we find Moses commanding them to appoint judges and officers in all their gates, throughout all their tribes. Deut. xvi. 18. Before these inferior judges all those actions, whether civil or criminal, were tried which were of a minor description; but the more important cases were submitted to the judgment of the supreme judge, or ruler of the commonwealth. According to Josephus, these inferior judges were seven in number. The priests and Levites, who were intimately acquainted with the law, and old men of high character and respectability, also judged the people. In the Old Testament we find the strictest charges given to all the administrators of justice to judge righteous judgment. "Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of thy poor in his cause." "And thou shalt take no gift: for the gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous." "Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour." From these, and many other passages of a similar kind, it is obvious that the utmost importance was attached, in the Jewish law, to the impartial exercise of public justice. Bribery was reckoned in the highest degree criminal, and yet we find that, in process of time, the fountain-heads of justice became so corrupt that the Prophet Amos charges the judges of his time with taking bribes (viii. 6) to condemn the innocent poor. To prevent as much as possible unrighteous judgment, actions, both civil and criminal, were tried at the gate of the city, as being the chief place of public resort. Here, in the presence of the people, causes were strictly examined and impartially decided.

In the days of Moses, the civil actions brought before him were so numerous, that no fewer than seventy-two counsellors were appointed to assist him in the administration of justice. These seem never to have fulfilled the office of judges, but rather simply of assessors, who aided in the examination of witnesses, and gave such suggestions as occurred to them in regard to the bearing of the law upon each individual case. Joshua, the successor of Moses, appears, like him, to have been at once the political ruler and the judge of the people; and even the thirteen judges who ruled successively before the appointment of a king, seem to have been military chiefs, more than civil magistrates. Samuel, we find, acted as a civil and criminal judge, passing from one part of the country to another, holding courts analogous to the circuit courts in Scotland and the assize courts in England.

Inferior courts, to which minor cases were referred, existed from an early period among the Israelites, while more important actions were decided by the governor, or chief ruler of the country. It was not, however, till the reign of Jehoshaphat that a supreme judicial tribunal was established at Jerusalem. It was composed of priests and heads of families, and had two presidents ;—one in the person of the high priest, and the other who sat in the name of the king. This mode of administering the law continued until the Babylonish captivity. On the return of the Jews to their own land, at the end of seventy years, the judicial establishment was re-organised, and two classes of judges, inferior and superior, were appointed ; while actions of a higher kind were referred to the supreme ruler, or to the high priest.

In the time of the Maccabees, the sanhedrim, or great council of the Jews, to which reference is frequently made in the New Testament, was instituted. It was composed of seventy or seventy-two members, over whom the high priest presided. This was at once a supreme court of justice and a legislative assembly, taking cognizance of the general affairs of the nation. Before Judea became subject to the Roman government, the sanhedrim had the power of deciding in capital cases ; but not afterwards.

In addition to the sanhedrim, or supreme judicial tribunal, the Talmudical writers assure us that there were smaller councils, each consisting of twenty-three persons, for the purpose of hearing and deciding petty actions. Two of these were at Jerusalem, and one in every city containing one hundred and twenty inhabitants.

At the destruction of Jerusalem, the whole civil and judicial polity of the Jews came to an end. The early Christians were warned by the Apostle Paul not to prosecute actions against one another before heathen tribunals. "Now, therefore, there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another. Why do ye not rather take wrong ? why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded ?" It is scarcely consistent with the spirit of a Christian, to be so tenacious of our individual rights and privileges, as to be ever indulging a litigious disposition. Were there more of that humble, meek, peaceable frame of mind, which would lead us in honour to prefer one another, and to seek, instead of avenging ourselves, to commit our cause into the hands of Him who judgeth righteously, that unseemly spectacle would be more rarely seen of brother going to law with brother. "The wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and of good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy."

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. This is the fifth and last of the historical books of the New Testament, and plainly stated in the introduction to have been written by the Evangelist Luke. The testimonies of the early Christians also are unanimous in ascribing it to this author. The Marcionites, Valentinians, and Severians, and some of the Manicheans, rejected the book altogether, not from historical reasons, but because it militated against their opinions. Chrysostom informs us that it was annually read in the churches daily between the festivals of Easter and Pentecost. Michaelis regards the style as much purer than that of most other books of the New Testament, though undoubtedly it is not altogether free from Hebraisms. Various titles have been given to the book by ancient writers. Thus Eusebius calls it 'The Gospel of the Holy Spirit ;' and Chrysostom, 'The Book of the Demonstration of the Resurrection.' The place of its first publication is doubtful, though the probability is in favour of Greece. The date assigned to it by the generality of critics is A.D. 63.

ACTS OF PILATE. Eusebius mentions that

Pontius Pilate, after the crucifixion of our Lord, wrote such an account of his character and miracles to the Emperor Tiberius, as induced that prince to propose to the senate that a place should be assigned to Jesus among the deities worshipped by the Romans, but that the senate opposed the wishes of the Emperor. It was certainly the custom of the governors of provinces to write memoirs of the remarkable occurrences of the places where they presided ; and there is nothing improbable in the idea that Pilate, who was convinced of the innocence of Christ, should send an account of him to Tiberius. It is certain also that Justin Martyr, in his Apology for the Christians presented to the Emperor Antoninus Pius, refers to the Acts of Pilate as containing an account of the circumstances connected with the crucifixion ; and Tertullian, toward the end of the century, appeals to the same record. Still, however, the evidence for the existence of these acts appears defective ; and the proposal alluded to by Tiberius to the Roman senate is irreconcilable with the character of that prince and the state of the Roman empire during his reign. At a late period a spurious work, entitled the Acts of Pilate, was circulated by the Jews, containing many slanders against Jesus ; and it appears that acts of a contrary nature were fabricated by certain Christians to do away the impression.

ADAD RIMMON or HADAD RIMMON, a city in the valley of Jezreel, in the half tribe of Manasseh, where the fatal battle between Josiah, King of Judah, and Pharaoh-Necho, King of Egypt (2 Kings xxiii. 29 ; Zech. xii. 11), was fought. Adad Rimmon was afterwards called Maximianopolis, in honour of the Emperor Maximian. It is seventeen miles from Caesarea, in Palestine, and ten miles from Jezreel.

ADADAH, a city in the south of the possessions of the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 22. It was not far from the boundaries of Idumea.

ADAH, the name of one of the wives of Lamech. Gen. iv. 23. Also the name of one of the wives of Esau, the daughter of Elon the Hittite.

ADALIAH, the mother of Jedidah, and grandmother of king Josiah. 2 Kings xxii. 1.

ADAM, the name of the first man, the progenitor of the human race. It is derived from Adamah, which in Hebrew, and in all the Oriental languages, originally signifies vegetable earth, or mould ; and there seems to be an allusion to this derivation in 1 Cor. xv. 47-49, where, in relation to the two great heads of the human race, the natural and the supernatural, the apostle says, "The first man is of the earth, earthy ; the second man is the Lord from heaven."

The history of Adam, especially to us his descendants, is full of intense and melancholy interest. It is given with great simplicity in the first four chapters of Genesis. In reading them, it is of the utmost importance to remember that we are reading a history, not an allegory,—an outline of events, not an exposition. The veil of time is removed by the Spirit of revelation, and the past appears just as it once appeared ; but the vision is distant, and therefore dim. We see the surface of the scene, not the interior ;—the prominent points, not all the particulars. No explanations are offered, though our curiosity is often ready to ask them. Facts of the most interesting character, and deepest import, are stated without the slightest colouring of emotion ; and we are left to judge of causes from their effects, of principles from actions, just as we judge of the qualities of a soil from the aspect of its productions. Many subsequent allusions of the inspired writers, however, serve to throw additional light upon the history, and give greater definiteness and certainty to our conclusions, while they operate as a check upon the tendency to be wise above what is written.

In reviewing the concise history of Adam, two things appear worthy of particular remark.

1. The time at which he was created is strongly expressive of the importance of his character. It has been pertinently remarked, concerning the Divine Providence in the creation of the world (which, indeed, is true of every human plan, concerted with wisdom and foresight), that what was first in intention was last in execution. Man, for whom all other things were made, was himself made last of all. In the Mosaic narrative, the only rational account that was ever given of the origin of things, we are taught to follow the great Creator, step by step, first in the production of the inanimate elements, next of vegetables, and then of animal life, till we come to the master-piece of the creation, man, endowed with reason and intellect. The house being built, its inhabitant appeared; the feast being set forth, the guest was introduced; the theatre being decorated, and lighted up, the spectator was admitted to behold the splendid and magnificent scenery in the heavens above and the earth beneath,—to view the bodies around him moving in perfect order and harmony, and every creature performing the part allotted it in the universal drama; that, seeing, he might understand, and understanding, adore the supreme Author and Director.

2. The manner in which the creation of Adam is narrated, indicates something peculiar, says Watson, "in the being to be formed. Not that it could be a matter of more difficulty to Omnipotence to create man than any thing besides; but principally, it is probable, because he was to be the lord of the whole, and therefore accountable to the original Proprietor; and was to be the subject of another species of government, a moral administration, and to be constituted an image of the intellectual and moral perfections, and of the immortality of the common Maker. Every thing, therefore, as to man's creation, is given in a solemn and deliberative form, and contains also an intimation of a trinity of persons in the Godhead, all equally possessed of creative power, and therefore Divine; to each of whom man was to stand in relations the most sacred and intimate:—"And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth." "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground." Hence Josephus alleges, that the name of our first father was called Adam from the red clay of which he was formed. Sir William Jones, however, suggests the idea, that the name may be derived from Adim, which in Sanscrit means the first.

ADAM, the name of a town on the banks of the Jordan, to the south of the sea of Galilee, in the district of Perea, and over against Jericho. It belonged to the tribe of Naphtali. It is supposed to have received its name from the peculiar colour of its soil, which was composed of red clay. It was at this spot that the Israelites passed over the Jordan on dry land.

ADAMAH, one of the "fenced cities" which belonged to the tribe of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 36.

ADAMANT, a stone of impenetrable hardness. Sometimes this name is given to the diamond; and so it is rendered, Jer. xvii. 1. But the Hebrew word rather means a very hard kind of stone, probably the smiris, which was also used for cutting, engraving, and polishing other hard stones and crystals. The word occurs, also, Ezek. iii. 9; Zech. vii. 12. In the former place, the Lord says to the prophet, "As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead;" that is, endued thee with undaunted courage. In the latter, the hearts of wicked men are declared to be as adamant; neither broken by the threatenings and judgment of God, nor penetrated by his promises, invitations, and mercies. See DIAMOND.

ADAMI, a city of the tribe of Naphtali, mentioned in Josh. xix. 33.

ADAMIC CONSTITUTION or COVENANT, the dispensation originally established with Adam, as the federal head and representative of all his descendants. The terms on which this constitution rested were,—perfect obedience to the law of God, and the possession of eternal bliss as the reward of that obedience: "Do this, and thou shalt live." The other alternative was couched in these words, referring to the forbidden fruit: "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." This, then, was what is usually termed by divines "the Covenant of Works." The contrast between the original or Adamic dispensation and the present economy is thus drawn by Dr Russell:—"In the original dispensation established with Adam, the threatening of death in case of transgression, implied a promise of life in case of obedience. This promise, therefore, respected him and his seed, as innocent and holy; and hence it did not need to be confirmed by a sacrifice. But the promises of the present economy respect sinners, and they regard Jesus as acting in behalf of such, and as having become answerable for their guilt. It was necessary, therefore, to confirm them by sacrifice; for, though God can confer favours on his innocent creatures by acts of mere will, yet, in blessing transgressors, it becomes him, as the moral governor of the world, to confer his favours in a way which shall preserve the honour of his throne, and maintain the interests of his faithful subjects. In the first constitution in relation to man, there was a simple promise of life in case of obedience, for no mediator was then required; but in the economy of redemption, Jesus acts as a mediator between God and his offending creatures; and hence, the promises of salvation and eternal life must be connected with his so bearing the sins of his people, as to render their free remission consistent with the attributes and government of the Judge of all. This accounts for the solemn and instructive fact, that from the time of the fall, the promises of good to men were connected with sacrifices. By this means, even those promises which had no immediate respect to the spiritual blessings of the covenant of peace, tended to direct the mind forward to the confirmation of that covenant by the blood of Emmanuel. Every opportunity was thus embraced of setting before men the way of their access to him, and the channel through which alone he can hold gracious communication with them. We are thus most explicitly taught, that we are unworthy of the least of his divine mercies; and that it is only through the medium of the propitiatory blood of the Saviour, that the promised blessings are bestowed."

ADAMITES, a sect that sprang up in the second century. Epiphanius tells us, that they were called Adamites, from their pretending to be re-established in the state of innocence, such as Adam's was at the moment of his creation, whence they ought to imitate him in going naked. They detested marriage; maintaining that the conjugal union would never have taken place upon earth had sin been unknown. This obscure and ridiculous sect did not last long. It was, however, revived with additional absurdities in the twelfth century. About the beginning of the fifteenth century these errors spread in Germany and Bohemia: they found also some partisans in Poland, Holland, and England. They assembled in the night; and, it is said, one of the fundamental maxims of their society was contained in the following verse:—

Swear, forswear, and reveal not the secret.

ADAR or HAZAR-ADDAR, the name of a village mentioned in Numb. xxxiv. 4. Also a city belonging to the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 3.

ADAR, the twelfth month of the sacred, and the sixth of the civil year among the Hebrews. The word signifies a magnificent mantle,—probably from the profusion of flowers and plants with which the earth then begins to be clothed in warm climates. It is said to be a Syriac term. This month contains but twenty-nine days, and answers to our February, and sometimes enters into Mareh, according to the course of the moon, by which the Jews regulated their seasons. As the lunar year, which the Jews follow in their calculations, is shorter than the solar year by eleven days, which after three years make about a month, they then insert a thirteenth month, which they call Ve-Adar, or a second Adar, to which they assign twenty-nine days. On the seventh day of the month Adar the Jews hold a fast, on account of the death of Moses; and on the fourteenth and fifteenth days, the Purim or Feast of Lots was celebrated, in honour of the deliverance of the Jews in the time of Esther.

ADARCON, a Persian coin of pure gold, which was also in use among the Jews under the Persian government. By modern authors generally its value is reckoned at fifteen shillings, but Dr Bernard estimates it at twenty-five shillings.

ADBEEL was the third son of Ishmael, and the chief of a tribe of Ishmaelites. Gen. xxv. 13.

ADD. Gal. ii. 6: They added nothing to me; they gave me no new information or authority which I had not before. To be added to the Lord and to the Church, is to be converted and united to the Lord Jesus and his Church, as new members of his mystical body, both vitally and visibly. Acts v. 14, xi. 24, ii. 41, 47.

In 2 Pet. i. 5–11 this word occurs twice in a sense far more significant than is usually apprehended:—“And beside this, giving all diligence, ADD to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly-kindness; and to brotherly-kindness charity. For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. But he that lacketh these things is blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins. Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall: for so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.” The precise value of the principal terms employed in this remarkable passage it is important to understand. Our English version is here less happy and exact than usual. The original word, translated add, is a compound, which conveys the sense of bringing into combination and correspondence the several virtues enumerated, in order to make up the full and harmonious choir of Christian graces. It is an allusion to the chorus of the Grecian theatre. The spirit, beauty, and force of the original, no single word in our language can convey. It is not merely the adding of one virtue to another, as so many unconnected items, or as so many new strangers added to a crowd, where nothing depends upon the number or adjustment; but every part in the apostle's enumeration of virtues bears an inseparable relation to every other part, and also to the whole, and their entire effect depends upon their due combination.

It were surely a rude style of exposition, it has been well remarked, to regard the catalogue of virtues enumerated by Peter as merely a vague and fortuitous series of moral qualities, each of which, though singly important, is not specifically linked to its neighbour, and does not derive any definite significance from its location in the list. To convey the full sense of the apostolic language, it is necessary to resort to a paraphrase, beginning with the third verse.

“Divinely endowed,” says the apostle to all Christian believers, “with whatever is important to the life of piety; enriched also with those inestimable promises which ensure to us a participation of the Divine nature in its holiness and happiness,—a participation flowing from an intimate knowledge of Him who has called us to so high a glory; and having, by the same means, gained a freedom from the defilement and weakness of worldly passions, apply all your diligence, my brethren, to this point,—the filling up of the defects yet remaining in your Christian character. For this purpose, gather into one harmonious choir the whole train of holy graces of which faith naturally and properly takes the lead; and give to each its due place in your soul, as in the temple of the living God, consecrated to his glory and filled with his praise. Let your FAITH in His inestimable promises (that it be not pusillanimous) be always associated with ENERGY in HIS SERVICE; let your energy be duly informed by KNOWLEDGE of EVANGELICAL PRINCIPLES; and let your knowledge be (not abused to licentiousness, but) united with THE CONTROL OF EVERY BODILY APPETITE. This firm self-control will prepare you to suffer whatever God may please to appoint, with THE PATIENCE of humility, meekness, and submission. Hence to your patience (that it be not fanatical nor stoical) you must add PIETY, or the reverential and filial observance of all the means of grace and offices of devotion. Yet remember that your piety is to be (not unsocial, ascetic, or anchoretic, but) fraught with BROTHERLY AFFECTION. And lastly, that your affection towards your fellow-Christians is to be (not sectarian and exclusive, but) ever connected with CHARITY, the divine and expansive principle of universal love. 1 Cor. xiii. For if these virtues be thus united in you, filling and overflowing your souls, as streams from a fresh and copious fountain, they will render you neither inactive nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. For he in whom these things are wanting is blind, closing his eyes, and has forgotten his having received purification from his former sins. For this reason, therefore, brethren, I exhort you the rather to use diligence to make your calling and election sure,—that is, past all doubt and danger ; for if ye do these things I have recommended, if ye apply yourselves assiduously to the means of perfecting your Christian character, you will never err from the path to heaven ; for so shall be furnished you richly, by the glorious choir of saints and angels in full harmony, an entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.”

The absolute symmetry, the exact counterpoise of parts, in the apostolic ethics, sometimes conspicuous and sometimes occult, is eminently exhibited in the epistles of Peter ; and he, moreover, shows himself, especially in the passage now illustrated, to be master of that PRACTICAL HARMONY OF PRINCIPLES which, on difficult occasions, and under peculiar excitements, adheres to the nice line of moderation, humility, and firmness. Nothing so great had been seen in the world before Christ imparted to his disciples the elements of true magnanimity. We venture to affirm, that the passage is fraught at once with philosophical justness of classification and with prophetic truth.

ADDER. The adder was known to the ancient Hebrews under various names. The word occurs five times in the English Bible ; answering, however, to different words in the original Hebrew. It is the opinion of some interpreters, that the word Shachal, which in some parts of Scripture denotes a lion, in others, means an adder, or some kind of serpent. Thus, in Psal. xci. 13, they render it the basilisk : “Thou shalt tread upon the adder and the basilisk : the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under foot.” Indeed, all the ancient expositors agree that some species of serpent is meant ; and as the term Shachal, when applied to beasts, denotes a black lion, so, in the present application, it is thought to mean the black adder. This is more especially the opinion of Bochart.

The wonderful effect which music produces on the serpent tribes, is confirmed by the testimony of several respectable moderns. Adders swell at the sound of a flute, raising themselves up on the one-half of their body, turning themselves round, beating proper time, and following the instrument. Their head, naturally round and like an eel, becomes broad and flat like a fan. The tame serpents, many of which the Orientals keep in their houses, are known to leave their holes, in hot weather, at the sound of a musical instrument, and to run upon the performer. Dr Shaw had an opportunity of seeing a number of serpents keep exact time with the der-vishes in their circulatory dances, running over their heads and arms, turning when they turned, and stopping when they stopped. The rattlesnake acknowledges the power of music as much as any of his family ; of which the following instance is a decisive proof. When Chateaubriand was in Canada, a snake of this species entered their encampment. A young Canadian, one of the party, who could play on the flute, to divert his associates, advanced against the serpent with his new species of weapon. “On the approach of his enemy, the haughty reptile curled himself into a spiral line, flattened his head, inflated his cheeks, contracted his lips, displayed his envenomed fangs and his bloody throat ; his double tongue glowed like two flames of fire ; his eyes were burning coals ; his body, swollen with rage, rose and fell like the bellows of a forge ; his dilated skin assumed a dull and scaly appearance ; and his tail, which sounded the denunciation of death, vibrated with so great rapidity as to resemble a light vapour. The Canadian now began to play upon his flute ; the serpent started with surprise, and drew back his head. In proportion as he was struck with the magic effect, his eyes lost their fierceness, the oscillations of his tail became slower, and the sound which it emitted became weaker, and gradually died away. Less perpendicular upon their spiral line, the rings of the fascinated serpent were by degrees expanded, and sunk one after another upon the ground, in concentric circles. The shades of azure, green, white, and gold, recovered their brilliancy on his quivering skin, and slightly turning his head, he remained motionless, in the attitude of attention and pleasure. At this moment the Canadian advanced a few steps, producing with his flute sweet and simple notes. The reptile, inclining his variegated neck, opened a passage with his head through the high grass, and began to creep after the musician, stopping when he stopped, and beginning to follow him again as soon as he moved forward.” In this manner he was led out of the camp, attended by a great number of spectators, both savages and Europeans, who could scarcely believe their eyes, when they beheld this wonderful effect of harmony. The assembly unanimously decreed, that the serpent which had so highly entertained them should be permitted to escape.

“But on some serpents,” says the late Professor Paxton, “these charms seem to have no power ; and it appears from Scripture that the adder sometimes takes precautions to prevent the fascination which he sees preparing for him ; for the deaf adder shutteth her ear, and will not hear the voice of the most skilful charmer. Psal. lviii. 4, 5. The method is said to be this : The reptile lays one ear close to the ground, and with his tail covers the other, that he cannot hear the music ; or he repels the incantation by hissing violently. The same allusion is involved in the words of Solomon : ‘Surely the serpent will bite without enchantment ; and a babbler is no better.’ Eccles. x. 11. The threatening of the Prophet Jeremiah proceeds upon the same fact : ‘I will send serpents, cockatrices, among you, which will not be charmed, and they shall bite you.’ Jer. viii. 17. In all these quotations, the sacred writers, while they take it for granted that many serpents are disarmed by charming, plainly admit that the powers of the charmer are in vain exerted upon others. To account for this exception, it has been alleged, that in some serpents the sense of hearing is very imperfect, while the power of vision is exceedingly acute ; but the most intelligent natural historians maintain that the reverse is true. The sense of hearing is much more acute than the sense of vision. Unable to resist the force of truth, others maintain that the adder is deaf, not by nature, but by design ; for the Psalmist says, she shutteth her ear, and will not hear the voice of the charmer. But the phrase, perhaps, means no more than this, that some adders are of a temper so stubborn, that the various arts of the charmer make no impression ; they are like creatures destitute of hearing, or whose ears are so completely obstructed that no sounds can enter. The same phrase is used in other parts of Scripture to signify a hard and obdurate heart : ‘Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard.’ Prov. xxi. 13. It is used in the same sense of the righteous by the prophet : ‘That stoppeth his ears from the hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from sceing evil.' Isa. xxxiii. 15. He remains as unmoved by the cruel and sanguinary counsels of the wicked, as if he had stopped his ears."

ADDI occurs in the genealogy of our blessed Lord, as given by Luke, ch. iii. 28

ADDON or ADDAN, a place from which certain people went up, who "could not show their father's house nor their seed, whether they were of Israel." Neh. vii. 61.

ADELPHIANI, a set of ancient heretics who fasted always on the Sabbath.

ADESSENARIANS, a branch of the Sacramentarians; so called from the Latin Adesse, to be present, because they believed the presence of Christ's body in the Eucharist, though in a manner different from the Romanists.

ADIAPHORISTS, a name given in the sixteenth century to the moderate Lutherans, who adhered to the sentiments of Melancthon; and afterwards to those who subscribed the interim of Charles V. (See INTERIM.) The word is of Greek origiu, and signifies indifference or lukewarmness.

ADITES, the tribe of Ad, a very powerful tribe of the ancient Arabians, said to be descended from Ad, the son of Aws or Uz (Gen. x. 22, 23), who was a grandson of Shem, and a great-grandson of Noah. After the confusion of tongues at Babel, the Adites settled in the province of Arabia Petraea, now called Al Akkaf, where they soon abandoned the worship of the true God, and fell into idolatry. They are often mentioned in the Koran.

ADITHAIM, a city belonging to the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 36.

ADJURE, to bind by oath, as under the penalty of a fearful curse. Josh. vi. 26; Mark v. 7. To charge solemnly as by the authority, and under pain of the displeasure of God. Matt. xxvi. 63; Acts xix. 13. Paul uses this word in 1 Thess. v. 27: "I adjure you by the Lord that this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren." What an idea does this solemn adjuration give us of the importance of the knowledge of the Scriptures! See OATH—SWEARING.

ADMAH, the most easterly of the five cities of the plain, destroyed by fire from heaven, and afterwards overwhelmed by the waters of the Dead Sea. Gen. xix. 24. There is some probability that Admah was not entirely sunk under the waters; or, more probably, the inhabitants of the country built a city of the same name on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, for Isaiah (xv.), according to the Seventy, says, "God will destroy the Moabites, the city of Ar, and the remnant of Adama." Gen. xiv. 2; Deut. xxix. 23. To be made as Admah, and set as Zeboim (Hos. xi. 8), is to be made a distinguished monument of the fearful vengeance of God. The expression evidently refers to the destruction of the cities of the plain, when God manifested his anger by their awful overthrow.

ADMINISTER, to manage and give out as stewards. 2 Cor. viii. 19.

ADMINISTRATION, a public office, and the execution thereof. 1 Cor. xii. 5.

ADMIRATION is that passion of the mind which is excited by the discovery of any great excellence in an object. It has, by some writers, been used as synonymous with surprise and wonder; but it is evident they are not the same. Surprise refers to something unexpected; wonder, to something great or strange; but admiration includes the idea of a high esteem or respect. Thus we say, we admire a man's excellencies; but we do not say that we are surprised at them. We wonder at an extraordinary object or event, but we do not always admire it.

ADMONITION, instruction, warning, reproof. 1 Thess. v. 14. The admonition of the Lord, is warning, instruction, and reproof, given in the Lord's name, from his Word, in a way becoming his perfections, and intended for his honour. Eph. vi. 4. Heretics are to be rejected, or cast out of the Church, after a first and second admonition; that is, solemn warning and reproof. Tit. iii. 10. Admonition was a part of the discipline much used in the ancient Church. It was the first act or step towards the recovery or the expulsion of delinquents. In case of private offences, it was performed, according to the evangelical rule, privately; in case of public offences, openly before the church. If either of these sufficed for the recovery of the fallen person, all further proceedings in the way of censure ceased; if they did not, recourse was then had to excommunication. Tit. iii. 10; 1 Thess. v. 14; Matt. xviii. 17.

ADONAI, one of the names of the Supreme Being in the Scriptures. The proper meaning of the word is "My Lords" in the plural number; as Adoni is my Lord in the singular. The Jews, who, either out of respect or superstition, do not pronounce the name of Jehovah, read Adonai in the room of it, as often as they meet with Jehovah in the Hebrew text. But the ancient Jews were not so scrupulous; nor is there any law which forbids them to pronounce the name of God. This practice commenced among the later Jews, after the Babylonish captivity, at least before the time of Josephus.

The title of ADONAI is frequently applied to Christ as the second person in the blessed Trinity. It signifies either a ruler and disposer, or a basis and support. Bishop Reynolds gives a beautiful definition of the word Adonai. "Christ," says he, "is Lord or Adonai in two respects. 1st, A Lord in power; power to forgive sins; power to quicken whom he will; power to cleanse, justify, and sanctify; power to succour in temptations; power to raise from the dead; power to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by him; power to hold fast his sheep; power to cast out the accuser of the brethren; power to put down all his enemies, and to subdue all things unto himself. 2dly, A Lord in authority; to judge, to anoint, to employ, to command, whom and what he will. He only is Lord over our persons,—over our faith,—over our conscience. To him only we must say, 'Lord, save us, lest we perish;' to him only we must say, 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?'" The heathens appear to have had a corrupt tradition of the name Adonai; but they applied it to the sun. Adonis was the name which they gave to the orb of day, while the apostatizing Jews worshipped the same glorious object under the appellation of Tam-muz. Ezek. viii. 14.

ADONIBEZEK, a powerful and cruel king of the city Bezek, seventeen miles east from Napolose. He had been guilty of the harshest and most cold-blooded cruelty; and according to his doings so God requited him; for the very treatment which he had inflicted upon his enemies was inflicted upon him. Judg. i. 5-7. He was the first Canaanitish king conquered by the Israelites after the death of Joshua.

ADONIJAH, the fourth son of David and Hagith. Though he had been treated with the utmost kindness and indulgence by his father, he rebelled against him in his old age, and basely usurped the throne of David. Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, by the advice of Nathan the prophet, reported the matter to the aged monarch, who no sooner became acquainted with the undutiful conduct of Adonijah, than he frustrated the schemes and disappointed the hopes of the usurper, by causing Solomon to be proclaimed king. The rightful successor to the throne, instead of punishing the traitorous Adonijah, magnanimously forgave him. After the death of his father David, and when Solomon, his brother, was confirmed in the peaceable possession of the throne, Adonijah made application, through Bathsheba, for permission to marry Abishag the Shunammite. The jealousy of the monarch appears to have been excited, and he not only denied the request, but gave orders that Adonijah should be put to death. The orders were immediately executed, and Adonijah suffered death as having been guilty of treason against the lawful sovereign of his country.

ADONIKAM. In Ezra ii. 13 the descendants of Adonikam, six hundred and sixty-six in number, are mentioned among those who returned from captivity in Babylon.

ADONIRAM. The receiver of the tribute of King Solomon. 1 Kings iv. 6.

ADONIS. The Adonis of the Greeks corresponds to the Tammuz of the Hebrews. Accordingly, the Vulgate, in Ezek. viii. 14, describes the prophet as seeing women sitting in the Temple weeping for Adonis. But our version thus translates it:—"Then he brought me to the door of the gate of the Lord's house which was toward the north; and, behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz." Adonis, according to fabulous history, was a beautiful young shepherd, with whom the goddess Venus fell in love. Mars, envying the youth, met him in hunting and killed him. Venus lamented the death of her lover in an inconsolable manner, and obtained from Proserpine permission that he should leave the shades below for six months in the year. Hence, while the anniversary of the death of Adonis was spent in Syria in deep grief, the period of mourning was followed by a festival of joy. This fable of Adonis came at length to be confounded with the equally absurd fable of Osiris, the Egyptian God. The festival of Adonis was celebrated in Syria in the month of Tammuz or July, and on that occasion the women were expected to shave their heads in mourning for Adonis. Maimonides explains the passage in Ezekiel, according to a tradition of the Sabians, as referring to an idolatrous priest who was murdered by his king for having recommended the worship of the heavenly bodies. At his death it was said that all the idols of the whole earth came together in one night into a Babylonian temple to lament and bewail him. According to a fable current among the ancient Egyptians, Osiris, one of their deities, was shut up in a box by Typhon, and being cast into the river Nile, was found by Isis at Byblos in Syria. Typhon is said to have succeeded in obtaining possession of the body, and to have cut it in pieces, but Isis collected the pieces together and buried them. The stories of Osiris and Adonis, though obviously very different from one another, nevertheless came to be connected together. On the festival of Adonis or Osiris, the Egyptians were in the habit of writing an epistle, enclosing it in a box made of papyrus, and throwing it into the sea. The box was said to be carried by water to Byblos in Syria, and the account which it contained was understood of the restoration of Adonis to life.

ADONISTS, a party among divines and critics, who maintain that the Hebrew points ordinarily annexed to the consonants of the word Jehovah, are not the natural points belonging to that word, nor express the true pronunciation of it, but are the vowel points belonging to the words Adonai and Elohim, applied to the consonants of the ineffable name Jehovah, to warn the readers, that instead of the word Jehovah, which it was understood that the Jews were forbidden to pronounce, and the true pronunciation of which had long been unknown to them, they are always to read Adonai. They are opposed to Jehovists, of whom the principal are, Drnsius, Capellus, Buxtorf, Alting, and Reland.

ADONIZEDEK was king of Zedek or Jerusalem, and one of the five Canaanitish kings shut up in the cave of Makkedah, to which they fled after their defeat by Joshua; and at his command were taken out and put to death, and their bodies hung upon five trees. Josh. x. 26.

ADOPTION. The nature of adoption may be explained in the following manner:—A child is, in this act, taken by a man from a family not his own, introduced into his own family, regarded as his own child, and entitled to all the privileges and blessings belonging to the relation. To adopt children in this manner has, it is well known, been a custom generally prevailing in all nations. Thus children were adopted among the Egyptians, Jews, Romans, and other ancient nations; and the same custom exists in the Christian nations of Europe, in our own country, and indeed throughout the world. Adoption does not appear to have been used among the earlier Hebrews. Moses makes no mention of it in his laws; and though Jacob may seem to have adopted his two grandsons, Ephraim and Manasseh, the act seems to have implied no more than that the two sons of Joseph should have each his lot in Israel, as if they had been his own sons. Another kind of adoption among the Israelites consisted in the obligation of a surviving brother to marry the widow of his brother who had died without children. By this arrangement, the children of this second marriage were considered as belonging to the deceased brother, and went by his name. This mode of adoption was unknown among the Greeks and Romans.

Among the Mahometans the ceremony of adoption is performed by causing the adopted to pass through the shirt of the person who adopts him. Something like this was observed among the ancient Hebrews. Thus Elijah adopted the Prophet Elisha as his successor, by throwing his mantle over him; and on the death of Aaron, Moses clothed Eleazar in his father's sacred vestments, indicating his adoption to the priestly office.

According to the ancient civil law, the adopted child left the family of its parents or guardians, and became a member of the family of the person who adopted it. The Emperor Justinian abolished this principle in regard to adoption properly so called. The adopted child generally receives the name of its adopter. There is nothing corresponding with adoption in the law either of England or America. In Asia adoption is a very common practice. The ceremony is frequently performed merely by the person adopting exchanging girdles with the person adopted.

It is easy to conceive the propriety of the term Adoption as used by the apostle in reference to this act, though it must be confessed there is some difference between civil and spiritual adoption. Civil adoption was allowed of, and provided for the relief and comfort of those who had no children; but in spiritual adoption this reason does not appear. The Almighty was under no obligation to do this; for he had innumerable spirits whom he had created, besides his own Son, who had all the perfections of the Divine nature, who was the object of his delight, and who is styled the "heir of all things." Heb. i. 2. When men adopt, it is on account of some excellency in the persons who are adopted. Thus Pharaoh's daughter adopted Moses, because he was exceeding fair (Acts vii. 20, 21); and Mordecai adopted Esther, because she was his uncle's daughter, and exceeding fair (Esther ii. 7); but man has nothing in him that merits this divine act. Ezek. xvi. 5. In civil adoption, though the name of a son be given, the nature of a son may not; this relation may not necessarily be attended with any change of disposition or temper. But in spiritual adoption we are made partakers of the Divine nature, and a temper or disposition given us becoming the relationship we bear. Jer. iii. 19.

Much has been said as to the time of adoption. Some place it before regeneration, because it is supposed that we must be in the family before we can be partakers of the blessings of it. But it is difficult to conceive of one before the other; for although adoption may seem to precede regeneration in order of nature, yet not of time; they may be distinguished, but cannot be separated. "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." John i. 12. There is no adoption, says the great Charnock, without regeneration. "Adoption," says the same author, "is not a mere relation; the privilege and the image of the sons of God go together. A state of adoption is never without a separation from defilement." 2 Cor. vi. 17, 18. The new name in adoption is never given till the new creature be formed. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." Rom. viii. 14. Yet these are to be distinguished. Regeneration, as a physical act, gives us a likeness to God in our nature; adoption, as a legal act, gives us a right to an inheritance. Regeneration makes us formally his sons, by conveying a principle (1 Pet. i. 23); adoption makes us relatively his sons, by conveying a power. John i. 12. By the one we are instated in the Divine affection; by the other we are partakers of the Divine nature.

The privileges of adoption are every way great and extensive. 1. It implies great honour.—They have God's name put upon them, and are described as his people, called by his name. 2 Chron. vii. 14; Eph. iii. 15. They are no longer slaves to sin and the world; but, emancipated from its dreadful bondage, they are raised to dignity and honour. Gal. iv. 7; 1 John iii. 1, 2. 2. Inexhaustible provision and riches.—They inherit all things. Rev. xxi. 7. All the blessings of a temporal kind that are for their good shall be given them. Psal. lxxxiv. 11. All the blessings of grace are treasured up in Jesus Christ for them. Eph. i. 3. All the blessings of glory shall be enjoyed by them. Col. i. 27. "All things are yours," says the apostle, "whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours." 1 Cor. iii. 21, 22. 3. Divine protection.—"In the fear of the Lord is strong confidence, and his children shall have a place of refuge." Prov. xiv. 26. As the master of a family is engaged to defend and secure all under his roof, and committed to his care, so Jesus Christ is engaged to protect and defend his people. They "shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting-places." Isa. xxxii. 18; Heb. i. 14. 4. Unspeakable felicity.—They enjoy the most intimate communion with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. They have access to his throne at all times, and under all circumstances. They see Divine wisdom regulating every affair, and rendering every thing subservient to their good. Heb. xii. 6–11. The laws, the liberties, the privileges, the relations, the provisions, and the security of this family, are all sources of happiness; but especially the presence, the approbation, and the goodness of God, as the Governor thereof, afford "joy unspeakable and full of glory." 1 Pet. i. 8; Prov. iii. 17; Heb. iv. 16. 5. Eternal glory.—In some cases, civil adoption might be made null and void, as among the Romans, when against the right of the pontifex, and without the decree of the college; but spiritual adoption, as it is divine as to its origin, so it is perpetual as to its duration. "The son abideth in the house for ever." John viii. 35. The inheritance of the saints is incorruptible, undefiled, and never fadeth away. 1 Pet. i. 4. "Now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." 1 John iii. 2. In the present state we are as children at school; but in heaven we shall be as children at home, where we shall always behold the face of our heavenly Father, for ever celebrating his praises, admiring his perfections, and enjoying his presence. "So shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv. 17.

The evidences of adoption are, 1. Renunciation of all former dependencies.—When a child is adopted, he relinquishes the object of his past confidence, and submits himself to the will and pleasure of the adopter; so they who are brought into the family of God will evidence it by giving up every other object, so far as it interferes with the will and glory of their heavenly Father. "Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?" Hos. xiv. 8. "Other lords have had dominion over us; but by thee only will we make mention of thy name." Isa. xxvi. 13; Matt. xiii. 45, 46; Phil. iii. 8. 2. Affection.—This may not always apply to civil adoption, but it always does to spiritual. The children of God feel a regard for him above every other object. His own excellency, his unspeakable goodness to them, his promises of future blessings, are all grounds of the strongest love. "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee." Psal. lxxiii. 25. "The Lord is my portion, saith my soul, therefore will I hope in him." Lam. iii. 24; Psal. xviii. 1. 3. Access to God with a holy boldness.—They who are children by adoption are supposed to have the same liberty of access as those who are children by nature; so those who are partakers of the blessings of spiritual adoption will prove it by a reverential yet familiar address to the Father of spirits: they will confess their unworthiness, acknowledge their dependence, and implore the mercy and favour of God. "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." Gal. iv. 6. "Through Jesus Christ we have access by one Spirit unto the Father." Eph. ii. 18. Having such a privilege, they come boldly to the throne of grace, that they may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. Heb. iv. 16.

4. Obedience.—Those who are adopted into a family must obey the laws of that family; so believers prove themselves adopted, by their obedience to the Word and ordinances of God. “Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you.” John xv. 14. “Whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him. He that saith he abideth in him ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked.” 1 John ii. 5, 6.

5. Patient yet joyful expectation of the inheritance.—In civil adoption, indeed, an inheritance is not always certain; but in spiritual adoption it is. “To them who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, and honour, and immortality, eternal life.” Rom. ii. 7. “We look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal.” 2 Cor. iv. 18; Rom. vi. 23; Heb. xi. 26, 27. From the consideration of the whole of this doctrine, we may learn that adoption is an act of free grace, through Jesus Christ (Eph. i. 5), applied to believers by the Holy Spirit (Gal. iv. 6; Rom. viii. 15, 16);—a blessing of the greatest importance (1 John iii. 1), and lays us under an inviolable obligation of submission (Heb. xii. 9), imitation (Eph. v. 1), and dependence (Matt. vi. 32).

ADOPTIONISTS or ADOPTIONI, the followers of Felix and Elipardas, two bishops in Spain, who, towards the close of the eighth century, are said to have maintained that Jesus Christ, in his human nature, was not the natural, but adopted Son of God. This notion was condemned as heresy at the council of Ratisbon.

ADORAİM, a city belonging to the tribe of Judah, which was fortified by Rehoboam. 2 Chron. xi. 9.

ADORAM, the officer who, under the government of David, was receiver-general of the tribute-money. 2 Sam. xx. 24. A person of the same name is also mentioned as sustaining the same office under the reign of Rehoboam. 1 Kings xii. 18. When Rehoboam, by his imprudent conduct, had exasperated the ten tribes against him, and provoked them to separate from the house of David, he sent Adoram to exert his efforts in trying to appease them. It does not seem very certain whether his object was to reduce the people by gentle or by harsh methods; or whether he designed to make some concessions by putting Adoram into their hands, who, by his vexatious exactions, had probably been the principal cause of their dissatisfaction; but however that may be, the people, who had been extremely irritated, fell upon Adoram and stoned him to death.

ADORATION. The act of rendering divine honour or worship, due to God alone, but performed to other objects also, whether idols or men. The word seems to be derived from the Latin, and signifies to apply the hand to the mouth, or to kiss the hand. To this there is an obvious allusion in Job xxxi. 26–28—“If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness; and my heart had been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand: this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge: for I should have denied the God that is above.” In the times of Job, the Persians worshipped the sun and moon, which seems to have been the form of idolatry. Herodotus considers the custom of kissing the hand in adoration to have been adopted by the Greeks from the Persians. The same ceremony was demanded by the kings of Persia from every one to whom they gave audience; and Gibbon informs us that the Roman emperors borrowed from the Persian kings this extravagant and impious homage, and the popes adopted it from the emperors. The popes have an embroidered cross on the slipper of their right foot, which is kissed by the Romish devotee. The Jewish forms of adoration were various; standing, bowing, kneeling, prostration, and kissing the hand. Kissing is often referred to in Scripture as a mode of expressing homage or adoration. Thus—“Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every month which hath not kissed him.” 1 Kings xix. 18. “Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are they that put their trust in him.” Ps. ii. 12. “And now they sin more and more, and have made them molten images of their silver, and idols according to their own understanding, all of it the work of the craftsmen: they say of them, Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves.” Hosea xiii. 2. The Orientals, when they wish to show respect, are accustomed to kiss the hand, and place it on the head, or put it to the forehead. To this day, also, it is regarded as a mark of profound homage to take off the shoes and approach barefooted to perform adoration. Thus, “Draw not nigh hither: put off thy shoes from off thy feet; for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground.” Exod. iii. 5. And again, “Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy.” Josh. v. 15.

ADORN, to deck, to make beautiful. 1 Tim. ii. 9. By a holy conversation we adorn the doctrine of God; practically show to the world the purity, power, glory, and usefulness of his truths, laws, promises, threatenings. Tit. ii. 10. The Church is adorned when her ordinances are pure and efficacious,—her officers faithful and zealous,—her members clothed with the imputed righteousness of Christ and his sanctifying grace. Isa. lxi. 10; Rev. xxi. 2. See ORNAMENT.

ADRAMMELECH (mighty king) son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria. Both he and Sharezer were probably the children of slaves, and therefore had no right to the throne. Sennacherib, returning to Nineveh after the unhappy expedition which he had made into Judea against King Hezekiah, was put to death by his two sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer, while worshipping in the temple of his god, Nisroch. 2 Kings xix. 37; Isa. xxxvii. 38. It is not said what induced these princes to commit this parricide; but having accomplished it, they fled for safety to the mountains of Armenia, and their brother Esarhaddon succeeded to the throne.

ADRAMMELECH was also the name of an idol worshipped by the inhabitants of Sepharvaim, who settled in the country of Samaria, in the room of those Israelites who were carried beyond the Euphrates. 2 Kings xvii. 31. See ANAMMELECH.

ADRAMYTTIUM, a maritime town of Mysia, in Asia Minor, opposite the island of Lesbos. In a vessel belonging to this port Paul embarked at Cæsarea, on his first voyage to Rome, intending, says the historian, “to sail by the coast of Asia.” The town was situated at the foot of mount Ida, and was founded by a colony of Athenians. It had formerly a dock and harbour, and was noted for both its trade and shipping, but is now a wretched village, inhabited by only a few fishermen, called Ardramité, and is situated on a gulph of the same name. It gave name to the bay of Adramyttium, which is an arm of the Ægean sea. Acts xxvii. 2.

ADRIA, the name given by Luke to the Adriatic sea, or, as it is now called, "the gulph of Venice," in which Paul and his companions, in their voyage to Italy, were so severely driven up and down during fourteen days and nights. Acts xxvii. 27. It is an arm of the Mediterranean, about two hundred miles long, and fifty broad, stretching along the east of Italy on one side, and the west of Dalmatia, Sclavonia, and Turkey on the other. The dominion of it now belongs to the Venetians; and the sea extends from south-east to north-west, between twelve and nineteen degrees of east longitude, and between forty and forty-five of north latitude. It contains about ninety thousand square miles of surface. It may be noticed, that when Paul says that he and his companions were tossed in Adria, he does not say in the Adriatic gulph, but in the Adriatic sea; which, according to Hesychius, is the same with the Ionian sea. This explains how Paul's ship, which was near to Malta, might, notwithstanding, be said to be tossed in Adria, that name having been given not only to the Ionian, but also to the Sicilian sea. Strabo, indeed, tells us, that in his time the Ionian gulph was a part of what was called the Adriatic sea.

ADRIAN, the fifteenth emperor of Rome. Though not mentioned by name in the Sacred Writings, he is supposed by some commentators to be alluded to in Rev. viii. 10, 11, where Barchochebas, the famous Jewish impostor, is supposed to be foretold. This remarkable personage, who pretended to be the Messiah, headed an insurrection of the Jews, which had taken place in consequence of Adrian sending a Roman colony to occupy, and building a temple to Jupiter within the walls of, the city. An army was sent to quell the insurrection, and, after a vigorous resistance for two, or, some say, for three years, in the course of which much blood was shed, the Jews were defeated, many of them sold as slaves, and the rest banished into Egypt. Jerome applies to this calamity the words of Zecharias (ch. xi. 7), "I will feed the flock of slaughter;" and the Hebrew doctors apply to the same event the words of Jeremiah (ch. xxxi. 15), "A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation, and bitter weeping; Rachel weeping for her children refused to be comforted for her children, because they were not." The Jews purchased with a sum of money the liberty, not of entering Jerusalem, but only of looking from a distance upon it, and going to lament its fall and desolation. After this revolt, Adrian finished the building of Jerusalem, and changed its name to Ælia.

ADRIEL, the son of Barzillai, married Merab, the daughter of Saul, who had previously been promised to David. 1 Sam. xviii. 19. Adriel had five sons by her, who were delivered up to the Gibeonites, to be put to death before the Lord, in revenge for the cruelty which their grandfather, Saul, had exercised against the Gibeonites. It would seem, from 2 Sam. xxi. 8, that Michal, "who had no child to the day of her death" (ch. vi. 23), had adopted the five sons of her sister Merab, whom she is said to have "brought up for Adriel, the son of Barzillai the Meholahite."

ADULLAM, a city belonging to the tribe of Judah, situated in the southern territories of this tribe. Josh. xv. 35. It is said to have been a beautiful city, and surnamed "The glory of Israel." Micah i. 15. Rehoboam strengthened it with fortifications. 2 Chron. xi. 7, 8. Eusebius says that it was a large town in his time, and describes it as being situated ten miles eastward of Eleutheropolis.

ADULTERY. The punishments awarded to the crime of adultery have been different in different countries. Among the ancient Egyptians, a thousand lashes were inflicted upon the man, and the woman was deprived of her nose. A frequent punishment in Greece was putting out the eyes. Under the Roman emperors the punishments were very various, all of them, however, showing an extreme abhorrence of the crime. In modern times the same intense severity has been exercised towards the perpetrators of a crime which is alike opposed to the law of God and subversive of the peace and good order of society.

One of the most singular institutions that is to be found in all the Mosaic economy, is the law which consisted in obliging the suspected wife either to make a public avowal of her guilt before the whole Sanhedrim and assembled congregation, in which case she was repudiated and might go where she pleased; or, if she persisted in affirming her innocence, compelling her to drink waters which were rendered metaphorically bitter by the infusion of the Divine curse on adultery; which waters, by Divine interposition, had the extraordinary effect of greatly improving her health, beauty, and fruitfulness in case of her innocence, while, on the contrary, if guilty, she immediately grew pale, her eyes started out of her head, her thighs putrified, and she immediately died under the most shocking circumstances that are conceivable! This was called—"The Law of Jealousies."

On this law of Moses, Michaelis has the following remarks:—"This oath was, perhaps, a relic of some more severe and barbarous consuetudinary laws, whose rigour Moses mitigated; as he did in many other cases, when an established usage could not be conveniently abolished altogether. Among ourselves, in barbarous times, the ordeal, or trial by fire, was, notwithstanding the purity of our married people, in common use; and this, in point of equity, was much the same in effect, as if the husband had had the right to insist on his wife submitting to the hazardous trial of her purity, by drinking a poisoned potion, which, according to an ancient superstition, could never hurt her if she was innocent. And, in fact, such right is not altogether unexampled; for, according to Oldendorp's 'History of the Mission of the Evangelical Brethren, in the Caribbee Islands,' it is actually in use among some of the savage nations in the interior parts of West Africa.

"Now, when in place of a poisoned potion like this, which very few husbands can be very willing to have administered to their wives, we see, as among the Hebrews, an imprecation-drink, whose avenger God himself promises to become, we cannot but be struck with the contrast of wisdom and clemency which such a contrivance manifests. In the one case (and herein consists their great distinction), innocence can only be preserved by a miracle; while on the other, guilt only is revealed and punished by the hand of God himself.

"By one of the clauses of the oath of purgation (and had not the legislator been perfectly assured of his divine mission, the insertion of any such clause would have been a very bold step indeed), a visible and corporal punishment was specified, which the person swearing imprecated on herself, and which God himself was understood as engaging to execute. To have given so accurate a definition of the punishment to inflict, and still more, one that consisted of such a sore disease, would have been a step of incomprehensible boldness in a legislator who pretended to have a divine mission, if he was not, with the most assured conviction, conscious of its reality.

"Seldom, however, very seldom, was it likely that Providence would have an opportunity of inflicting the punishment in question. For the oath was so regulated, that a woman of the utmost effrontery could scarcely have taken it without changing colour to such a degree as to betray herself.

"In the first place, it was not administered to the woman in her own house, but she was under the necessity of going to that place of the land where God in a special manner had his abode, and take it there. Now, the solemnity of the place, unfamiliarized to her by daily business or resort, would have a great effect upon her mind. In the next place, there was offered unto God what was termed an execration-offering, not in order to propitiate his mercy, but to invoke his vengeance on the guilty. Here the process was extremely slow, which gave her more time for reflection than to a guilty person could be acceptable, and that, too, amidst a multitude of unusual ceremonies. For the priest conducted her to a sanctuary, and took holy water, that is, water out of the priest's laver, which stood before it, together with some earth off its floor, which was likewise deemed holy; and having put the earth in the water, he then proceeded to uncover the woman's head, that her face might be seen, and every change in her countenance during the administration of the oath accurately observed; and this was a circumstance which, in the East, where the women are always veiled, must have had a great effect; because a woman accustomed to wear a veil, could on so extraordinary an occasion have had far less command of her eyes and her countenance than an European adulteress, who is generally a perfect mistress in all the arts of dissimulation, would display. To render the scene still more awful, the tresses of the hair were loosened, and then the execration-offering was put into her hand, while the priest held in his the imprecation-water. This is commonly termed the bitter water; but we must not understand this, as if the water had really been bitter; for how could it have been so? The earth of the floor of the tabernacle could not make it bitter. Among the Hebrews and other oriental nations, the word bitter was rather used for curse; and strictly speaking, the phrase does not mean bitter water, but the water of bitterness, that is of curses. The priest now pronounced the oath, which was in all points so framed that it could excite no terrors in the breast of an innocent woman; for it expressly consisted in this, that the imprecation-water could not harm her if she was innocent. It would seem as if the priest here made a stop, and again left the woman some time to consider whether she would proceed with the oath. This I infer from the detail proceeding anew in the words of the historian, Then shall the priest pronounce the rest of the oath and the curses to the woman; and proceed thus.—After this stop he pronounced the curses, and the woman was obliged to declare her acquiescence in them by a repeated Amen. Nor was the solemn scene yet altogether at an end; but rather, as it were, commenced anew. For the priest had yet to write the curses in a book, which I suppose he did with great deliberation; having done so, he washed them out again in the very imprecation-water, which the woman had now to drink; and this water being now presented to her, she was obliged to drink it, with this warning and assurance, in the name of God, that if she was guilty, it would prove within her an absolute curse. Now, what must have been her feelings, while drinking, if not conscious of purity! In my opinion she must have conceived that she already felt an alteration in the state of her body, and the germ, as it were, of the disease springing up within her. Conscience and imagination would conspire together, and render it almost impossible for her to drink it out. Finally, the execration-offering was taken out of her hand, and burnt upon the altar. I cannot but think that, under the sanction of such a purgatorium, perjury must have been a very rare occurrence indeed. If it happened but once in an age, God had bound himself to punish it; and if this took place but once (if but one woman who had taken the oath was attacked with that sore disease which it threatened), it was quite enough to serve as a deterrent to all others for at least one generation."

This procedure had also the effect of keeping in mind, among the Jews, God's high displeasure against this violation of his law; and though some lax moralists have been found, in modern times, to palliate it, yet the Christian will always remember the solemn denunciations of the New Testament against a crime so aggravated, whether considered in its effects upon the domestic relations, upon the moral character of the guilty parties, or upon society at large.—"Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge." Heb. xiii. 4.

Several forms of Hindoo ordeal are mentioned in the first volume of the 'Asiatic Researches,' one of which has a considerable resemblance to that of the Hebrew water of jealousy. The accused is made to drink three draughts of water, in which the images of the Sun, of Devi, and of other deities, have been washed for the occasion; and if, within fourteen days, he has any sickness or indisposition, his crime is considered as proved. A similar mode of trial is to be found in various countries.

It is evident, observes Paley, that on the part of the man who solicits the chastity of a married woman, it certainly includes the crime of seduction, and is attended with mischief still more extensive and complicated; it creates a new sufferer, the injured husband, upon whose affection is inflicted a wound the most painful and incurable that human nature knows. The infidelity of the woman is aggravated by cruelty to her children, who are generally involved in their parents' shame, and always made unhappy by their quarrel. The marriage vow is witnessed before God, and accompanied with circumstances of solemnity and religion, which approach to the nature of an oath. The married offender, therefore, incurs a crime little short of perjury, and the seduction of a married woman is little less than the subornation of perjury. But the strongest apology for adultery is, the prior transgression of the other party; and so far, indeed, as the bad effects of adultery are anticipated by the conduct of the husband or wife who offends first, the guilt of the second offender is extenuated. But this can never amount to a justification, unless it could be shown that the obligation of the marriage vow depends upon the condition of reciprocal fidelity; a construction which appears founded neither in expediency, nor in the terms of the vow, nor in the design of the legislature, which prescribed the marriage rite. To consider the offence upon the footing of provocation, therefore, can by no means vindicate retaliation. "Thou shalt not commit adultery," it must be ever remembered, was an interdict delivered by God himself. This crime has been punished in almost all ages and nations. By the Jewish law it was punished with death in both parties, where either the woman was married, or both. Among the Romans, it was punished by banishment, cutting off the ears or noses, and by sewing the adulterers in sacks, and throwing them into the sea, scourging, burning, &c. In Spain and Poland they were almost as severe. The Saxons formerly burnt the adulteress, and over her ashes erected a gibbet, whereon the adulterer was hanged. King Edmund, in his kingdom, ordered adultery to be punished in the same manner as homicide. Canute ordered the man to be banished, and the woman to have her nose and ears cut off. Modern punishments, in different nations, do not seem to be so severe. In Britain it is reckoned a spiritual offence, and is cognizable by the spiritual courts, where it is punishable by fine and penance.

"In John viii. 3, we read that the Jews having surprised a woman in adultery, brought her to our Saviour, and asked him what they should do with her: Moses having ordered women guilty of this crime to be stoned. This they said, tempting him, to find accusation against him. From our Lord's manner of treating their application, and its results, Calmet and others have supposed that the woman's accusers were themselves guilty of the crime which they alleged against her; and as it was not just to receive the accusations of those who are guilty of the evil of which they accuse others, our Lord dismissed them with the most obvious propriety. But, as Mr Taylor suggests, it seems enough to suppose, that the consciences of these witnesses accused them of such crimes as restrained their hands from punishing the adulteress, who perhaps was guilty, in this instance, of a less enormous sin than they were conscious of, though of another kind. He also suggests that their malevolent design to entrap our Lord, was appealed to by him, and was no slight cause of their confusion, if they wished to found a charge which might affect his life. Their intended murder was worse than the woman's adultery; especially if, as there is room to believe, the woman had suffered some violence. But the whole transaction may be viewed in another light. The law was, that both the culprits should be brought before the council, where, if condemned, the whole audience, COUNCIL INCLUDED, were to stone them. By bringing this woman only to Jesus, the Jews were guilty, 1. Of partiality, as they ought to have brought the adulterer also; 2. They desired Jesus to take on himself the office of the council, which would have been assuming political power, and would have endangered his life. This plot he retorts on themselves, by saying, 'Do you, on your own proposals, assume that conduct which you well know the council would pursue in such a case; consider the prisoner as ipso facto condemned by the circumstances in which she was apprehended, therefore do you cast stones at her, as the council would cast stones at a person so condemned.' This they declined, being aware of its tendency, and shrunk from that action to which they had urged Jesus. To this his words seem more particularly to allude, 'Let him who is without sin, not moral guilt merely, but political offence—he who can be innocent in assuming that power of life and death which is legally lodged elsewhere, let him act the judge, and stone her.' And so, speaking to the woman, 'Has nobody officially condemned thee—executed the condemnation of the law on thee, by stoning thee?'

Neither do I officially condemn thee;—I do not execute condemnation on thee by stoning thee; remember the narrow escape thou hast now experienced; go and sin no more.'

"The genuineness of this narrative has been much disputed, in consequence of its having been omitted in many ancient MSS., and being much varied in its position in others. The arguments in its favour, however, are generally admitted to preponderate. It is found in the greater part of the MSS. extant, of all the recensions or families; and Tatian and Ammonius (A.D. 172, and 220) inserted it in their 'Harmonies.' The author of the 'Apostolical Constitutions' (lib. 2. cap. 24) and the 'Synopsis' ascribed to Athanasius, have it. Jerome, Justin, Ambrose, and the Latin fathers received it, though they were not unacquainted with the differences among the Greek copies. Justin conjectures, that some Christian of weak judgment expunged it, lest our Saviour should be thought to authorise the crime of adultery, by forgiving it so easily. Many Syriac manuscripts, of good antiquity, read it; and it is found in all printed copies, Greek and Latin. Griesbach prints the passage between brackets as dubious; yet on the whole admits it."

But admitting its truth, there is scarcely any of the Saviour's miracles that sets forth in a more striking manner his divine authority over the consciences of men, in flashing conviction upon their guilty minds, and compelling them to speak out to their own confusion. And, in this view, it may serve to show us what will be the real state of things in the great day of awful retribution, when the books shall be opened and every man's sins set in array against him.

Adultery is frequently charged upon the Israelites in their national capacity; and is then to be considered as used figuratively by the prophets. Isaiah terms them "the seed of the adulterer and the whore," ch. lvii. 3. Jeremiah complains of them, that they were all adulterers, ch. ix. 2. Hosea uses similar language, ch. vii. 4, and Christ repeatedly calls them, "an adulterous generation." Matt. xii. 39, xvi. 4; Mark viii. 38. To perceive the import of this, we must take into consideration that, as a nation, they had entered into covenant with God; that those covenant engagements are alluded to under the metaphor of a marriage contract; and hence their violation of the covenant is charged home upon them as the sin of adultery. Thus Isaiah speaks of the Jewish church, of which all the natural descendants of Abraham were members, as "the married wife." Isaiah liv. 1. And Jeremiah, exhorting them to repentance (ch. iii. 14), says, "Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord; for I am married unto you." Hence their backslidings from the worship of the true God, and reverting to idolatry, to which they were remarkably prone about the period of the Babylonish captivity, is reprobated by the prophets under the strong figurative expressions of adultery and whoredom. "Through the lightness of her whoredom she defiled the land, and committed adultery with stones and stocks." Jer. iii. 9. Thus, also, the prophet Ezekiel reproaches them (ch. xxiii. 35-37),—"Thou hast forgotten me, saith the Lord God, and cast me behind thy back; therefore bear thou also thy lewdness and thy whoredoms."—"They have committed adultery,—with their idols have they committed adultery." Hence God compares himself to a husband jealous of his honour; and their adoption of vile opinions and practices is in his eye the worst kind of prostitution. It is, says Calmet, an argument ad hominem, not merely to the Jews, but to human nature at large, against the flagitious wickedness of forsaking God for the sake of any other object which would rival him in our affections. 2 Tim. iii. 4; 1 Cor. x. 21, 22. It is necessary to keep in view these principles, in order to enter properly into the meaning of the prophetic writings. See further on this subject under the article MARRIAGE.

ADUMMIM, a city and mountain near Jericho, and in the lot of the tribe of Benjamin. It was situated in the way from Jerusalem to Jericho, and is said to have been greatly infested with robbers. Hence Christ is supposed to have taken it for the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan, who so humanely relieved the man that fell among thieves.

ADVANTAGE: 1. Profit, gain. Job xxxv. 3. 2. A fair opportunity to excel, or prevail over another; a privilege, or pre-eminence of privileges, in a good sense. Rom. iii. 1. 3. Actual prevalence or superiority, in a bad sense. 2 Cor. ii. 11.

ADVENT, a term usually employed to denote the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, our Saviour. In the fulness of time he appeared, to take away sin by the sacrifice of himself. The period of his coming had been so minutely foretold by the ancient prophets, from the fall of man down through the long line of Old Testament prophecy, that the Jews, for some time prior to the advent, were eagerly looking for the coming of Messiah. The Rev. Dr Hetherington, in his masterly work, entitled 'The Fulness of Time,' thus describes the feelings of the Jews in anticipation of the joyful event:—"As the nations of the earth were held in awe by the expectation of some mighty conqueror's appearance, the hopes of the Jews were about the same time awakened by similar anticipations. From their own Talmuds we learn, that the coming of the Messiah was very generally looked for by the Jews of that period; and very many incidental expressions throughout the evangelists prove the prevalence of that expectation among all classes, though they had formed an erroneous notion respecting the character of the Messiah, 'trusting that he would restore the kingdom to Israel.' Nor were such expectations confined to politicians or fanatics, in their ambition or their mysticism,—they were entertained equally by the devout Simeon and the Prophetess Anna, and others who, like them, were 'looking for redemption in Jerusalem.' Thus the Gentile world and the Hebrew nation were for once possessed by the same spirit, and had their minds filled by the same idea,—that One about to be born in Judea should become the Ruler of the world, and of his kingdom there should be no end. One universal feeling of expectation held the heart of the human race in a sort of hushed anxiety, waiting for the manifestation of the Prince and Redeemer; but biassed alike by ignorance and prejudice, their views were both misdirected, and neither Gentiles nor Jews could recognise the dreaded Sovereign, or the longed-for Saviour, in the CHILD OF BETHLEHEM."

The account thus given of the state of Judea at the time when our Lord appeared, is borne out not only by the narratives of the evangelists, but by the testimony of Josephus, the Jewish historian. The date of the advent, according to the computation of Archbishop Usher, was the four thousandth year from the creation, which exactly coincides with an old tradition of the Jews, that the world was to last six thousand years,—of which two thousand were before the Law, two thousand under the Law, and the last two thousand years were to be under the Messiah. Chronologists are by no means agreed as to the precise year of Christ's birth, but in the usually recognised chronology of the authorised version, it is placed in the fourth year before the beginning of the vulgar era.

The name Advent is also applied to the four or six weeks which precede Christmas,—a season spent by the Roman Catholics in fasting, humiliation, and prayer, as if in preparation for the coming of the Lord.

ADVERSARY (in the Hebrew, Satan, in the Greek, Antidikos), one who carries on a controversy with another under the colour of justice; and usually with the forms and processes of law. Luke xviii. 3; Matt. v. 25. The use of the term both in the Old and New Testament shows that it differs from enemy in this, that it imports (whether truly or not) a claim of right to oppose. Hence the appellation is with equal propriety given to men, 1 Sam. xxix. 4—to God, Exod. xxiii. 22—to a good angel, Num. xxii. 22—and to the evil spirit, Job i. 6. It is more commonly used absolutely for the latter, "that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan." Rev. xx. 2; Ps. cix. 6; Zech. iii. 1; 1 Pet. v. 8. From an ADVERSARY so powerful, sagacious, experienced, artful, indefatigable, and withal so malicious; from an ADVERSARY equally skilled in the wiles which lead to presumption, and that afterwards plunge into despair; from an ADVERSARY who assaulted even the Son of God himself; what have we not to fear! Especially when we consider that, although not himself omnipresent, yet his servants, emissaries, and agents are at all times on every side of us; acting in his name, upon his schemes, and in the same spirit as himself. Matt. xxv. 41; 2 Cor. xi. 13–15, ii. 11; Eph. vi. 10–16. Faith in the crucified Saviour is the only impregnable shield against his assaults.

ADVERSITY, the opposite of prosperity. Eccles. vii. 14. It is that state in which the train of Providential circumstances is contrary to our wishes. Gen. xlii. 36. The duties of this trying state are—Fortitude, Prov. xxiv. 10; consideration, Eccles. vii. 14; devout acknowledgment, Prov. iii. 6; prayer, James v. 13; submission, 1 Sam. iii. 18; faith in the promises, perfections, and providential government of God, Rom. viii. 28. See AFFLICTION.

ADVOCATE (parakletos, a patron), one who pleads the cause of another. It is a title appropriated to our Lord Jesus Christ, as the exclusive Mediator between God and man. It designates one important branch of his high priestly office—a branch most essential to our daily comfort, as well as to our peace with God. As a deep impression of the Divine majesty and purity (1 John i. 5–10) is essential to guard us against sin; so, under the awful consciousness of having sinned against that purity and majesty, and all the affecting manifestations of infinite love in the Gospel, nothing short of a lively recollection and reliance upon the tender and efficacious intercession of our holy Redeemer, could save us from despair. Hence the exquisite propriety and beauty of the words of the apostle (1 John ii. 1): "My little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world. And hereby we do know that we know him," (that is, that our reliance upon him is sincere and successful), "if we keep his commandments."

The understanding of this point is so vital, both to our peace of conscience and purity of character, that we must be pardoned for dwelling more particularly upon it; especially as it reveals one of the sweetest features in the character of our Lord, and one that comes home with all the warmth of the most endearing tenderness to our hearts.

The doctrine that our poor nature universally stands in need of an advocate before the tribunal of Divine justice, it is unnecessary to insist upon, since "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." Rom. iii. 23. But where shall that advocate be found? He who undertakes to plead the cause of the sinner, must himself be sinless. He must not only possess sufficient ability for the office of an effectual pleader; but he must know every person and every case, with all the circumstances of all the causes for which he undertakes. He must thoroughly understand the law and the government under which he pleads; and be equally solicitous to uphold the claims of righteousness as to secure the safety of the client, who has resorted to him for protection. He must know the true ground on which to rest his plea with the certainty of success. Neither is it sufficient that he possess all these qualifications, and more than these, unless that he be lawfully constituted to the office. It is not enough, in our common court of justice, between man and man, that many an advocate of ability and feeling heart could stand up for poor guilty criminals, and plead their cause. He that advocates for them must have a legal call to the office, and be sworn into it according to the laws of the court. How delightful is it to see that all these qualifications meet and centre in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, and invest him with all their soft and attractive splendours.

The Redeemer's claim to this office is founded on the express call of Ἰενοῦα. We are told by God the Holy Ghost (Heb. v. 5), that "Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest;" but was called of God, as was Aaron. And he was not only called to the office, but sworn into it with the solemnity of an oath,—"The Lord sware and will not repent; thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedek." Christian! let this be kept in perpetual remembrance. Your Jesus, your Advocate with the Father, is your sworn Advocate. And as in consequence of sin, God our Father is of necessity the legal adversary of every sinner (Luke xii. 58, 59), so for every believer Christ is the legal advocate, fully and lawfully appointed to this office by the Father himself. Well might he say, when about to ascend to heaven, "Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me." John xiv. 1.

Nor is this all. Christ is our Advocate by virtue of his being the propitiation for our sins. Not only the infinite dignity of his person, and the infinite merit of his propitiation, give him this claim, but also he is the very "propitiation" which God himself "hath set forth, through faith in his blood." Consult Job xxxiii. 24; Isaiah xlii. 21; Matt. xvii. 5; Rom. iii. 25. Here, then, is laid the foundation of his great argument on our behalf. It is not that we, according to the law of God, are not found guilty; the reverse of this is the admitted fact. Rom. iii. 19; Isa. liii. 12. But may he not plead for his own rights, and those of his people in him? May he not plead the absolute promise of the covenant of redemption, that if he should make his soul an offering for sin, he should see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied? Isa. liii. 10, 11. And can he rest satisfied till he hath brought all his redeemed people around him in glory? We know from his own words (John xvii. 24) that he cannot. Nor will he rest till all the ends of his incarnation, as far as they relate to this world, are accomplished; although the universal establishment of his kingdom (Psal. ii. 8-12) involves the overthrow of the empire of Satan, and the destruction of his own and his people's enemies. Isa. lxiii. 4; 1 John iii. 8; Isa. xlii. 4.

Time would fail to describe here, what the Scriptures largely set forth, the various qualifications of our Lord, his ability, his readiness, his grace, and a thousand endearing things beside, which render him so peculiarly suited to the office. Indeed, it is most blessed to behold him in this endeared character! All he undertakes is free, altogether free, "without money and without price." No case, however desperate, he refuseth; and none that he undertakes can fail. Other advocates may, and indeed must, often disappoint the expectations placed in them; Jesus never.—And then the gracious manner in which he carries on the cause intrusted to his hands, is most blessed to think upon; for he makes every ease which he takes up his own. He enters into all their concerns; gives them to see how much he sympathizes with them in all their exercises; and supports their souls with the abiding assurance of his everlasting attention. Not all the hallelujahs of heaven can make him for a moment intermit his regard to the persons or the causes of his redeemed on earth. Their wants, their sorrows, their desires, are all numbered before him. For it is not their deservings, but his love; not what they have done, or can do for themselves; but what they need, and what he can do for them, which regulates the bestowment of his grace. If they "have not," then, it is "because they ask not," or ask not in a way which will promote their highest good. What they are, and what they merit, comes not into the account. That they are his; that he has purchased their redemption, and received them as the gift of the Father (John vi. 37-40, x. 27-30, xvii. 2-26), these are the motives that operate in the heart of Christ. Not vain, then, is the apostle's triumphant challenge (Rom. viii. 33-39): Seeing we have such an advocate, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" Oh, were his powerful recommendations known to sinners through faith, not a soul earnest for its everlasting welfare could hesitate a moment to commit all its concerns into the hands of an advocate so wise, so tender, and successful.

The term Advocate or Paraclete is not only applied in Scripture to Jesus Christ the Saviour, but also to the Holy Spirit, the Sanctifier of his people. If Jesus be our Advocate to plead for us, the Spirit is our Advocate to plead in us, with an efficacy and a power which can no more be resisted by God the Father, than the advocacy of the Redeemer itself. This title, as applied to the Spirit, occurs particularly in the Saviour's last discourses to his disciples. He was about to remove from them, and he openly declares, "If I go not away, the Comforter (Advocate) will not come; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." The apostles might have learned much from the direct teaching of our Lord while he tabernacled on the earth, but it was reserved for the Spirit to "guide them into all truth." The change wrought in them by the effectual operation of the Holy Spirit, not only exhibited itself by outward manifestations in the world, but it affected their position in regard to God himself. They had learned by the teaching of the Spirit to pray, and not only so, but the Spirit prayed in them with groanings which could not be uttered. They had therefore an Advocate in heaven and an Advocate upon the earth, one pleading their cause at the right hand of the Father, and the other pleading along with them in all their approaches to a throne of grace.

ÆLIA CAPITOLINA. This was the name which Adrian, the Roman Emperor, gave to Jerusalem, when he planted a Roman colony in it, about the year A.D. 134, expelling the Jews from the city, and issuing a decree prohibiting their return, under the severest penalties. In honour of this remarkable event medals were struck, some of which are still preserved, representing Judea as a female kneeling before the emperor. The banishment of the Jews from their city, which they were wont to hold in great veneration, was to them a source of the deepest sorrow; and Jerome tells us that in his time they were wont to pay sums of money for permission to approach the city and give vent to their feelings by tears. Often, accordingly, might be seen bands of these disconsolate Jews ascending the Mount of Olives, that they might gaze upon the ruins of the city and temple, and shedding tears over the melancholy desolation. This earnest, devoted attachment to Jerusalem has ever been a ruling passion in the minds of the Jews, and has led multitudes of them to resort thither every year for no other purpose than to weep amid its ruins.

The name Capitolina, which was added to Ælia, had its origin in the consecration of the city by Adrian to Jupiter Capitolinus, in honour of whom he erected a temple on the very spot where the Redeemer was supposed to have risen from the dead. With the view, if possible, of effacing all recollection of the sacred events which had occurred in the city, statues in honour of heathen deities were erected on what were considered the most sacred spots. These means, however, were altogether ineffectual in rooting out the hallowed associations of the Jews. On the contrary, they became stronger than ever, and they cleaved with increased tenacity to the scenes of the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus.

Adrian's decree for banishing the Jews was limited to that people alone. Many Christians still continued to reside in the city, and the Church in Jerusalem being now composed of Gentile converts exclusively, adopted a purer worship, more free than before from Jewish rites and ceremonies. Thus does God often overrule even the most untoward events for carrying forward his own causes. For a long time Jerusalem retained the name of Ælia, and it was not until the days of Constantine that it resumed its ancient name, which it preserves to this day.

ÆON, a Greek word signifying age, or duration. This was a term used by the followers of Plato, to denote any virtue or perfection, and accordingly the Deity was represented as a combination of all possible æons. Valentinus, who belonged to the sect of the Gnostics, taught that there were thirty gods, whom he termed Æons, and that from them proceeded the Saviour of the world. Cerinthus and the early heretics taught, that before the appearance of Christ, God the Father was quite unknown, dwelling in a remote heaven, along with the æons, or blessed spirits: that the æons varied in degree.

Christ being a lower æon, who, however, descended from heaven upon the man Jesus, at his baptism, revealing the Father to him, and enabling him to work miracles, and when he was delivered into the hands of the Jews, the Christ returned to the Pleroma, and Jesus was left to suffer and die. Thus early did heresies of the most pernicious kind arise in the Christian Church, perverting the truth as to the person of Christ,—a truth which forms the fundamental doctrine of the Christian Church. It is a tradition derived from the earliest Christian writers, that the Apostle John lived to witness the rise of the Gnostic heresy, and that he wrote his Gospel and his Epistles on purpose to correct its errors.

ÆRA, a series of years commencing from a particular epoch or period of time. Thus the Christian æra, that is, the years which have passed since the birth of Christ. This mode of computation was first proposed about the sixth century. The æra of the creation differs according as we follow the Hebrew text, the Samaritan version, or the Septuagint. The Mohammedan æra or the Hegira dates from the 6th of July 622, when Mohammed fled from Mecca to Medina. Among the ancient Romans the Olympiads formed a usual æra from which they calculated. The Olympiads commenced from 776 B.O., and 24 before the foundation of Rome. The first of the Incarnation corresponds to the fourth year of the 194th Olympiad. Another important æra among the Romans was the foundation of their city, which was laid 753 B.C. The most important æras are the creation, the deluge, the birth of Abraham, the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt, the building of Solomon's temple, its destruction, or the commencement of the Babylonish captivity, the deliverance of the Jews seventy years after, and their restoration to their own land; finally, the birth of the Redeemer. The æra in general use among the Christians is that from the birth of Jesus Christ, concerning the true time of which chronologers differ, and about which there has been considerable discussion among the learned. Some place it two years, others four, and again others five, before the vulgar æra, which is fixed for the year of the world 4004; but Archbishop Usher, and after him the generality of modern chronologers, place it in the year of the world 4000.

Ever since the compilation of the Talmud, the Jews have reckoned their years from the creation of the world.

ÆRIANS, a sect which arose about the middle of the fourth century, being the followers of Aërius (who must be distinguished from Arius and Aëtius), a monk and a presbyter of Sebastia, in Pontus. He is charged with being an Arian, or Semi-Arian; but another accusation against him is an attempt to reform the Church; and, by rejecting prayers for the dead, with certain fasts and festivals then superstitiously observed, to reduce Christianity as nearly as possible "to its primitive simplicity; a purpose, indeed, laudable and noble," says Dr Mosheim, "when considered in itself; though the principles from whence it springs, and the means by which it is executed, are sometimes, in many respects, worthy of censure, and may have been so in the case of this reformer." This gentle rebuke probably refers to a report that the zeal of Aërius originated in his being disappointed of the bishopric of Sebastia (conferred on Eustathius), which led him to affirm that the Scriptures made no distinction between a presbyter and a bishop, which he founded chiefly on 1 Tim. iv. 14. Hence he is considered by many as the father of the modern Presbyterians.—“For this opinion, chiefly,” says Dr Turner, “he is ranked among the heretics, by Epiphanius, his contemporary, who calls it a notion full of folly and madness. His followers were driven from the churches, and out of all the towns and villages, and were obliged to assemble in the woods, caverns, and open defiles.”

AETIANS, another branch of Arians, so called from Aëtius, bishop of Antioch, who is also charged with maintaining “faith without works,” as “sufficient to salvation,” or rather justification; and with maintaining “that sin is not imputed to believers.” It is added, that he taught that God had revealed to him things which he had “concealed from the apostles;” which perhaps, is only a misrepresentation of what he taught on the doctrine of divine influences.

AFAR, joined with off, signifies,—1. The distance between two places. Gen. xxxvii. 18. 2. To be estranged from God. Psal. xxxviii. 11. 3. Absent from God. Psal. x. 1. 4. Ungodly, not only out of the visible Church, but alienated from God. Eph. ii. 17.

AFFECTIONS. With many there is, perhaps, too much of a disposition to reduce Christianity to a barren system of rational truths. They are apt to make it a mere collection of specific statutes, like a civil or criminal code, in which the precise amount of obligation and limit of transgression may be clearly ascertained. Men of inquisitive and speculative minds are in peculiar danger of preferring the exercise of the understanding to that of the heart, and thus of rendering the light of religion little more than a cold cornucopia, which imparts no warmth to the region of the affections. But when we consider how important a part of our constitution the affections are, and how much they do in ultimately determining the character of the man, it cannot be supposed that religion is the only subject from which the exercise of them is to be excluded. When we consider, too, the infinite sublimity of religious truths, the influence they have on human happiness here, and on man's expectations for eternity, surely it cannot be that he, who is impassioned on every other subject, may be always lukewarm on this; that the affections, which glow in every other sphere, must lose all their warmth as soon as they touch the region of theology. If it were enough to know the sanctions, and admit the obligations of a law, the character of the lawgiver would be of no consideration. If it were enough to keep the commandments according to the barren letter of the moral code, surely the first commandment would have been more than superfluous,—“Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul, mind, and strength.” But it is not sufficient that the affections be merely admitted into religion. If they are allowed to enter it at all, they must enter it largely. If God is to be loved, he is to be loved supremely. If Jesus, though absent and invisible, is yet our Saviour and friend, he demands an attachment on our part stronger than death, which many waters cannot quench, nor floods drown. If the soul is worth any thing, it is inestimable; you cannot love it too dearly. If the interest of any reaches beyond this earthly scene, it spreads throughout eternal duration. It should move our feelings, as well as our thoughts. There cannot be awakened too deep a sensibility for the immortal welfare of a being who is susceptible of innumerable gradations of bliss and wretchedness.

Let it be admitted that the Scriptures are written in the language of Orientals, and abound in phrases and expressions of such passionate hyperbole as seem, to the colder and more chastised imaginations of the western world, like the language of exaggerated feeling; but, with all this allowance, and it is great, they cannot be made to describe a religion which exists only in the head. There is not a worthy passion which silently pervades or tumultuously agitates the breast of man, that has not been enlisted in the cause of God, and encouraged in the Scriptures. Hope, the most animated of the affections, is, in our religion, the ruling spring of ineffable happiness: “Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, has begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus from the dead.” The most impatient desires of religious improvement are represented as a part of the Christian character: “Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness.” “Let him that is athirst come, and I will give unto him the waters of life freely.” Joy enters largely into the Christian temper: “For the fruit of the Spirit is love and joy.” Sorrow, deep, piercing, and humiliating, is not excluded: “Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted;” and, “The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit.” Gratitude is a vital principle of religious obedience; and compassion is a sentiment so essential to religion, that it has even given a name to the righteous; and a merciful is equivalent to a good man: “I will have mercy, and not sacrifice,” was the passage so dear to our compassionate Saviour. Zeal, too, is not to be rejected for its abuses, if Christ, when he gave himself for us, intended not only to “redeem us from iniquity,” but “to purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.” To these Christian affections need not be added the comprehensive one of love; for it is not only represented as the source, attendant, and result of true religion, but it is, in numerous passages, commended as the substance and epitome of duty,—the fulfilling of the law,—the end of the commandment. From this enumeration we may understand, that religion is not a bare comprehension of truths,—not the knowledge and remembrance of facts,—not the confession of a faith, or the observation of duties formally defined; but it is a celestial spirit, which mingles with and informs all our duties, in secret and in public,—which agitates the mass of our intellectual and moral faculties,—which discovers itself in fears and hopes, joys and sorrows, gratitude and humiliation, earnestness and all-hallowed love.

And why is it that in religion alone, things spiritual and invisible are to have no command over the affections? Is not this theory perpetually disproved by every observation of man's ruling passions? The metaphysician becomes extravagantly fond of his obscure and lofty speculations; the mathematician is in raptures with the beauty of a theorem, of which the world sees nothing but the lines and angles; the artist glows with imaginations of ideal beauty; the man of taste has his fancies and his fondnesses, and discerns and loves a thousand inexpressible delicacies, impalpable to ordinary minds. And has religion nothing to elevate the soul, nothing to absorb the thoughts,—to summon the passions,—to make men feel? Because God cannot be seen, shall he be, therefore, excluded from our affections? The single circumstance, that God is not the object of any one of our senses, is abundantly compensated by the consideration that he is never absent from us; that he compasseth continually our path and our lying down, and that we cannot remove a step from the sphere of his presence; that every sigh which escapes us reaches his ear, and not an affectionate movement springs up in our hearts to which he is not intuitively attentive. The faintest glow of gratitude which lights up the countenance, shines before his eyes; and the least cloud of godly sorrow which passes over the brow, sends its shade to the throne of God, encompassed as it is with "undiminished brightness."

That man may well be suspected who takes an active interest in every event that transpires, is busy in every project that is ever undertaken, but in religion only is idle, inattentive, and incredulous. Such a man cannot plead that his feelings are not easily excited, or that his constitutional temperament is lukewarm; and one would think that, if he were dead to every other sentiment, the immense interest which he himself has at stake in eternity, and the still greater interest of a whole world of living souls, to whom religion is all-important, would rouse every latent spark of passion in his breast, and suffer him not to rest in the cause of God, till the affections themselves were quenched in the flood of death.

The causes that modify the exercise of the affections in different minds are extremely numerous, and some of them we proceed to consider:—1. The external exhibition of a man's religious feelings depends much on his original temperament. 2. The religious affections are also considerably modified by the difference of the doctrines embraced. 3. The affections are also modified by the metaphysical direction of religious inquiries.

But there are pursuits of life and habits of mind which repress, and others which utterly destroy, the religious affections,—which freeze the current of the soul's best feelings, and leave us but a name to live, while we are dead. Among these last must be reckoned worldly and avaricious pursuits. "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."

Another destroyer of the religious affections, is the love of pleasure. There are two classes of men that are governed by the love of pleasure;—the gay and fickle, who are ever lost in the rapid succession of amusements; and the sensual, who are ever plunged in gross and criminal enjoyments. But the love of pleasure and the love of God are irreconcilable. They are at continual war; and they never can divide the empire of the same breast. "She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth." 1 Tim. v. 6.

In Rom. viii. 5 the apostle divides all mankind into two great classes,—carnal and spiritual: "They that are after the flesh, do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit, the things of the Spirit." Franck, in his 'Guide to the Reading and Study of the Scriptures,' lays down the following characteristics:—

CHARACTERISTICS OF SPIRITUAL AFFECTIONS.

1. A spiritual affection has for its source the Holy Spirit, and is the fruit of his influence.
2. A spiritual affection tends to a holy end.
3. A spiritual affection is engaged on objects that are divine, eternal, spiritual, and invisible.
4. A spiritual affection, when engaged on sensible objects, is not employed on them as such, but only so far as they have relation to those which are unseen.
5. A spiritual affection is grounded on faith and love. When these do not operate, affections cease to be spiritual.

6. A spiritual affection influences the subject of it to seek, not himself nor his personal convenience, as such, but God and his glory.

7. A spiritual affection overcomes a carnal affection, though the latter be otherwise very violent.

8. A spiritual affection is always connected with humility. The instant the mind is elated, affections become carnal.

9. A spiritual affection excites no perturbation in the mind, nor does it leave behind it any bitterness. It rather assists in the regulation of the soul, receiving every dispensation with complacency, and acquiescing in God with joy.

10. A spiritual affection tends to the amelioration of nature, the increase of grace, and the edification of mankind; having no object but the glory of God.

CHARACTERISTICS OF CARNAL AFFECTIONS.

1. A carnal affection, as it is opposed to those which are spiritual, so it has nature for its source, and is destitute of grace.

2. A carnal affection has for its end the temporal preservation and amendment of nature, or it refers all things to pleasure; and, particularly, seeks such pleasure not in mental peace, but personal convenience,—and this often under a pretext of duty.

3. A carnal affection is engaged on objects that are corporal, local, temporal, and sensitive.

4. A carnal affection, if engaged upon spiritual objects, does not dwell on them as such,—neither with righteous views nor in a consistent manner; but only so far as they have relation to private gratification or convenience.

5. A carnal affection receives its existence and support from perverse self-love.

6. A carnal affection gives the preference to things naturally pleasing, though others may approximate more nearly to real excellence.

7. A carnal affection gradually disturbs the mind when it is at all indulged, rendering it incapable of investigating truth, or of performing righteous actions; and it leaves a degree of bitterness in the mind, proportioned to the strength of the affection. Cicero justly used to term them "The perturbations of the mind."

8. A carnal affection has always a degree of pride in it, though it is often very subtle. As long as this has a place in the mind, carnal affections are not put off.

9. A carnal affection often induces a visible change of the body.

Although the carnal affections are, by these characteristics, separated from the spiritual affections, we are not thence to conclude that they are so separated in the heart of a renewed person, as that the former never mingles with the latter. On the contrary, the believer's daily strife is, to be more and more delivered from the sinful affections of carnal nature. It is according to the reigning affection that a man is denominated carnal or spiritual. It were impious to ascribe any mixture of good and bad affections to the Holy Spirit; though we cannot deny that sacred affections show themselves in a sanctified nature,—by external and natural indications.

That an acquaintance with the doctrine of the affections is an essential requisite in the exposition of the Scriptures, may be proved from reason; for,—1. The affections of love, hatred, desire, hope, fear, joy, sorrow, &c., are frequently to be met with in Holy Writ.

It is evident, therefore, that were we ignorant of these affections, we should be inadequate to the exposition of no inconsiderable part of the Sacred Writings. 2. When no affections are expressed, we must necessarily consider them implied, and that every sentence is of their dictation. 3. Without a knowledge of these emotions, who can inspect the abyss of the human heart, and the depth of those feelings by which it is agitated? And without forming correct ideas of the affections which it proposed to imitate, how shall man, who is carnal, "put them on?" 4. The nature of discourse confirms the position. The words of Christ in Matt. xii. 34, 35, decidedly evidence, that, unless some affection influenced the heart, language would not be uttered; so that a man's words are, in fact, the index of his feelings or affections.

Since, then, the affections are so intimately connected with all language, none will suppose that they are banished from the writings of the inspired penmen; and, because they are closely united with the language of inspiration, it follows that the Sacred Records cannot be adequately expounded by those who are satisfied with the mere shell, and condemn the precious kernel of Scripture,—who watch the lips, but never enter into the feelings of the inspired penmen.

It forms no solid objection to our view of the subject, that many commentators neglect this point of exposition, and pass it over in silence. This consideration is abundantly overruled, by opposing to it the high authorities that have advocated the study of the affections. Luther, for example, says, "Whoever adopts it will, I am satisfied, learn more himself than he can gather from all commentaries united." "An expositor should, as it were, invest himself with the author's mind, in order that he may interpret him as another self." It might be added, that those persons are usually but indifferent examiners of the Scriptures, who, in searching into their meaning, depend partially or entirely on authority. It evidences, as Bernard has observed, that they do not read the Word in the Spirit, under whose influence it was written.

Besides, a consequence deduced from the ignorance or negligence of commentators can avail nothing against the doctrine. It is, indeed, to be lamented, that very few are solicitous to ascertain the spiritual meaning of the Sacred Writings, but are anxious rather to be diffuse on critical, controverted, and difficult points, where there is a wider field for the range of natural intellect. This inattention to the affections is a main reason why some commentaries are so meagre and unsatisfactory to spiritual readers, who, with a view to personal edification, search after the mind of the Spirit, and the revelation of the Divine image. A comment written without adverting to the affections, is so only in name and form.

AFFINITY. The relation which is constituted between persons and families by means of marriage. Thus Solomon is said to have made affinity with Pharaoh by marrying his daughter. 1 Kings iii. 1. There are several degrees of affinity within which marriage was prohibited by the law of Moses, and these are chiefly laid down in Lev. xviii. The general principle is stated in the sixth verse, and various instances are thereafter enumerated illustrating the general principle. The Scripture law, as explained by the Westminster Confession, is thus expressed—"The man may not marry any of his wife's kindred nearer in blood than he may of his own, nor the woman any of her husband's kindred nearer in blood than of her own." Various writers have disputed the view of Scripture on this subject as given by the Confession, and have insisted on a difference being drawn between affinity and consanguinity, maintaining that relationship by affinity does not constitute a barrier to marriage as relationship by consanguinity does. But in reply to this, it is argued that as various passages of Lev. xviii., such as verses 8, 14-17, plainly refer to cases of relationship by affinity, and not by consanguinity, the general law must be understood as extending to relationships of affinity within certain limits, both to relationships constituted by the former marriage of the man himself, and to those constituted by the former marriage of the woman with one of his near blood-relatives; and besides, throughout the whole of the chapter referred to there is an indiscriminate commingling of relationships of affinity and relationships of consanguinity. This may reasonably be held to indicate that we are to look upon the one much in the same way that we are to look upon the other. It does not seem as if God intended us to regard the one kind of relationship as essentially different from the other, but rather to regard both kinds of relationship—that by affinity and that by consanguinity—as to a certain extent identical, at least in so far as marriage is concerned.

AFFIRMATION. This word is sometimes used to denote a solemn averment made by an individual in a court of law, who is scrupulous about taking an oath. Quakers, and some members of other sects, are conscientiously opposed to swearing, even in a court of justice, under an idea that the scriptural injunction, "Swear not at all," actually prohibits oaths of every kind. It was not until a recent period that the English laws permitted affirmations instead of oaths, in criminal cases; and in all such cases, false affirmations are subjected to the same penalties as perjury.

AFFLICTION. A word employed to denote suffering of every kind, whether mental or bodily. That all men, both righteous and wicked, are alike subjected to affliction, it requires no great extent of observation or experience to prove. On a fact so obvious, therefore, it is quite unnecessary to enlarge; but it may be well, shortly to advert to the place which affliction holds in the economy of grace, or in the dispensations of God towards his believing people, as forming at once a preparation for glory, and enhancing, in their estimation, the value of the heavenly inheritance. In powerfully conducing to the accomplishment of both these purposes, which are, in reality, different steps of the same grand process, affliction or suffering of any kind is of peculiar importance. The efficacy of affliction in developing, by the aid of the Divine Spirit, the essential elements of the Christian character, is readily admitted. By the express declaration of Scripture, confirmed by all experience, tribulation is said to work patience; and patience, Christian experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed. In this beautiful passage the apostle delineates, with admirable effect, the successive steps by which affliction operates in the accomplishment of the will of God,—even our complete sanctification. When subjected to the endurance of severe, and perhaps complicated trials, the soul of the believer is subdued to a quiet, and submissive, and patient resignation to the Divine will; and in such a frame of mind we are the most likely to receive the ample communications of the Spirit's influences, and thus to "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ;" and, by a uniform law of the Christian economy, as we advance in Christian experience, our hope of future glory becomes more abiding and more certain. Thus living under the powers of the world to come, the afflicted Christian is able, in some degree, to enter into the feelings of the Psalmist, when he declared, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes." Hence it is that, under a full conviction of its beneficial influence, the apostle could glory even in tribulation. Rom. v. 3. He was willing, as every true Christian ought to be, to endure whatever trials his heavenly Father might appoint, should they tend, under the blessing of God, to the perfecting of that which chiefly concerned him. If Christ be glorified in us, whether by health or sickness, life or death, therein it becomes us especially to rejoice. The path of affliction is sanctified, for it is appointed of God,—it hath been trodden by our great Redeemer and Lord, and it is the safe and certain road to glory. Who, then, shall refuse to walk in it? Who, that can appreciate the value of his immortal soul,—that can rejoice in the anticipation of a blessedness that is unspeakable and full of glory,—who, that earnestly longs and prays for a rapidly progressive meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light,—would decline to participate in those salutary though painful trials by which it hath pleased the Father that both Christ and his people should be made perfect? Why should any one object to the discipline to which a kind and gracious God subjects his most favoured children; for "whom the Father loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." In taking an enlarged view of the Divine arrangements in regard to his Church and people, we cannot fail to perceive the wisdom and propriety of that uniform and universal law, proclaimed irrevocably by the word and providence of the Almighty,—that it is through "much tribulation" we must enter the kingdom of God.

AFGHANS or AFGHANS (a word signifying mountaineers), the name of a powerful tribe in the eastern part of Persia, in the kingdom of Cabul. They originally lived in the mountains between Persia, Hindostan, and Bactria; and even to this day they are wandering in their habits. They are Mussulmans in religion; but boast of being descended from Saul, the first King of Israel. Sir William Jones seems to imagine that they are a remnant of the Ten Tribes of Israel. He thus explains the reasons on which his conclusion is founded:—"We learn from Esdras that the Ten Tribes, after a wandering journey, came to a country called Arsareth, where we may suppose they settled. Now, the Afghans are said, by the best Persian historians, to be descended from the Jews; they have traditions among themselves of such a descent; and it is even asserted that their families are distinguished by the names of Jewish tribes, although, since their conversion to the Islam, they studiously conceal their origin. The Pushto language, of which I have seen a dictionary, has a manifest resemblance to the Chaldaic; and a considerable district under their dominion is called Hazareth, or Hazaret, which might easily have been changed into the word used by Esdras." Such is the opinion of Sir William Jones; but the conjecture, however plausible, is not borne out by any succeeding inquirer. Of late years, in consequence of the melancholy scenes of massacre and bloodshed of which the Afghan territory has been the theatre, public attention has been much directed to that quarter of the world; but, notwithstanding all that has been written upon the manners and customs, the history and traditions, of the Afghans, the alleged antiquity of their descent is as doubtful as ever. It is impossible, indeed, to trace their history further back than the ninth century.

AFRICA, one of the four great divisions of the world, which, though not expressly mentioned, is frequently alluded to in the Sacred Volume. It is a peninsula of a triangular form, connected with Asia by the Isthmus of Suez. It was peopled originally by the descendants of Ham, and hence it is called in the Psalms of David "the land of Ham." The most celebrated portion of Africa and that which occupies the most conspicuous place in the sacred narrative, is Egypt, which was originally peopled by Mizraim. The other parts of Africa mentioned in the Bible, are Ethiopia or Abyssinia, including the ancient Nubia; and Libya, which extends from Alexandria to Cyrene. The Nile, or sacred river of Egypt, is often referred to in the Old Testament. It was on this river that the infant Moses floated in the ark of bulrushes, when he was saved from destruction by Pharaoh's daughter. To the Nile the whole country of Egypt owes its remarkable fertility, being annually irrigated by the overflow of that river at a particular season of the year, when, by means of canals, the water is conveyed to all parts of the land, depositing a rich loamy soil. The ancient name of Egypt was Mizraim, from its first inhabitants. Gen. x. 6, 13, 14. Many of the Canaanites when driven out by Joshua, are supposed to have taken refuge in Africa. The Africans are generally either Mohammedans or idolaters. Jews abound in the northern parts, and in Abyssinia there are still the remnants of what is nominally a Christian church, (see ABYSSINIAN CHURCH), but so overlaid with corruptions and errors, as scarcely to be entitled to the name.

The Gospel is thought to have been carried to Africa by the eunuch of Candace, whom Philip baptized; and probably also by some of those who, from different parts of it, attended the feast of Pentecost. Acts ii. 10. In after-times very flourishing churches were situated on various points of the Mediterranean shore of Africa; but, at present, Mahometanism or idolatry involves almost the whole continent, as has been the case ever since its conquest by the Saracens.

In Abyssinia, as we have already shown under that head, there is a kind of Christian church, but in a very corrupt state. The various missionary societies of Great Britain have turned their attention to some portions of Africa, such as Egypt and Abyssinia, but nowhere with more success than to the various tribes of Pagan idolaters inhabiting the southern parts of that vast continent. There the labours of Vanderkemp, and Philip, and Read, and Moffat, have been above all praise. Through the instrumentality of these and other like-minded missionaries who have laboured in Southern Africa, many of the most degraded and barbarous tribes of Hottentots and Caffres have been converted into Christian and civilized communities.

AGABUS, a prophet of the primitive church, and one of the seventy disciples of our Saviour. Acts xi. 28; xxi. 10. He predicted that a famine would take place over the whole Roman empire, and profane historians inform us his prediction was fulfilled in the reign of Claudius, A.D. 44. The Greeks say that he suffered martyrdom at Antioch.

AGAG. This name appears twice in Scripture as applied to a king of the Amalekites. At an early period one of them is spoken of as very powerful. Num. xxiv. 7. At the head of a large army of the Amalekites he had treated with great cruelty the Israelites as they returned from Egypt. This conduct toward his chosen people excited the displeasure of Israel's God, and he said to Moses, "Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua; for I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven." Exod. xvii. 14. About four hundred years after this, the Lord commanded Saul, the king of Israel, to march against the Amalekites, and to cut them in pieces. This command, however, Saul only partially obeyed, sparing Agag their king, and the choicest of their cattle. It displeased the Lord that Agag had been spared, and he sent Samuel to Gilgal to announce to Saul that for his disobedience in doing the work of the Lord deceitfully the Lord had rejected him from being king over Israel. Agag was put to death at Gilgal by Samuel. When brought into the presence of the prophet, he expressed his hope that the bitterness of death was passed. But Samuel replied, "As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women." Whereupon Agag was hewn in pieces in Gilgal before the Lord, thus showing in a very striking manner that "verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth." Such instances of righteous retribution often occur in the course of God's providential dealings with men, affording obvious illustrations of the holiness of Jehovah, and the certainty that He will by no means clear the guilty.

AGAGITES, a name given to the Amalekites, from Agag their king, whom Saul spared, contrary to the Divine command, but who was put to death by order of the Prophet Samuel in Gilgal.

AGAPÆ, or the FEAST OF LOVE, is thus described by Jones:—"It was a festival practised among the first Christians, with a view of cultivating mutual affection and friendly intercourse among each other. It was early introduced into the Church, and, as some think, is referred to in Acts ii. 46; Jude, verse 12; 2 Pet. ii. 13. It consisted of an entertainment prepared by the richer members, to which all were invited, and was commonly held in the place of worship when the worship of the Lord's day was over. There they testified their love by mutual acts of kindness, by partaking of the same fare, and by liberally supplying the necessities of their indigent brethren. From what Pliny, in his epistle to the Emperor Trajan, says concerning the meetings of the Christians in his day, it would appear that the feast of charity was generally attended to in the evening of the Lord's day, at least in those churches that were in Bithynia, the seat of his jurisdiction. "Their practice is," says he, "to meet before day and sing a hymn to Christ, and to bind themselves by a solemn oath, or sacrament, to do no wickedness: these things performed, they separate and meet again to partake of a common and innocent meal." But the most particular account that we have of these Agapæ, is that given us by Tertullian, in his Apology for the Christians, chap. 39: "We Christians," says he, "look upon ourselves as one body, actuated, as it were, by one soul; and being thus incorporated by love, we can never dispute what we are to bestow upon our own members. And is it any great wonder that such charitable brethren as enjoy all things in common, should have such frequent love-feasts? It is for this you traduce us, and reflect upon our little frugal suppers, not only as infamously wicked, but as exceedingly scandalous. The nature of this supper you may understand by its name, for it is the Greek word for love. We Christians think we can never be too expensive, because we consider all to be gain that is laid out in doing good. When, therefore, we are at the charge of an entertainment, it is to refresh the bowels of the needy. We feed the hungry, because we know God takes a peculiar delight in seeing us do it. If, therefore, we feast only with such excellent and noble designs, I leave you from thence to guess at the rest of our discipline in matters of pure religion. Nothing earthly, nothing impure, has any admittance here. Our souls ascend in prayer to God before we sit down to meat. We eat only what suffices nature, and drink no more than is strictly becoming chaste and regular persons. We sup like servants who know that we may awake in the night to the service of our Master; and we discourse as those who recollect that God hears them. When supper is ended, every one is invited forth to sing praises to God, and by this you may judge of the measure of drinking at a Christian feast. As we begin, so we conclude all with prayer, and depart with the same degree of temperance and modesty with which we came; as men who have not so properly been drinking as imbibing religion." The following account of the mode in which this feast was provided and conducted, occurs in Jamieson's 'Manners and Trials of the Primitive Christians,' pp. 91 and 92: "The rich brought a supply of provisions with them, and when the solemnities of worship were over, they spread a table in the church, on which the voluntary contributions of all were laid; and, after a fervent invocation of the Divine blessing on their social meeting, the viands were distributed to the guests. Every one ate and drank at discretion, but the strictest temperance was observed. And indeed this simple repast was so regulated that it was impossible, in early times, for any excesses to be committed. During the whole continuance of the festival they joined in edifying and Christian conversation,—the richer and better educated kindly mingling with their poorer brethren, and encouraging them to state their sentiments freely on every subject. At a convenient part of the evening, some one gave a short exhortation to unity and brotherly love; and, after others had entertained the company with the singing of a psalm, or some sacred piece of his own composition, and they had joined together in prayer, they all retired to their several places of abode. It was a beautiful practice, indicating, not indeed a golden age of purity, but a state of society where, to a great extent, the disciples, acting in the character of their earliest predecessors, were of one mind and one spirit, and loved to proclaim to the world that the distinguishing badge and motto of their community was,—'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another.' But this interesting custom, in the hands of Christians that did not carry to its observance the pure and exalted feelings that influenced their ancestors, soon degenerated from its primitive character, and became the occasion of many excesses; so that, from being first prohibited to be held in churches, it was afterwards found expedient to observe it only on rare occasions, till at length it fell totally into disuse, and is now associated almost exclusively with the memory of the early age that gave it birth."

AGAPETÆ, a name given to certain virgins and widows who, in the ancient Church, associated themselves with, and attended on, ecclesiastics, out of a motive of piety and charity. See DEACONESSES.

AGATE (shebo), Exod. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12. In the Septuagint and Vulgate, Achates. A precious stone, semi-pellucid. Its variegations are sometimes most beautifully disposed, representing plants, trees, rivers, clouds, &c. Its Hebrew name is perhaps derived from the country whence the Jews imported it; for the merchants of Sheba brought to the market of Tyre all kinds of precious stones. Ezek. xxvii. 22. The agate was the second stone in the third row of the pectoral of the high priest. Exod. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12.

AGE (duration). It sometimes signifies an indefinite period, at others it is used for,—1. A generation of the human race, or thirty years; 2. As the Latin sæculum, a hundred years; 3. Maturity of life, John ix. 21; 4. The latter end of life, Job xi. 17. See CHRONOLOGY.

The whole duration of the life of man is divided into four ages, viz.,—1. Infancy, extending from the first to the fourteenth year; 2. Youth, adolescence, or the age of puberty, commencing at fourteen, and terminating at about twenty-five; 3. Manhood, or the virile age, concluding at fifty; and the last ending at the close of life. Some, however, divide the first period into infancy and childhood; and the last likewise into two stages, calling that which succeeds the age of seventy-five, decrepit old age.

AGEDA, Synod of. This was an assembly of Jewish doctors who met in A.D. 1650, on a plain about thirty leagues distant from Buda in Hungary. The object of this Synod, which was attended by more than three hundred rabbies, besides other Jews of different nations, was to discuss the question whether the Messiah had appeared. After a keen debate, the question was decided in the negative; and the reason assigned for the Messiah's appearance having been delayed, was the impenitence and aggravated wickedness of the Jews. Some ecclesiastics from Rome were present at this meeting, but they were not permitted to take any share in the debate.

AGENCY. (See MORAL AGENCY)

AGES OF THE WORLD. The time before the birth of our Saviour has been generally divided into six ages.

1. From the creation of the world to the deluge, comprehending 1656 years.
2. From the deluge to the entrance of Abraham into the Promised Land, comprehending 426 years.
3. From the entrance of Abraham into the Promised Land to the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt, comprehending 430 years.
4. From the exodus of the Israelites to the foundation of the temple by Solomon, 480 years.
5. From the foundation of the temple to the Babylonish captivity, 424 years.
6. From the Babylonish captivity to the birth of our Lord, 588 years.

These are the different ages before the Christian era, according to the ordinary computation. For further particulars we may refer to the article CHRONOLOGY.

AGNUS DEI (the Lamb of God), a name impiously applied to certain consecrated cakes of white wax, stamped with the figure of a lamb bearing a flag, which are borne in the processions of the Church of Rome, or worn about the neck as amulets, and supposed to possess great virtues; they are at least very profitable to the clergy, and form a considerable source of income. This custom appears to have been borrowed from the heathen in the seventh or eighth century, and distinguished the numerous converts made by the sign of the cross in baptism.

AGONY. This term, expressive of the strongest internal conflict of soul, is used by the Evangelist Luke to describe our Lord's sufferings in the garden of Gethsemane. The words of the evangelists are very strong. Matthew says, he "began to be sorrowful and very heavy;" Mark declares, that he "began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy;" Luke depicts the intensity of inward suffering to be so great, that "his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground." The language thus used in describing this anguish of spirit, implies, as Bishop Pearson well remarks, that he was "suddenly, upon a present and immediate apprehension, possessed with fear, horror, and amazement, encompassed with grief, and overwhelmed with sorrow, pressed down with consternation and dejection of mind, tormented with anxiety and disquietude of spirit." The circumstances attendant upon the "agony" of our Lord were deeply interesting. He had withdrawn from Jerusalem immediately after the institution of the supper, and had retired, accompanied by the whole of his disciples, with one solitary exception, to the outskirts of the city. As he bent his course towards the mount of Olives, he announced to his followers in the plainest terms the sufferings and death which he was soon to undergo. While thus employed, the company arrived at the garden of Gethsemane,—a retired spot at the foot of the mount of Olives, to which the Redeemer frequently resorted for meditation and prayer. On entering the garden, Jesus, leaving the others, went forward with the three favoured disciples, Peter, and James, and John. These were the three who had been present at the raising of the centurion's daughter, and at our Lord's transfiguration on the mount; and now they were selected to be the witnesses of that dreadful anguish of soul which he was about to endure. In preparation for this, the hour and the power of darkness, the Redeemer poured forth his earnest supplications, with strong crying and tears, to Him whose glorious work he was engaged in accomplishing. On returning to the three disciples whom he had left at a little distance, he found them asleep. Well might he exclaim, in the language of pathetic remonstrance and complaint, "What! could ye not watch with me one hour?" At the same time, combining the tenderness and condescension of a forgiving Saviour with the awful rebuke of the Holy One and the Just, he follows up his remonstrance with the gracious apologetic explanation of their conduct, "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." A second time he withdrew, and poured out his heart before his Father in heaven; and on returning to his disciples, he found them again overpowered with sleep. The Saviour retired a third time, and prayed as before. It was now that, being wellnigh overwhelmed under a load of anguish, an angel was sent to strengthen him. His anguish still remained; nay, such was the excruciating suffering to which he was subjected, that blood gushed forth from every pore, and the prophecy was strikingly fulfilled, "I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint; my heart is like wax, it is melted in the midst of my bowels."

What could have given rise to such extreme anguish on the part of our blessed Lord? No outward visible cause can be assigned for this mysterious state of mind. His affliction was of a peculiar kind, for at that dread hour "the Lord was causing to meet upon him the iniquities of us all." The fearful load of a world's iniquities rested upon his devoted head. This explanation can alone account for the appalling severity of the agony which he endured. This alone can explain why "he was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death."

AGONYCLITÆ (not bending the knee), a sect of Christians in the seventh century, who prayed always standing, as thinking it unlawful to kneel.

AGRICULTURE, the art of cultivating the ground, —which was the earliest employment, indeed, in which man was engaged; for when God placed Adam in the garden of Eden, it was with the express design that he might "dress and keep it;" or, in other words, might so labour the ground as to prepare it for bringing forth those plants and vegetables which were necessary for the nourishment of man and beast. And when, in consequence of sin, man was expelled from paradise, he was charged anew to cultivate the ground; and labour was all the more necessary in his altered circumstances, as by the sweat of his brow he was to earn his bread. His eldest son, we are informed, was a tiller of the ground; while Abel, the younger, was employed in the simple occupation of a shepherd. In the early ages of the world, agriculture, as an art, would be only imperfectly understood. This appears, indeed, to have been the case throughout the whole antediluvian period. Not a single remark is made in the Sacred Records, which would lead us to imagine that any other than the rudest implements were used, and the simplest modes of cultivation resorted to. But Noah appears to be marked out as having distinguished himself in agriculture; for it is said that he "began to be a husbandman, and planted a vineyard,"—language which plainly indicates, that Noah had so devoted himself to the study of this important art, as to have made some useful inventions, or discovered some valuable processes.

The land of Judea was peculiarly an agricultural country, and the whole arrangements of the Mosaic law were framed with a view to encourage the cultivation of the soil. No sooner had the Israelites obtained possession of the country, than they devoted their whole efforts to agriculture and the tending of cattle. They had learned the value of the art during their stay in Egypt; and it is impossible to consider, even slightly, their political institutions without perceiving that agriculture was held by them in the highest estimation. Moses, the lawgiver of the Jews, assigned to each citizen a portion of land, which he was permitted to cultivate as his own, and to transmit to his heirs. Should the property be sold, it was to return to its original owner every jubilee, or fiftieth year. By this arrangement the rich were prevented from buying up large tracts of land, and letting them in small portions to the poor. The property of each citizen was marked off from that of his neighbour by boundary-stones, which could not be removed without incurring the wrath of God.

The soil of Palestine was very fruitful, and the utmost attention was paid to its cultivation. Manures of various kinds seem to have been in common use; and as the Jordan periodically overflowed its banks, the mud deposited when its waters subsided could not fail to be valuable, particularly to the pasture-land. At first the ground was turned up in the simplest and rudest manner, with sharpened pieces of wood. The earliest mention made of the plough is in Deut. xxii. 10, where the Israelites are forbidden to plough with an ox and an ass together. In the Prophet Isaiah we find the process of harrowing, or breaking up the ground, also adverted to. Various kinds of grain were sown in Judea; of which are recorded fitches, cummin, wheat, barley, and rye. Three months elapsed between their sowing and their first reaping, and four months to their full harvest. Their barley harvest was at the Passover, and their wheat harvest at the Pentecost. After the grain was cut down and gathered into the barn, it was threshed either by horses or oxen, that trod the corn out of the ear with their hoofs, shod with brass; or more commonly, by flails. When the process of threshing had been completed, the corn was dried in a fire or in a furnace, after which it was ground in mortars or mills, so as to be rendered fit for use. Throughout the Scriptures there are very frequent allusions to the implements and processes of agriculture, evidently showing that the employments of the cultivator were the most familiar to the mind of the Jewish writers; and, therefore, figures drawn from these employments were the most likely to convey the meaning of the writer with emphasis and effect.

AGRIPPA, surnamed Herod, was the son of Aristobulus and Marianne, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was born three years before the birth of Christ, and seven years before the vulgar era. Having been educated under his grandfather's care, he was sent to Rome to ingratiate himself with Tiberius, but being accused of wishing him dead in order that Caligula might reign, he was thrown into prison by order of the emperor. On the accession of Caligula, Agrippa was created King of Batanæa and Trachonitis, and at an after period the Emperor Claudius gave him all Judea and the kingdom of Chalcis. Thus did Agrippa arrive at the possession of a territory equal to, if not greater, than that of his grandfather. In his government of Judea, such was his desire to gratify the Jews, that from this motive he put to death the Apostle James and cast Peter into prison. At Cæsarea he had games performed in honour of Claudius, and here the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon waited on him to sue for peace. It was during this festival that his death occurred. The account of it is thus given by Josephus:—"Upon the second day of the festival, Agrippa went early in the morning to the theatre, in a silver stuff, so wonderfully rich and curious, that the beams of the rising sun striking on it, people's eyes were dazzled with the reflection, and, as the sparkling of the light seemed to have something divine in it, it moved the spectators at the same time both with veneration and dread. Hereupon a crew of fawning parasites cried him up for a god, and beseeched him in form to forgive the sins of their ignorance when they took him only for flesh and blood like another man; but they were now convinced, they said, of an excellency in his nature more than human. This impious flattery passed upon him without either check or repulse; but while he was in the vanity of this contemplation, lifting up his eyes he saw an owl in the air over his head, which he found soon after to be the presage of mischief to him, as it had been before of good luck: for he fell immediately into violent gripes and torments in his bowels, and in his agony, directing his speech to his friends about him, 'Look ye,' says he, 'your god is now condemned to die; and by this fatal necessity I am about to prove all my flatterers to be a company of profligate liars, and to convince the world by dying that I am not immortal; but God's will be done.' With these words his pain increased upon him, so that he was forced to remove into his palace, and as it continued without any manner of abatement, at the end of five days it carried him off, in the fifty-fourth year of his age and the seventh year of his reign." The manner of his death is thus briefly and affectingly told in the sacred narrative:—"And upon a set day Herod, arrayed in royal apparel, sat upon his throne, and made an oration unto them. And the people gave a shout, saying, It is the voice of a god, and not of a man. And immediately the angel of the Lord smote him, because he gave not God the glory: and he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghost." Acts xii. 21-23.

AGRIPPA II., or HEROD AGRIPPA, was the son of the preceding Agrippa, and was only seventeen years of age when his father died. He was educated under the Emperor Claudius, who was inclined to have given him all the dominions which his father possessed; but those who were about him dissuaded him from it; so that, sending Cuspius Fadus as procurator to Judca, he kept Agrippa still at court until he was in a condition to reign. When Herod king of Chalcis died, he gave him his dominions, but soon after translated him to a larger kingdom, for he bestowed on him not only the territories belonging to Philip the tetrarch, but added likewise the country of Abilene, which belonged to Lysanias. Festus, governor of Judea, coming to his government, A.D. 60, King Agrippa and Bernice his sister went to Cæsarea to salute him, and it was on this occasion that Paul delivered in his presence that noble address recorded in Acts xxvi., and under the impression of which the monarch exclaimed, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." When the war broke out between the Jews and the Romans, Agrippa was constrained to join his troops with those of Rome to assist in the taking of Jerusalem. After the destruction of that city, he retired to Rome with his sister Bernice, with whom he had maintained for a long time an improper intimacy, and there died at about seventy years of age.

AGUR, the name of a writer of a collection of proverbs which have been added to those of Solomon, and are now contained in the thirtieth chapter of that book. Gesenius, who regards the name as the Syriac term for one who applies himself to wisdom, seems to consider him as rather an allegorical than a real person. And although it must be admitted that neither Agur himself nor any of his family are mentioned elsewhere in the Sacred Writings, yet the minute and specific description given of him as the son of Jakeh, who had addressed his proverbs originally to Ithiel and Ucal, impresses us with the conviction that he is a real, not a merely mythical individual. Many have supposed that both Agur and Samuel are names applied to Solomon; but this is a mere conjecture, unsupported by any evidence whatever.

AGYNIANS, a sect which appeared about A.D. 694. They condemned all use of flesh, and also of marriage, as not instituted by God, but introduced by the devil. Their name was derived from the latter tenet.

AHAB, the son and successor of Omri. He was one of the most wicked and impious princes that ever sat upon the throne of Israel; for he not only continued the worship of the calves which Jeroboam had set up, but, having married Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre, he gave himself so completely to the influence of this idolatrous woman, that he introduced the worship of Baal, and reared a temple to that god in Samaria. Elijah was sent to reprove him, and to predict a famine, which afterwards happened. About six years after this, Benhadad, king of Syria, invaded Samaria, his capital city. Ahab made a sally while Benhadad and his courtiers were engaged at a banquet, and routed them with great slaughter. The siege was renewed on the following year, but with no better success on the part of the Syrians, and Benhadad was compelled to surrender. A few years after this, however, the Syrians again returned, and Ahab having been fatally wounded in battle, died, B.C. 897.

AHARAH, the third son of Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 1.

AHARHEL, the son of Harum, of the posterity of Judah. 1 Chron. iv. 8.

AHASAI, the son of Meshillemoth, one of those chosen by lot to dwell in Jerusalem after the return from the Babylonish captivity. Nehem. xi. 13.

AHASBAI, father of Eliphelet, one of David's mighty men. 2 Sam. xxiii. 34.

AHASUERUS, a title or surname of different Persian kings. Thus in Ezra iv. 6, it seems to be applied to Cambyses, son of Cyrus, and in Daniel ix. 1, to Astyages, king of the Medes. The Ahasuerus, however, who has excited most discussion among chronologers, is the king of Persia who advanced Esther to be queen, and at her request delivered the Jews from the destruction plotted for them by Haman. Josephus, followed by Prideaux, declares the person meant to be Artaxerxes Longimanus. And this opinion is supported by the circumstance that the Septuagint, throughout the book of Esther, uses Artaxerxes instead of the Hebrew Ahasuerus, and the apocryphal additions to that book every where call the husband of Esther, Artaxerxes. Archbishop Usher regards this king as Darius Hystaspes; and that Atossa was the Vashti, and Artystona the Esther, of the Scriptures. Scaliger maintains that Xerxes was the Ahasuerus, and Hamestris his queen, the Esther of Scripture. Rosenmüller seems to incline strongly to the opinion of Scaliger, and expresses himself indeed with the utmost decision on the subject. "The Ahasuerus of Scripture cannot be Darius Hystaspes; nor do we trace the character of the mild and humane Artaxerxes Longimanus in the capricious despot who repudiates his wife, because she will not expose herself to the public gaze in a drunken festival; raises a favourite vizier to the highest honours one day, and hangs him the next; commands the massacre of a whole people, and then allows them, in self-defence, to commit a horrible carnage among his other subjects: yet all this weak and headstrong violence agrees exactly with the character of that Xerxes who commanded the sea to be scourged, because it brought down his bridge over the Hellespont; beheaded the engineers, because their work was swept away by a storm; wantonly, and before the eyes of the father, put to death the sons of his oldest friend Pythias, who had contributed most splendidly to his expedition; shamefully misused the body of the brave Leonidas; and after his defeat, like another Sardanapalus, gave himself up to such voluptuousness, as to issue an edict, offering a reward to the inventor of a new pleasure."

AHAVA, a river of Babylonia or Assyria, where, as we are informed in Ezra viii. 15, the captive Jews were gathered together by Ezra, with the view of being carried back into Judea, and here he held a solemn fast. The country about this river is supposed to have been Ava, from which the Avites were transferred to replace the captive Jews in Palestine, while some of the Jews settled in the country which the Avites had left, 2 Kings xvii. 24, xviii. 34, xix. 13, xvii. 31. It is on the Ahava, which is thought to have run along the Adiabene, that Ptolemy places the city Abane. At the close of the Babylonian captivity, Ezra, naturally desirous that as many Jews as possible should accompany him back to Palestine, despatched messengers from the banks of the Ahava to the Caspian Mountains, to invite them.

AHAZ, son of Jotham, king of Judah, whom he succeeded at the age of twenty, B.C. 741. He ascended the throne in troublous times. Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, had entered into a confederacy against Judah. But, to encourage Ahaz, the prophet Isaiah was sent with two signs, the one to be accomplished speedily, and the other at some distance of time. The former was, that the son which the prophet then had by his wife should not be of age to discern between good and evil before both these kings should be cut off from the land. The other was, that a virgin should conceive and bear a son, who should be called Emmanuel; so that he might rest quite secure, because the destruction of the house of David could in no case happen until the Messiah should be born. The result was, that the two invading kings speedily raised the siege of Jerusalem and returned home. Notwithstanding this deliverance, Ahaz became more impious and idolatrous than ever. He made his sons pass through the fire to Moloch, in the valley of the sons of Hinnom; he shut up the temple, and destroyed its vessels. The confederate army invaded the kingdom of Judah in the following year, and with much success. The Edomites, also, to the south, and the Philistines to the west, seized on those parts contiguous to them. Thus harassed on all sides, Ahaz applied for assistance to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, consenting to become his vassal and tributary for ever. The more his misfortunes accumulated, the bolder he grew in his impiety; and, at length, by a sudden stroke, he was cut off, in the very prime of his age, after having reigned sixteen years. He was buried in Jerusalem, though, because of his impiety, he was refused a place in the sepulchres of the kings.

AHAZIAH, the son of Ahab, king of Israel, whom he succeeded. His reign extended only over two years. In the first year of his reign, the Moabites, who had always been obedient to the kings of Israel from the first separation of the two kingdoms, took occasion to revolt. Ahaziah was unable to reduce them to subjection, for in the second year of his reign, he fell from the terrace of his house, and was so injured that he died a short time after.

HAZIAH, king of Judah, son and successor of Jehoram and Athaliah. He succeeded his father in the twenty-second year of his age. 2 Kings viii. 26. During his father's sickness, he reigned for two years, and after his father's death, for one year. He received his mortal wound by command of Jehu, and died on reaching Megiddo. He was thence removed to Jerusalem, and buried in the royal sepulchre of his ancestors, and was succeeded by his mother Athaliah, who usurped the throne.

AHIJAH, a native of Shiloh, and one of those who wrote the annals of king Solomon's reign. He is thought to have been the person who spoke twice to Solomon from God; once while he was building the temple, at which time he promised him the Divine protection, 1 Kings vi. 12; and at another time he expressed the indignation of God against him for his many sins. Epiphanius, in his life and death of the prophet, mentions his predictions to Solomon that he would be perverted by women. This prophet predicted also to Jeroboam that he would usurp the kingdom; and, about the end of Jeroboam's reign, he foretold the death of Abijah. 1 Kings xiv. 2.

AHIKAM, the son of Shaphan, one of those who were sent by Josiah, king of Judah, to Huldah the prophetess to consult her concerning the book of the law found in the temple. 2 Kings xxii. 12. By his care Jeremiah was preserved, when it was proposed to give him into the hands of the people to be put to death. Jer. xxvi. 24.

AHILUD, the father of Jehoshaphat, who was the remembrancer, or writer of chronicles, to King David. 2 Sam. viii. 16.

AHIMAAZ, the son of Zadok, the high priest. Ahimaaz succeeded his father under the reign of Solomon. He performed a very important service for David during the war with Absalom. He was succeeded in the priesthood by his son Azariah.

AHIMELECH, a priest of Nob, to whom David went, and whom Saul commanded to be put to death, along with other priests, for assisting David.

AHITHOPHEL, a celebrated character in Scripture. He was at one time David's most intimate friend and counsellor, but afterwards became his most inveterate enemy; for, after Absalom had succeeded in exciting a general disaffection to his father's government, Ahithophel instantly joined him, and became the most active of all the conspirators. David was more alarmed by the defection of this experienced politician, than by all the thousands who crowded round the standard of rebellion; and he earnestly prayed that the Lord might turn his counsel into foolishness. It was not without reason that David was thus alarmed; for we find Ahithophel instantly recommending the most prompt and effectual measures to destroy the power and authority of his former friend.

AHOLIBAH AND AHOLAH, two fictitious names adopted by the prophet Ezekiel, to denote the two kingdoms of Judah and Samaria. They are represented as two sisters of Egyptian extraction, Aholah being put for Samaria, and Aholibah for Jerusalem, the first importing a tent, and the second my tent is in her. As both those kingdoms prostituted themselves to the Egyptians and Assyrians, by imitating their idolatrous practices, the Lord abandoned them to those very people for whom they had shown so passionate and so impure an affection. They were by them carried into captivity, and subjected to the severest servitude. Ezekiel xxiii. 4.

AI, called by the Septuagint Agai, by Josephus Ainc, and by others Ajah, a small city of the Canaanites, about twelve miles distant from Jericho. It is mentioned in the history of Abraham, who, both before and after his going into Egypt, pitched his tent at Ai, or Hai, as it was then called. After the taking of Jericho, Joshua sent against Ai three thousand soldiers, but they were repulsed by the inhabitants, in consequence, as it was revealed to them, of the sin of Achan, who had appropriated to himself part of the spoils of Jericho. This offence having been expiated, Ai was again attacked, taken by stratagem, and destroyed. The district of Ai was afterwards included in the possessions of the Benjamites, who rebuilt the city; but it was taken, and destroyed by Sennacherib. Isa. x. 28. It was again rebuilt, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. Neh. xi. 31. But almost no traces of it are now to be found.

AICHMALOTARCH signifies the prince of the captivity, or chief of the captives. The Jews pretend that this was the title of him who had the government of their people during the captivity of Babylon; and they believe these princes or governors to have been constantly of the tribe of Judah, and family of David. But they give no satisfactory proof of the real existence of these Aichmalotarchs. There was no prince of the captivity before the end of the second century, from which period the office continued till the eleventh century. The princes of the captivity resided at Babylon, where they were installed with great ceremony, held courts of justice, &c., and were set over the eastern Jews, or those settled in Babylon, Chaldea, Assyria, and Persia.

AIJALON, or AJALON, the city of oaks; a city of the Canaanites; the valley adjoining to which is memorable in sacred history from the miracle of Joshua, in arresting the course of the sun and moon, that the Israelites might have sufficient light to pursue their enemies. Joshua x. 12, 13. On this subject Professor Robinson, the author of 'Researches in Palestine,' says,—“Looking down from Upper Bethoron, a broad valley is seen in the south-west issuing from the mountains and hills into the plain; while on the ridge that skirts its south-west side is seen a village called Yálo, the Arabic form for the Hebrew Ajalon. This, then, is probably the spot where Joshua, in pursuit of the five kings, having arrived at or near Upper Bethoron, looked back toward Gibeon and down upon the valley before him, and uttered the command—‘Sun, stand thou still on Gibeon, and thou moon in the valley of Ajalon.’” Aijalon was afterwards a Levitical city.

AIJELETH-SHAHAR. These words, which denote “the hind of the morning,” form the superscription of the twenty-second psalm. They have been very variously interpreted. “Those now,” says Hengstenberg, “who keep by the ascertained sense of the words, are generally of opinion that these words are either the beginning of a song, or a passage from one, the tune appropriate to which is to be sung to this psalm, like ‘the hind of the morning.’ These, again, are divided as to whether the expression must be understood as denoting a proper hind, or, according to Gesenius, as the poetical phrase for the rising sun. This last interpretation is without any analogy in the Hebrew language, and has very insufficient ground to rest on—the application of the figurative term, roe, in the Arabic poets, to the rising sun, and the practice of the Talmud, which, however, is not unconnected with the passage, but obviously flows from it. This whole exposition, however, has this against it, that there is not one single ascertained case in which a poem is quoted in the title, the appropriate tune of which is to be sung to the psalm.” Hengstenberg, however, seems to be of opinion that the “hind” is used by David for a suffering good man.

AIR, the fluid, transparent, elastic substance which surrounds our globe, encompassing it on all sides, and extending to a height above its surface which has been variously calculated by natural philosophers, but generally reckoned equal to about forty miles above its surface. Though atmospheric air be invisible, it possesses all the principal attributes of matter. It enters bodies through the most minute pores, and adheres to them strongly. Water and all liquids always contain it, and it can only be expelled by a strong heat. It is indispensable to the life of all organic bodies; and it is a remarkable instance of the wisdom and goodness of the great Creator, that in its constitution the atmosphere is so admirably adapted to the animals and vegetables inhabiting the globe which it surrounds. The atmosphere is not a simple element, as was once supposed, but a compound body consisting chiefly of two airs or gases, possessed of very different properties, in the proportion by bulk of twenty-one parts of the one to seventy-nine of the other, or of nearly one to four. Oxygen, though it be in the smaller proportion, is the component from which the air derives its power of maintaining fire, supporting animal life, and conducing to the life and growth of plants. Nitrogen or azote, though existing in the air in much greater proportion than oxygen, is generally supposed to act merely the part of a diluent, and to answer no other purpose than to prevent the too great energy of the oxygen on living animals and growing vegetables. Besides these two ingredients, atmospheric air contains a small portion of carbonic acid gas, a substance which, though in itself deleterious to animals, is a principal part of the food of plants. The following beautiful remarks on the uses of the atmosphere as a proof of design on the part of God, occur in the admirable Bridgewater Treatise of Professor Whewell:—

“If the atmosphere be considered as a vast machine, it is difficult to form any just conception of the profound skill and comprehensiveness of design which it displays. It diffuses and tempers the heat of different climates; for this purpose it performs a circulation occupying the whole range from the pole to the equator; and while it is doing this, it executes many smaller circuits between the sea and the land. At the same time, it is the means of forming clouds and rain, and for this purpose, a perpetual circulation of the watery part of the atmosphere goes on between its lower and upper regions. Besides this complication of circuits, it exercises a more irregular agency, in the occasional winds which blow from all quarters, tending perpetually to restore the equilibrium of heat and moisture. But this incessant and multiplied activity discharges only a part of the functions of the air. It is, moreover, the most important and universal material of the growth and sustenance of plants and animals; and is for this purpose everywhere present, and almost uniform in its quantity. With all its local motion, it has also the office of a medium of communication between intelligent creatures, which office it performs by another set of motions, entirely different both from the circulation and the occasional movements already mentioned; these different kinds of motions not interfering materially with each other: and this last purpose, so remote from the others in its nature, it answers in a manner so perfect and so easy, that we cannot imagine that the object could have been more completely attained, if this had been the sole purpose for which the atmosphere had been created. With all these qualities, this extraordinary part of our terrestrial system is scarcely ever in the way; and when we have occasion to do so, we put forth our hand and push it aside, without being aware of its being near us.

"We may add, that it is, in addition to all that we have hitherto noticed, a constant source of utility and beauty in its effects on light. Without air we should see nothing, except objects on which the sun's rays fell, directly or by reflection. It is the atmosphere which converts sunbeams into daylight, and fills the space in which we are with illumination.

"The contemplation of the atmosphere, as a machine which answers all these purposes, is well suited to impress upon us the strongest conviction of the most refined, far-seeing, and far-ruling contrivance. It seems impossible to suppose that these various properties were so bestowed and so combined, any otherwise than by a beneficent and intelligent Being, able and willing to diffuse organization, life, health, and enjoyment, through all parts of the visible world; possessing a fertility of means which no multiplicity of objects could exhaust, and a discrimination of consequences which no complication of conditions could embarrass."

AIRANI, an obscure sect of Arians in the fourth century, who denied the consubstantiality of the Holy Ghost with the Father and the Son. They are otherwise called Airanists, and are said to have taken their name from one Airos, who distinguished himself at the head of this party in the reigns of Valentinian and Gratian.

ALABASTER, the name of a genus of fossils nearly allied to marble. It is a bright, elegant stone, sometimes of a snowy whiteness. It may be cut freely, and is capable of a fine polish; and, being of a soft nature, it is wrought into any form or figure with ease. Vases or cruises were anciently made of it, wherein to preserve odoriferous liquors and ointments. Pliny and others represent it as peculiarly proper for this purpose; and the druggists in Egypt have, at this day, vessels made of it, in which they keep their medicines and perfumes. In Matt. xxvi. 6, 7, we read that Jesus being at table in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, a woman came thither, and poured an alabaster box of ointment on his head. Mark adds, "She brake the box;" which merely refers to the seal upon the vase, which closed it, and kept the perfume from evaporating. This had never been removed, but was on this occasion broken; that is, first opened. We are informed, in Jamieson's 'Eastern Manners,' that "The perfumes then, and still, most in request in the East, are rose-water, aloes-wood, cassia, costmary, and the various well-known spices of India and Arabia; and they were preserved either in little boxes of gold, or, what was far more common, in little oval narrow-necked phials of the finest white alabaster; a name which it received from its extraordinary resemblance to the precious stone of that name, though it was itself a marble of a very valuable description, found in the quarries of Upper Egypt, or in the Libanus of Syria. In such immense quantities was this costly treasure obtained there, that, long before the time of Christ, alabaster was in such general use, that the name was universally applied to boxes of perfume, whatever was the material of which it consisted."

ALAMMELECH, a city mentioned in Joshua xix. 26. It belonged to the tribe of Asher. Its particular situation is uncertain, but it was not far distant from mount Carmel.

ALAMOTH, the title of the forty-sixth Psalm. The Septuagint translates this, "The song of hidden things," because, says Ainsworth, this song declares the secret purposes of God to his Church. Others regard Alamoth as a musical instrument.

ALARM,—(1.) A broken quivering sound of the Hebrews' silver trumpets. It warned them to take their journey in the wilderness, and to attack their enemies in battle. Num. x. 4-9. (2.) A noise or bustle, importing the near approach of danger and war. Joel ii. 1.

ALBANENSES and ALBANOIS, petty sects of the eighth century; probably the remains of the Gnostics and the Manichæans: which see.

ALBATI, hermits of the end of the fourteenth century, who wore long white garments; whence their name.

ALBIGENSES, a body of reformers in Languedoc, who sprung up about the twelfth century, and distinguished themselves by their opposition to the Church of Rome. They were hated and despised, persecuted and tormented, and at length they were almost completely exterminated. They have sometimes been confounded with the Waldenses, with whom they agreed in all essential points of doctrine, and more especially in their resistance of Papal usurpation. The Albigenses received much countenance and protection from Raymond VI., count of Toulouse, who, on that account, incurred the fierce denunciations of the Roman Pontiff, and was compelled to submit to the most degrading humiliation, and even to assume the cross against his own subjects, whom he had hitherto pitied and protected. A nephew of this unhappy man, who had accompanied him on his journey of submission, and been indignant at the manner in which it was received, determined to adopt a very different course. With this view, he hastened to his own feudal sovereignty, and took immediate steps for defending himself against the overwhelming forces of the great ecclesiastical despot. In 1209, the crusading army of the Pontiff entered Languedoc, and massacred the Albigenses with unrelenting cruelty. Beziers, one of the chief cities of the province, was first attacked, and although Raymond Roger implored the Papal legate to have mercy upon the unfortunate people, the only condition on which the request could be granted, was their entire and immediate submission to the Romish Church. The Albigenses would not accept favour on any such condition, declaring, that as for the Pope, he might kill their bodies, but could not injure their souls. In vain did the Roman Catholic inhabitants of the town represent, in the strongest terms, their adherence to the faith. The haughty Arnold, with his ferocious followers, rushed upon the town, and levelling it with the ground, he indiscriminately massacred Roman Catholics and Protestants.

Raymond Roger, the young lord of Beziers, shocked at the cruelty and treachery of the Papal power, shut himself up in Carcassonne, resolved to hold out against the united forces of France and Rome. The enemy sat down before the gates, and though their army was three hundred thousand strong, the brave Albigenses maintained their position for a long period. At last, under pretence of inviting him to a friendly conference, the legate succeeded in treacherously obtaining possession of the unsuspecting Raymond, who died, probably by the hand of violence, soon after he had been arrested.

The small territory over which Raymond Roger had ruled, passed into the hands of Simon de Montfort, who felt himself compelled, in fulfilment of one of the conditions on which he entered upon his inheritance, to make war upon the heretics. He proceeded accordingly to attack several of their towns, and while, for a time, resistance was successfully maintained, castle after castle was taken from the unfortunate Albigenses, and the heretical peasants were treated with a savage barbarity and cruelty scarcely to be credited. Montfort was desirous of adding Toulouse to the territories which he had obtained. To the accomplishment of this object, he set himself with the utmost determination. One place after another surrendered to his authority, and at length he proceeded to besiege the city of Toulouse itself. The Albigenses, however, held out so vigorously, that the siege was protracted for nine months, and Montfort having been killed by a stone, the enemy were routed, and the Albigenses maintained possession of the place. This triumph, however, was only for a time. The persecutor Montfort was succeeded by his son Amaury, who at least equalled, if he did not excel, his father in violent hatred of the poor inhabitants of Albigeois. Besides, he was backed by the power of France, with Louis the Dauphin at its head. Toulouse was again attacked in 1219, but still without success, and Amaury was gradually deprived of his territorial possessions, so that he was ultimately compelled to surrender the whole which his father had unjustly acquired, and to take refuge at the court of Louis VIII., king of France. Thus, in the mysterious arrangements of Providence, Trevençal, the son of the late Raymond Roger, was reinstated in all those patrimonial possessions which appeared to have been irrevocably lost. The king of France next took the field against the Albigenses, authorised and supported by the Papal See. He marched triumphantly through the length and breadth of their country. Every castle and city surrendered, and the land, almost depopulated by a fifteen years' persecution, passed into the hands of the conqueror, who, as he left the scene of his easy triumph, was smitten by the stroke of death. Louis IX. was but a child at his father's death, but his mother, Blanche, who took the reins of government, resolved to signalize her rule by carrying on the crusade against the Albigenses. The people had been almost exterminated, but "the clergy thought that a sufficient example had not been given of the evils of heresy, so long as a single town that had nursed it encumbered the ground; the very stone and lime, in their eyes, seemed to be polluted with a plague spot, that could not be cured, until these habitations were broken into fragments, and the fragments themselves swept away." In such a spirit, the land of the Albigenses once more became the scene of desolating warfare. The fruitful province of Languedoc was reduced to a wilderness, and the few Albigenses who had survived the previous persecutions took refuge in other lands, in Austria, Piedmont, Bohemia, and even in England, where they afterwards reappeared under the name of Lollards. But the very events which drove these faithful men into other regions, tended to scatter far and wide the imperishable seed of Divine truth, which sprung up after many days in the glorious harvest of the blessed reformation. The name of the Albigenses disappeared after the middle of the thirteenth century, but the doctrines which they professed can never perish, but are destined, in process of time, to be diffused throughout every region of the habitable globe.

The Albigenses have sometimes been confounded with the Waldenses. The only point, however, in which these two classes of reformers resembled each other, was in their determined hostility to the corruptions of Papal Rome. The Albigenses, besides inhabiting a different country from the Waldenses, were prior to them in point of time. Various Roman Catholic writers have attempted to fasten upon the persecuted Albigenses the charge of Manicheism; but, it ought to be remembered, the mere existence of individuals holding these heretical opinions in Languedoc, as well as in other places, by no means authorises us in charging the Albigenses with such sentiments. Many other errors have been imputed to them, with the view of weakening their testimony against the Romish Church; but it is impossible to trace their history, however cursorily, without perceiving that the testimony which they sealed with their blood is one which no calumny can discredit—no false imputation can in the slightest degree disparage.

ALCORAN. See KORAN.

ALEMETH, or ALMON, a sacerdotal city belonging to the tribe of Benjamin. Josh. xxi. 18. Some ancient geographers assert Alemeth and Almon to be separate cities; but Calmet believes them to be the same.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, who overthrew the Persian Empire, was born at Pella in Macedonia, in the third year of the reign of Ochus, about 356 B.C. His father, Philip, had been chosen captain-general of all Greece, which at this time made a very considerable figure in history, for carrying on the war against Persia; but when he was just ready to set forward upon that expedition, he was slain at home, while he was celebrating the marriage of Cleopatra his daughter with Alexander king of Epirus.

Upon his death, Alexander his son succeeded him in the kingdom of Macedon, when he was twenty years old; and having been chosen, as his father was, to command the Grecian forces against Persia, he took the field, and in one campaign only, overran almost all Asia Minor; vanquished Darius in two pitched battles; took his mother, wife, and children prisoners; and, having subdued all Syria, came to Tyre; but there he met with a stop; for the Tyrians, in confidence of the strength of the place, and of assistance from their allies, when he would have entered the city, denied him admittance.

While his army was besieging Tyre he sent out his commissioners, requiring the inhabitants of the neighbouring countries, namely, of Galilee, Samaria, and Judea, to submit to him, and to furnish him with what he wanted. Other provinces complied; but the Jews, pleading their oath to Darius, by which they thought themselves bound not to acknowledge any new master so long as he was alive, refused to obey his commands. This exasperated the conqueror not a little, who, in the flush of his many successes, could bear no contradiction; and therefore, as soon as he had done with Tyre, he marched directly against Jerusalem.

Jaddus the high priest, who at this time had the chief government of the Jews under the king of Persia, was in dreadful apprehensions of what the event might prove: but having no protection to depend on but God's, he, and all Jerusalem with him, made their cries and supplications to Him, imploring his mercy for their deliverance from the approaching storm; whereupon he was ordered, in a vision of the night, to go out and meet Alexander, whenever he should come, in his pontifical robes, with the priests attending him in their proper habits, and all the people in white garments.

Jaddus, next day, with the priests and people, habited in the manner directed, went out of the city to a certain eminence, which commanded the prospect of all the country round, and there waited the coming of Alexander. As soon as the high priest saw him at some distance, he moved towards him in this solemn pomp; which struck the king with such an awe, that, as he drew near, he bowed down to him, and saluted him with a religious veneration, to the great surprise of all that attended him.

While every one stood amazed at this behaviour, Parmenio, his first favourite, took the freedom to ask him, how it came to pass, that he whom all mankind adored, paid such adoration to the Jewish high priest? To which his reply was, "That he did not pay that adoration to him, but to the God whose high priest he was; that while he was at Dio in Macedonia, and deliberating with himself how to carry on the war with Persia, that very person, and in that very habit, appeared to him in a dream, encouraging him to pass boldly over into Asia, and not to doubt of success, because God would be his guide in the expedition, and give him the empire of the Persians; and that therefore from hence he was assured that he made the present war under the conduct of that God, to whom, in the person of this high priest, he paid adoration." And hereupon, turning to Jaddus again, he embraced him very kindly: and so, going into the city with him, offered sacrifices to God, in the temple, where the high priest showed him the prophecies of Daniel, predicting the overthrow of the Persian empire by a Grecian king, which he applied to himself, and thereby confirmed his opinion that God had chosen him to execute this great work.

When he left Jerusalem, he offered to grant the people whatever immunities the high priest should desire; but he requested no more than a toleration to live according to their own laws and religion, and an exemption from the payment of tribute every seventh year, because on the sabbatical year the Jews were forbidden to till their ground. This he readily consented to, and having signified his pleasure, that if any of them were minded to list in his troops, he would readily receive them, great multitudes did hereupon offer their service, and followed him in his other expeditions.

No sooner was he well got out of the city, but the Samaritans met him in great pomp and parade, desiring of him, that he would likewise honour their city and temple with his presence. He was then hastening to Egypt, he told them, but that when he returned, if his affairs would permit him, he would not fail to comply with their desires; and when they requested of him an immunity from all taxes every seventh year, because they, as well as the Jews, did every seventh year suffer their land to lie fallow, he asked them if they were Jews, because to them only he had granted that privilege. Their answer was, that they were Hebrews, but that the Phœnicians called them Sichemites: whereupon, having no leisure to make any farther inquiry into the matter, he referred this likewise to his return, when he promised to examine into their pretensions, and to do them justice; but before his return, they had done enough to incense him against them.

On his going from these parts into Egypt, he had made Andromachus, a special favourite of his, governor of Syria and Palestine; who, coming to Samaria, in order to settle some affairs, was burnt to death in his house, which the people set on fire, out of rage and discontent, very probably, that the privileges, which were granted to their enemies the Jews, were denied to them. This barbarous action exasperated Alexander not a little; insomuch that, having caused those who had acted any part in the murder of the governor to be put to death, he drove all the rest of the inhabitants out of Samaria, planted therein a colony of Macedonians, and gave the rest of their territories to the Jews.

It is not well agreed among historians, how this great conqueror of the world died. Some of them are of opinion, that he was poisoned by the proenrement of Antipater, whom he had left governor of all his dominions in his absence, and who, for his maladministration, had been lately dismissed; and, therefore, fearing to be called to an account, did, by the hands of his sons, who were about the person of the king, and one of them his cup-bearer, execute this treason upon his master's life, in order to save his own; but in the judgment of other historians he died by nothing but excessive drinking and dissipation, for which it is admitted on all hands he was notorious, in the thirty-third year of his age, after a reign of twelve years, six years as king of Macedonia, and six more as monarch of Asia. He was a man of a bold, enterprising spirit, but fuller of fire than discretion. His actions, though they were attended with success, were carried on with a furious and extravagant rashness; and the few virtues that he had were obscured with much greater vices. Vain-glory was the predominant passion of his soul; and the fables of the ancient Greek heroes, the only chart by which he steered his conduct.

ALEXANDER,—1. An individual whose father, Simon, was compelled to bear the cross of our Saviour. Mark xv. 21. 2. One of the council mentioned in Acts iv. 6 as having been present when Peter and John were examined in reference to the healing of the man who had been lame from his birth. Some have imagined him to have been the brother of Philo, the celebrated Jewish writer, who lived in the time of Caligula. 3. A Jew, who was employed by his countrymen to harangue the people of Ephesus, at the time of the sedition raised in that city by Demetrius against Paul. The Ephesians, when they knew that he was a Jew, refused to listen to him. Beza and others conjecture that he was Alexander the copper-smith, who is said (2 Tim. iv. 14) to have done the apostle much evil. 4. Another person of this name is said (1 Tim. i. 19, 20) to have made shipwreck concerning the faith, and whom the apostle "delivered over unto Satan;" that is, banishing him from the Christian Church, as an excommunicated person.

ALEXANDRIA, a famous city of Egypt, and long the grand seat of commerce and of wealth. It was founded or enlarged about 333 years before Christ, and is now the only remaining monument of the widely extended conquests of that great and renowned warrior after whom it was named. The long and severe check which he met with before the city of Tyre, in the career of his victories, would, no doubt, convince him of the vast resources of a maritime power, and of the immense importance of commerce; and it was this which is supposed to have induced him, after the subjection of Egypt, to avail himself of the favourable commercial situation of that country, and to lay the foundation of that city, which, from its vicinity to the Mediterranean sea and the Arabian gulf, has, amidst all the successive revolutions of Egypt, from the time of the Ptolemies till the discovery of the navigation by the Cape of Good Hope, commanded the trade of both the East and the West. From that period, however, which begins a new era in the history of commerce, the trade of India has flowed in other channels; and the streams of its former wealth being dried up, Alexandria has gradually decayed, and is now deserving of notice only on account of its past greatness and celebrity. Alexander himself drew the plan of the new city; and as there were no instruments at hand proper for the purpose, he traced out the course of the walls by scattering meal along the ground,—a circumstance which his soothsayer interpreted as a pre-sage of future abundance. The execution of the plan was intrusted to Dinocrates, the celebrated architect who rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus, whilst Alexander advanced to survey the wonders of Upper Egypt. Upon his return, about a year afterwards, the city was nearly finished; and having peopled it with inhabitants from the neighbouring towns, he pursued the course of his conquests.

Ancient Alexandria stood about twelve miles from the Canopic or westerly branch of the Nile, with which it was united by a canal. The lake Mareotis bathed its walls on the south, and the Mediterranean on the north. It was divided into straight parallel streets, cutting one another at right angles. One great street, two thousand feet wide, ran through the whole length of the city, beginning at the gate of the sea, and terminating at the gate of Canopus. It was intersected by another of the same breadth, which formed a square at their junction half a league in circumference. From the centre of this great place the two gates were to be seen at once, and vessels arriving under full sail from both the north and the south. In these two principal streets, the noblest in the universe, stood their most magnificent palaces, temples, and public buildings, in which the eye was never tired with admiring the marble, the porphyry, and the obelisks, which were destined at some future day to embellish the metropolis of the world. The chief glory of Alexandria was its harbour. It was a deep and secure bay in the Mediterranean, formed by the shore on the one side, and the island of Pharos on the other, and where numerous fleets might lie in complete safety. Without the walls of Alexandria, and stretching along the shores of the Mediterranean, near to the promontory of Lectreos, was situated the palace and gardens of the Ptolemies. They contained within their inclosure the museum,—an asylum for learned men; groves and buildings worthy of royal majesty; and a temple, where the body of Alexander was deposited in a golden coffin. It were endless to enumerate the many palaces, temples, theatres, and other buildings with which Alexandria and its suburbs were adorned.

Alexandria owed much of its glory to the Ptolemies. Ptolemy Soter, the first of that line of kings, and one of the captains of Alexander, who, on the death of his master, seized on his Egyptian dominions, fixed the royal residence in this city, about 304 years before Christ. This prince instituted the academy called the Musenm, in which a society of learned men devoted themselves to the study of the sciences. He likewise founded, for their use, the Alexandrian library, which was afterwards so prodigiously increased, and one of the greatest ornaments of this celebrated city. It is said to have amounted to no less than seven hundred thousand volumes, before its destruction. With these advantages, and under the continued patronage of its sovereigns, Alexandria soon became one of the most distinguished seats of learning and philosophy, and preserved its celebrity till it was plundered of all its literary treasures by the barbarous hands of the Saracens. Ptolemy Philadelphus, the son of Soter, completed the tower of Pharos, which his father had already begun. This was the famous lighthouse which was built on the island of that name, for the direction of the innumerable vessels which entered the harbour, and was reckoned amongst the wonders of the world.

Alexandria continued for nearly three hundred years in the possession of the Ptolemies; but at the death of Cleopatra it passed into the power of the Romans, and was the theatre of several memorable events in the history of that people. It sometimes might receive a favour at the hands of its masters; but it as frequently obtained its full share of all the calamities which the tyranny, the cruelty, or weakness of the Roman emperors inflicted on the rest of the empire.

The first inhabitants of Alexandria were Egyptians and Greeks, to whom must be added numerous colonies of Jews, transplanted thither, B.C. 336, 320, and 312, to increase the population; who, becoming familiar with the Greek language and learning, were called HELLENISTS. It was they who made the well-known translation of the Old Testament, under the name of the Septuagint. See SEPTUAGINT.

The modern Alexandria, now called Scandaria, does not occupy the site of the ancient city, of which only the ruins remain. The town has now two citadels and harbours, and its commerce is improving; but the population, which formerly amounted to three hundred thousand, is now reduced to thirteen thousand. It is the seat of a Christian patriarch, but under a Mahometan power. The history of its conquest and consequent decay, according to the best historians, is as follows:—

The Saracens, A.D. 638, invaded Egypt, and the following year Amrou, their general, commenced the siege of Alexandria; which was, perhaps, the most arduous enterprise in the annals of his conquests. After a vigorous resistance of about fourteen months, both parties fighting with intense bravery, the Saracens, however, prevailed, and the standard of Mahomet was planted on the walls of the capital of Egypt. It was at this time that the Alexandrian library met with its memorable fate.

Under the Roman and Greek emperors, as well as under the Ptolemies, for nearly a space of one thousand years, Alexandria continued to maintain its reputation for power and wealth, and likewise for literature and science; but from the period when it came under the dominion of the Saracens, all its glories have declined, till it has gradually arrived at its present degradation. When commerce revived in the thirteenth century, it naturally looked out for its former well-known channel; and the condition of Alexandria began again for a short time to brighten; but the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope, which happened about that time, soon crushed its returning prosperity, and for ever diverted the sources of its wealth into a different course.

magnificent ruin and desolation. For the space of two leagues, nothing is to be seen but the remains of pilasters, of capitals, and of obelisks, and whole mountains of shattered monuments of ancient art, heaped upon one another to a greater height than that of the houses. The famous tower of Pharos has been long since demolished, and a square castle, without taste, ornament, or strength, erected in its stead. The lake Mareotis, through the carelessness of the Turks in preserving the canals which conveyed the waters of the Nile, no longer exists; but its place is now occupied by the sands of Lybia.

But it is the ecclesiastical history of Alexandria in which the biblical student is chiefly interested; and therefore it may be proper to follow up the preceding account with a few of the more important particulars of that kind which are upon record.

When Alexander the Great had finished this renowned city, he gave considerable encouragement to the Jews to settle in it; and to induce them so to do, he endowed it with peculiar privileges and immunities, allowed them the free exercise of their religion, and admitted them to a share of the same franchises and liberties which he granted to his own Macedonian subjects. Not long after the death of that ambitious and enterprising monarch, Ptolemy, king of Egypt, invaded Judea, laid siege to Jerusalem, of which he took possession about 320 years before Christ, and carried an hundred thousand of the Jews captive into Egypt; to whom he confirmed all the immunities and privileges which had been formerly granted to their brethren by Alexander the Great, and spared no encouragement to allure others to settle in Egypt. The consequence of this was, that multitudes of them were continually flocking thither from Judea and Samaria,—preferring rather to live under so generous and friendly a prince in a foreign country, than to be subject to the incessant changes of government which were occasioned by so many contending tyrants in their own. Accordingly, the city of Alexandria was in a great measure peopled by Jews; and it is chiefly this circumstance which connects its history with the elucidation of the Scriptures. Hence we read, Acts ii. 10, that among those who came up to Jerusalem to keep the feast of Pentecost, there were Jews, devout men, from Egypt and the parts of Lybia about Cyrene, in which Alexandria was situated. Of this city, Apollos, the companion of Paul, was a native (Acts xviii. 24); and of the Jews that disputed with Stephen, and put him to death, many were Alexandrians, who, it seems, had a synagogue at that time in Jerusalem. Acts vi. 9. But to form an estimate of the number of Jews that stately resided at Alexandria, it may be sufficient to mention, that about the year of Christ 67, while the quarrel was going on between that people and the Romans, which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem and its temple, the subversion of their ecclesiastical polity, and their ruin as a nation, fifty thousand of them were put to death at one time in the city of Alexandria! It is said that at the time this terrible event took place, there were not less than a million of Jews dispersed throughout the whole province of Egypt, in which they had a vast number of synagogues and oratories, which were either demolished or consumed by fire, for refusing to set up the statues of the Roman emperor, Caius Caligula.

Christianity was planted in Alexandria at a very early period; and it is very probable that it was first carried there by some of the Jews who were converted by the preaching of Peter on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii.); for nothing can be more natural than to suppose, that those who had themselves been blessed with the knowledge of the Saviour, should carry the glad tidings with them to their own homes, and make known the way of salvation to others. For several ages the light of the glorious gospel shone conspicuously in this great city, which gave birth to many eminent men, particularly to Clemens, to Origen, and others. This city is also famous for having given rise to the Arian controversy, respecting the doctrine of Christ's Sonship,—a subject, however, which properly comes under another article. See ARIUS.

ALEXANDRIAN MANUSCRIPT, a famous copy of the Scriptures, in four volumes folio. It contains the whole Bible in Greek, including the Old and New Testament, with the Apocrypha, and some smaller pieces, but not quite complete. It is preserved in the British Museum, where it was deposited in 1753; it was sent as a present to king Charles I. from Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, by Sir Thomas Rowe, ambassador from England to the Grand Seignior about the year 1628. Cyrillus brought it with him from Alexandria, where probably it was written. In a schedule annexed to it, he gives this account:—That it was written, as tradition informed them, by Thecla, a noble Egyptian lady, about thirteen hundred years ago, not long after the council of Nice. There can be no doubt that it came to England from Alexandria, and hence it has received the name of Codex Alexandrinus. But this high antiquity, and the authority of the tradition to which the patriarch refers, have been disputed; nor are the most accurate biblical writers agreed about its age. Grabe thinks that it might have been written before the end of the fourth century; others are of opinion that it was not written till near the end of the fifth century, or somewhat later.

ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL. This name is usually given to that strange mixture of religious dogmas and philosophical doctrines which was introduced by Plotinus, and continued by Porphyry, Jamblichus, Proclus, and others of the New Platonists, and which gave rise to most of the heresies which arose in the early ages of the Christian Church, particularly those of the Gnostics and Manicheans. In the second century of the Christian era the struggle seems to have been keenly maintained between the speculative opinions of men and the inspired statements of God. From the confusion and eager conflict which thus ensued, seems to have originated the mixture of philosophy and religion in the tenets of the Alexandrian School. From the peculiar locality which formed its cradle, it combined the spirit of Greek with that of Oriental philosophy. Hence its true characteristic is, a religious mysticism. The doctrines of the sect are profound; but from the marked influence which they exercised on the history of Christianity, by introducing various forms of error, it is necessary to devote a brief space to the subject.

According to the Alexandrian School, God was represented as pure indivisible essence, absolute intelligence, and creative power. This may be regarded as the Alexandrine Trinity. The Deity, then, was viewed as absolute existence, without qualities—which was their primitive unity. From unity proceeds mind or intelligence, and from mind emanates the soul of the world. The highest virtue, in their estimation, consisted in simplification; that is, the reduction of the soul to a state of unity or pure essence, without thought, without intelligence: and this, to them the most desirable condition, they could only attain by ecstasy, as they termed it, or by profound contemplation. Thus, while Plato taught that man ought to resemble God, the Alexandrian School proposed the destruction of human nature, and the complete absorption of it in the Divine, so that man becomes an absolute unity,—one with God.

Such doctrines as these, though in their first pounders they might not lead to their legitimate practical consequences, yet in Jamblichus and others, we find an open declaration of a belief in divination, ascetism, and magic arts. The whole system becomes one of avowed mysticism, leading to the most melancholy heresies in religion. "The absurdities of the Alexandrian School," as has been well remarked by Mr Douglas of Cavers, "have a degree of interest attached to them which would not otherwise belong to them, from their original hostility to Christianity, and from their afterwards becoming the source of Christian mysticism." And on the same subject Mosheim further observes:—"To this philosophy we may trace to their source a multitude of vain and foolish ceremonies, proper only to cast a veil over truth, and to nourish superstition; and which are, for the most part, religiously observed by many even in the times in which we live. It would be endless to enumerate all the pernicious consequences that may be justly attributed to this new philosophy, or rather, to this monstrous attempt to reconcile falsehood with truth, and light with darkness. Some of its most fatal effects were, its alienating the minds of many, in the following ages, from the Christian religion; and its substituting, in the place of the pure and sublime simplicity of the gospel, an unseemly mixture of Platonism and Christianity."

ALGUM. See ALMUG.

ALL,—1. Every creature. Prov. xvi. 4; Psal. cxix. 91, or every part. Song iv. 7. 2. Every man. 2 Cor. v. 10. 3. Plentiful, perfect. Rom. xv. 13; 1 Cor. xiii. 2. 4. Men of all nations, ranks, and degrees. 1 Tim. ii. 4; Tit. ii. 11. 5. Many, or the greatest part. Matt. iii. 5; Phil. ii. 21. Thus it is said, ALL the cattle of the land of Egypt died; the hail brake EVERY tree of the field. Exod. ix. 6, 19. ALL the people brake off the gold ear-rings which were in their ears. Exod. xxxii. 3. ALL the beasts of the nations lodged in the lintels of Nineveh. Zeph. ii. 14. The fame of David went forth into ALL lands. 1 Chron. xiv. 17. ALL Judea, and ALL the region round about Jordan, went out to John and were baptized of him. ALL men held John as a prophet. The apostles were hated of ALL men. Matt. iii. 5, 6, xxi. 26, x. 22. ALL men came to Jesus. John iii. 26. Then were at Jerusalem, Jews of EVERY nation under heaven. Acts ii. 5. See WORLD. Universalists, as they are termed, or the advocates of universal redemption, seem to hold it as incontrovertible, that "all, all men, and the many," must of necessity include all mankind, from the first of time to the last. Accordingly they are accustomed to take such a passage as that which we find in Scripture,—"As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive;" and from this they conclude that the gain derived from Christ shall be commensurate with the loss sustained from Adam. This is founded, however, on an evident error of interpretation, and an obvious forgetfulness of a general principle of universal grammar, and one which is unaffected by the idioms or peculiarities of individual languages,—that when we speak of a class, denomination, or order of men, or things, we may correctly use any universal terms we please, provided we design to include all the individuals of that class, denomination, or order. Proceeding accordingly on this uniformly recognised principle, we may easily perceive that in multitudes of instances the words "all," and "all men," may imply not mankind universally, but all of that particular class or description which is spoken of. Thus the text above quoted, may be rendered in accordance with the best founded rules of interpretation,—"As all being in Adam died, so all being, or who are in Christ, shall be made alive." How evident, then, the folly of such as found their dogma of universal redemption on this word "all," that must be so often restricted! and which is frequently limited by the context, by the nature of the thing spoken of, or by the objects of it! Thus servants are required to please their masters well in ALL things (Tit. ii. 9); and the Lord is said to uphold ALL that fall, and raise up ALL that are bowed down. Psal. cxlv. 14. The ALL men of Asia that turned away from Paul, denote a great many professed Christians there. 2 Tim. i. 15. As the ultimate design of Christianity is the conversion of the world, and as this will be its actual effect during the glorious ages of the millennium (Dan. ii.; Rev. xi. 15, xx. 1-6), it is no wonder that the sacred writers delight in the use of the most comprehensive and magnificent expressions when speaking of the influence of the gospel on mankind. Hence those who are chosen to salvation may without impropriety be called ALL, or EVERY man; ALL THE ENDS of the earth; ALL THE WORLD; because they spring from all nations, Jews and Gentiles; dwell in all places; are of every rank and condition; and are the substance of the earth,—for whose behalf it is chiefly preserved and favoured. Rom. xi. 32; Heb. ii. 9; 1 John ii. 2.

ALLEGORY, an enlarged simile or metaphor, in which a prolonged resemblance is drawn, for the purpose of illustration. Isaiah and the Psalmist have both of them presented the church and state of God's ancient people under similar imagery. The first presents to us one object and action; the other a considerable diversity. "My well-beloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill: and he fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof, and planted it with the choicest vine, and built a tower in the midst of it, and also made a wine-press therein: and he looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes. And now, O inhabitants of Jerusalem, and men of Judah, judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard. What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it? wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes? And now go to; I will tell you what I will do to my vineyard: I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be eaten up; and break down the wall thereof, and it shall be trodden down: and I will lay it waste: it shall not be pruned nor digged; but there shall come up briars and thorns: I will also command the clouds that they rain no rain upon it. For the vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah his pleasant plant: and he looked for judgment, but behold oppression; for righteousness, but behold a cry." Under similar metaphorical language, the Psalmist, by introducing a variety of particulars connected with the vine, enlarges the scenery of the picture, and presents the blessings and misfortunes of Israel under a series of appropriate images, selected and combined. "Thou hast brought forth a vine out of Egypt; thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it: Thou preparedst room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root, and it filled the land. The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars. She sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river. Why hast thou then broken down her hedges, so that all they which pass by the way do pluck her? The boar out of the wood doth waste it; and the wild beast of the field doth devour it. Return, we beseech thee, O God of Hosts: look down from heaven, and behold, and visit this vine; and the vineyard which thy right hand hath planted, and the branch that thou madest strong for thyself. It is burned with fire; it is cut down: they perish at the rebuke of thy countenance."

These present a picture of one scene and action. But the allegory often assumes the form of a continued narrative, into which may be introduced living beings, in every variety of circumstance, according to the fancy and design of the writer. Of this kind of allegory we have three illustrious examples in our own language—the Fairy Queen of Spencer, the Pilgrim's Progress, and above all, the Vision of Mirza by Addison.

Several of the prophecies are of the nature of allegory. Such were Joseph's dreams; such was the vision seen by Nebuchadnezzar of the great image, whose brightness was excellent, and whose form was terrible; such also was the striking vision of the tree, which grew and was strong, yet was ordered to be cut down and destroyed. Of the same nature are symbolical representations by action, whether representing past events, or events which are to come; of which we have many striking examples in the Scriptures. These you find to a certain degree in all nations, in even the civil transactions of life. But what takes place occasionally, in modern times, was very general among ancient nations. Hence, especially in eastern countries, when any sentiment was wished to be deeply impressed, scenical and expressive actions were joined to words, both to teach religious truths, and to express religious feelings. Of this nature are several of the ceremonies appointed in the Mosaic Law. Some of them were commemorative; some expressive of moral and spiritual feelings; and some represented great future events, connected with the promises.

ALLEGORICAL INTERPRETATION. See INTERPRETATION.

ALLELUIA, or HALLELU-JAH (praise the Lord, or praise to the Lord.) This word occurs at the beginning or at the end of many psalms. Alleluia was sung on solemn days of rejoicing. John in the Revelation (xix. 1, 3, 4, 6) says, "I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, saying, Alleluia; and the four living creatures fell down, and worshipped God, saying, Alleluia." This expression of joy and praise was transferred from the synagogue to the church. It is still occasionally used in devotional psalmody.

ALLIANCE, a league between two or more powers. It may be either offensive or defensive. The earliest instances of alliance occur in patriarchal times. We find Abraham concluding contracts of this kind with the neighbouring shepherds. Isaac, also, is recorded to have entered into a treaty with Abimelech, the king of Gerar. These treaties were solemnly confirmed by an oath; and, in token of mutual amity and friendship, they ate and drank together. It has been often supposed that the Israelites were forbidden to enter into alliance with heathen nations. The prohibition, however, as far as we can find in the Sacred Scriptures, referred only to particular tribes; and while the Moabite and the Ammonite, the Amalekite and the Canaanite, were carefully shunned, they made no hesitation in forming a treaty with the Gibeonites, who were not only themselves heathen idolaters, but guilty of deceit of the grossest kind.

In forming treaties of alliance various forms were adopted. Sometimes the contracting parties simply joined hands. Ezek. xvii. 18. At other times a heap of stones was erected in token of the transaction, and an appropriate name assigned to the place. The alliance between Abraham and the king of Gerar was ratified by an oath on both sides, and by a present from Abraham to the king of seven ewe lambs; and besides, a name was given to the well in memorial of the transaction. It was usual, on the occasion of a solemn treaty between two contracting parties, to offer a sacrifice, and, cutting the victim into two parts, to place each half upon two different altars, between which the parties in the alliance passed. Gen. xv. 9, 10, 17. This rite was practised both by Jews and heathens.

Under the Mosaic law, the people feasted in their peace-offerings on a part of the sacrifice. Sometimes the parties were sprinkled with the blood of the victim. In 1 Sam. xviii. 4, we find mention made of another mode of ratifying treaties of alliance. "Jonathan," it is said, "stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle." It has from the earliest times been customary, in eastern countries, to ratify their alliances and federal engagements with salt. Accordingly, we read in the Old Testament of a "covenant of salt," which was reckoned one of the most inviolable forms in which an agreement could be ratified.

ALL MANNER OF CONVERSATION, a phrase which occurs in 1 Pet. i. 15. The Greek word signifying conversation, which occurs frequently in the New Testament, has a much more extensive meaning than now belongs to the word conversation. It embraces not only colloquial intercourse, but the whole circle of habits and behaviour. It corresponds most nearly to the English term conduct. The whole phrase here referred to may be rendered, "Be ye holy in every department, or, as we now say, in every walk of life."

ALLON-BACHUTH (the oak of weeping), the spot where Rebecca's nurse was buried. Gen. xxxv. 8.

ALL-SUFFICIENCY OF GOD, that power or attribute of his nature whereby he is able to communicate as much blessedness to his creatures as he is pleased to make them capable of receiving. As his self-sufficiency is that whereby he has enough in himself to denominate him completely blessed, as a God of infinite perfection; so his all-sufficiency is that by which he hath enough in himself to satisfy the most enlarged desires of his creatures, and to make them completely blessed. We practically deny this perfection,—1. When we are discontented with our present condition, and desire more than God has allotted for us. Gen. iii. 5; Prov. xix. 3. 2. When we seek blessings of what kind soever in an indirect way, as though God were not able to bestow them upon us in his own way, or in the use of lawful means. Gen. xxvii. 35. 3. When we use unlawful means to escape imminent dangers. 1 Sam. xxi. 13; Gen. xx., xxvi. 4. When we distrust his providence, though we have had large experience of his interposing in our behalf in various instances. 1 Sam. xxvii. 1; Psal. lxxviii. 19; 2 Chron. xvi. 8, xiv. 9, 13; Josh. vii. 7-9. 5. When we doubt of the truth or certain accomplishment of the promises. Gen. xviii. 12; Isa. xlix. 14. 6. When we decline great services, though called to them by God, under a pretence of our unfitness for them. Jer. i. 6, 8.

The consideration of this doctrine should lead us, —1. To seek happiness in God alone, and not in human things. Jer. ii. 13. 2. To commit all our wants and trials to him. 1 Sam. xxx. 6; Heb. xi. 19; 2 Cor. xii. 8, 9. 3. To be courageous in the midst of danger and opposition. Psal. xxvii. 1. 4. To be satisfied with his dispensations. Rom. viii. 28. 5. To persevere in the path of duty, however difficult. Gen. xvii. 1. See ALMIGHTY.

ALLUSH or ALUSH (Numb. xxxiii. 13, 14), a place situated in the desert of Sin, between Elim and mount Sinai. The stations where the Israelites rested are supposed to have been in the great valley El Sheikk and Feiran. Feiran is a continuation of the valley El Sheikk, says Burckhardt, and was considered the first valley on the whole Arabian peninsula. From the upper extremity, a row of gardens and date plantations extends downwards for four miles. In almost every garden is a well, by means of which the gardens are irrigated the whole year round. This is the valley described by Niebuhr under the name of Faran, through which the Israelites doubtless passed on their way to Sinai, after leaving the desert of Sin; but which they probably did not pass through on their way from Sinai to Kadesh, as some have ventured to suppose. Here they could not want for water; nor did they murmur on this account until they came to Rephidim, which was most probably higher up among the mountains, and near the western base of Sinai itself. Indeed, monkish tradition pretends to assign the site of Rephidim, and to show the rock from which the waters gushed, in the narrow valley El Ledja; but the nature of the ground hardly admits the possibility of its being the true site.

ALMIGHTY, a peculiar title of the Deity, by which is meant to be expressed his ability to do every thing which may be done,—every thing which is consistent with the other perfections of his nature. Gen. xvii. 1. The Hebrew name, Shaddai, signifies also all-sufficient or all-bountiful. See Gen. xxviii. 3, xxxv. 11, xliii. 14, xlix. 25. Of the omnipotence of God, we have a most ample revelation in the Scriptures, expressed in the most sublime language. The omnipotence of God is inconceivable and boundless. It arises from the infinite perfection of God, that his power can never be actually exhausted; and, in every imaginable instant in eternity, that inexhaustible power of God can, if it please him, be adding either more creatures to those in existence, or greater perfection to them; since “it belongs to self-existent Being to be always full and communicative, and to the communicated contingent being to be ever empty and craving.” Richd. Watson thus beautifully remarks,— can conceive, but it detracts nothing from its perfection,—where things in themselves imply a contradiction, as that a body may be extended and not extended, in a certain place and not in it, at the same time; such things cannot be done by God, because contradictions are impossible in their own nature. Nor is it any derogation from the Divine power to say, they cannot be done; for as the object of the understanding, of the eye, and the ear, is that which is intelligible, visible, and audible,—so the object of power must be that which is possible; and as it is no prejudice to the most perfect understanding, or sight, or hearing, that it does not understand what is not intelligible, or see what is not visible, or hear what is not audible,—so neither is it any diminution to the most perfect power, that it does not do what is not possible. In like manner, God cannot do any thing that is repugnant to his other perfections: he cannot lie, nor deceive, nor deny himself; for this would be injurious to his truth: he cannot love sin, nor punish innocence; for this would destroy his holiness and goodness: and, therefore, to ascribe a power to him that is inconsistent with the rectitude of his nature, is not to magnify, but debase him; for all unrighteousness is weakness, a defection from right reason, a deviation from the perfect rule of action, and arises from a want of goodness and power. In a word, since all the attributes of God are essentially the same, a power in him which tends to destroy any other attribute of the Divine nature, must be a power destructive of itself. Well, therefore, may we conclude him absolutely omnipotent, who, by being able to effect all things consistent with his perfections, sheweth infinite ability; and by not being able to do any thing repugnant to the same perfections, demonstrates himself subject to no infirmity.”

ALMON-DIBLATHAIM, a small town on the borders of Moab, near which the Israelites encamped before crossing the river Jordan. It was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon.

ALMOND TREE, a tree resembling the peach tree in its leaves and blossoms, but the fruit is longer and more compressed, the outer green coat is thinner and drier when ripe, and the shell of the stone is not so rugged. This stone, or nut, contains a kernel, which is the only esculent part. The whole arrives at maturity in September, when the outer tough cover splits open and discharges the nut. From the circumstance of its blossoming the earliest of any of the trees, beginning as soon as the rigour of winter is past, and before it is in leaf, it has its Hebrew name shakad, which comes from a verb signifying to make haste, to be in a hurry, or to awake early. To the forwardness of the almond tree there seems to be a reference in Jeremiah: “The word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see a rod of an almond tree. Then said the Lord unto me, Thou hast well seen; for I will hasten my word to perform it;” or rather, “I am hastening, or watching over my word, to fulfil it.” Jer. i. 11, 12. In this manner it is rendered by the Seventy, and by the Vulgate. This is the first vision with which the prophet was honoured, and his attention is roused by a very significant emblem of that severe correction with which the Most High was hastening to visit his people for their iniquity; and from the species of tree to which the rod belonged, he is warned of its near approach. The idea which the appearance of the almond rod suggested to his mind is confirmed by the exposition of God himself: “I am watching over, or on account of, my word, to fulfill it." "There is here," says Dr Blaney, "at once an allusion to the property of the almond tree, and in the original a paranomasia, which make it more striking there than it can be in a translation. In like manner, when Solomon, speaking of an old man, Eccles. xii. 5, says the almond tree shall flourish, he intends to express by it the quickness by which old age advances and surprises us; while the snow-white blossoms upon the bare boughs of the tree, aptly illustrate the hoary head and defenceless state of age. Aaron's rod which budded, and by this means secured to him the priesthood, was a branch of this tree. Numb. xvii. 8: 'And it came to pass, that on the morrow Moses went into the tabernacle of witness; and, behold, the rod of Aaron, for the house of Levi, was budded, and brought forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds.' Mr Parkhurst suggests that probably the chiefs of the tribes bore each an almond rod, or wand, as emblematical of their vigilance." The almond-tree is covered with its snow-white flowers in the latter part of January, and displays its ripe fruit before the end of March.

ALMONER, one who is employed in the distribution of charities. This seems to have been an important branch of the office of deacons in the Christian Church. Acts vi. We find Barnabas and Paul, however, employed in a similar service. Acts xi. 29, 30; Gal. ii. 10; 2 Cor. viii. 4. It is an office, the faithful execution of which, while it demands much discretion, and in some circumstances great self-denial, is yet peculiarly acceptable to God, honourable, and delightful. The Scriptures frequently enjoin and encourage labours of this sort. Psal. xli. 1; Matt. xix. 21, xxv. 31-46; Acts xx. 33-35; Rom. xii. 13; James i. 27; 1 Pet. iv. 10; 3 John 5.

ALMS, what is given gratuitously for the relief of the poor. That alms-giving is a duty, is every way evident from the variety of passages which enjoin it in the sacred Scriptures. In eastern countries, it was customary for the wealthy to summon the poor by sound of trumpet to their houses, at a stated hour, that they might bestow upon them their bounty. The same practice prevails in the east at the present day. Our Lord alludes to the custom when he warns the disciples "not to sound a trumpet before them, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory of men." It is also the custom, as Oriental travellers inform us, for the poor to sound the praises of their benefactors on the same instrument. It appears, that in Mohammedan countries, there is a class of monastics called Kalendar or Karendal, who seek alms by sounding a trumpet or horn. Frequent mention is made by Moses of the duty of kindness to the poor, but not a word is said of public beggars. In the time of our Lord, it was customary to seek alms in the public streets, at the doors of the rich, and even at the gates of the temple. But while the duty of alms-giving was thus recognised among the Jews, it was only among the early Christians that the duty, instead of being left to the uncertain and capricious operation of private benevolence, was adopted as an acknowledged duty of the Christian Church. Strictly obeying the apostolic injunction, that on the first day of the week each one should contribute as God had prospered him, the faithful were accustomed to bring under the notice of the assembled brethren the necessities of those whom they knew to require the aid of the Church. In this way the wants of the poorer members of the Christian community became known, and were promptly supplied from the public fund, which consisted of the voluntary Sabbath offerings of the faithful. And not contented with relieving their own poor, they often sent contributions in aid of the poor of other churches. The primitive Christians appear to have been peculiarly exemplary in their attention to the poor. It was a frequent practice for the wealthier members of the Church to visit the dwellings of the poor, and there to administer at once to the wants of their bodies and to the necessities of their immortal souls. This duty was most frequently undertaken by the female members of the congregation; and so valuable were the services of such Christian women found to be in the early Church, that, in addition to the deacons, whose peculiar duty it was to care for the poor, there were also deaconesses, whose labours were publicly recognised and sanctioned by the Church. Thus it was that, both from the common funds of the whole Church and the secret alms-giving of private individuals, Christians have, from apostolic times down to the present, exhibited a solicitude about the state of the poor which has been almost unknown in heathen countries.

ALMUG TREE, or ALGUM TREE, a certain kind of wood mentioned 1 Kings x. 11; 2 Chron. ii. 8, ix. 10. Jerome and the Vulgate render it thyine wood, and the Septuagint, wrought wood. Josephus says it was a peculiarly beautiful species of pine. The Rabbins call it coral, perhaps from the texture and colour of the wood resembling that article. Several critics understand it to mean gummy wood; but a wood abounding in resin must be very unfit for the uses to which this is said to be applied. Celsus queries if it be not the sandal; but Michaelis thinks the particular species of wood to be wholly unknown to us. Dr Shaw supposes that the almug tree was the cypress; and he observes, that the wood of this tree is still used in Italy and other places for violins, harpsichords, and other stringed instruments. It was imported into Palestine in the days of Solomon, from Ophir. Koenig is the first of modern naturalists who detected the almug tree in the East Indies, where Ophir is supposed to have been situated. It is thought to be recognised in the Pterocarpus santolinus, or the red sanders wood of the English. This is a lofty tree, having alternate branches, which, like the trunk, are covered with a bark resembling that of the common alder tree. The leaves are in threes, roundish, very smooth, and rolled back at the edges. The wood is dark red, with black veins, capable of taking a high polish, is close-grained, and so heavy as to sink in the water. Like many of the red Indian woods, it transudes a blood-red juice, which when collected, is sent to Europe under the name of dragon's blood. The common dragon's blood of the shops is obtained from another species, peculiar to the West Indies and South America.

ALOES, an extensive tribe of plants, the principal species amounting to nine in number: they differ much in size. A very bitter gum is extracted from aloes, used for medicinal purposes, and anciently for embalming dead bodies. Nicodemus is said (John xix. 39) to have brought one hundred pounds weight of myrrh and aloes to enbalm the body of Jesus. The quantity has been exclaimed against by certain Jews, as being enough for fifty bodies. But on this subject Dr Bloomfield well remarks, and the same view is taken by most recent commentators, and among the rest by Tittman:—"The chamber in which our Lord's body was deposited would, according to the common custom, have to be completely perfumed, and no inconsiderable part might be reserved for the funeral, since on such occasions great quantities of spices were burnt, as we find from Josephus and the rabbinical writers." Thus Josephus says, that at the funeral of Herod there were five hundred spice-bearers; and at that of R. Gamaliel, eighty pounds of opobalsamum were used.

The LIGN-ALOE, or Agallochim of Dioscorides, or the Excoecaria agallocha of modern botanists (Numb. xxiv. 6; Psal. xlv. 8; Cantic. iv. 14), is a small tree about eight or ten feet high. This extremely bitter plant contains under the bark three sorts of wood. The first is black, solid, and weighty; the second is of a tawny colour, of a light spongy texture, very porous, and filled with a resin extremely fragrant and agreeable; the third kind of wood, which is the heart, has a strong aromatic odour, and is esteemed in the East more precious than gold itself. It is used for perfuming habits and apartments, and is administered as a cordial in fainting and epileptic fits. These pieces, called calunbac, are carefully preserved in pewter boxes, to prevent their drying. When they are used, they are ground upon a marble, with such liquids as are best suited to the purpose for which they are intended. This wood, mentioned Cantic. iv. 14, in conjunction with several other odoriferous plants there referred to, was in high esteem among the Hebrews for its exquisite exhalations.

The scented aloe, and each shrub that showers
Gum from its veins, and odours from its flowers.

This tree is believed by Orientals to have grown in the garden of Eden, hence it is called "The tree of paradise." It was with this plant that the body of Christ was embalmed, and it is still used in exactly the same way and for the same purposes as described in Scripture.

ALPHA, the first letter of the Greek alphabet, as Omega is the last. Hence the lofty title which our Lord appropriates to himself (Rev. i. 8, xxi. 6, xxii. 13), as significant of his eternity and perfection, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending."

ALPHEUS, the father of James the Less, and the husband of Mary the sister of the mother of Jesus. He is called Cleophas in John xix. 25. There seems to have been another person bearing the same name, who is described in Mark ii. 14 as the father of Levi or Matthew.

ALTAR, a place on which sacrifices were offered. The Divine precept in relation to altars, as delivered by Moses to the Jews, is contained in Exod. xx. 24, and runs thus,—“An altar of earth thou shalt make unto me, and shalt sacrifice thereon thy burnt offerings, and thy peace offerings, thy sheep, and thine oxen. In all places where I record my name I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee. And if thou wilt make me an altar of stone, thou shalt not build it of hewn stone: for if thou lift up thy tool upon it, thou hast polluted it.” In the patriarchal times altars were generally built near a grove of trees; and as idolatry prevailed in the world, and men, forsaking the worship of the true God, multiplied their deities in profusion, it became an universal practice among the heathen to erect their altars in such places as were calculated to inspire with religious dread the mind of the deluded worshippers,—particularly in groves, woods, and mountains. Judges vi. 25; 2 Kings xxi. 3. But when the abuses which this custom gave rise to became flagrant, and impure and lascivious rites were founded upon it, the Jews were expressly forbidden to plant groves, or so much as a single tree, near the altar of Jehovah. Deut. xvi. 21. The principal altars of the Jews were the altar of burnt-offering and the altar of incense. About the middle of the outer court of the Tabernacle stood the altar of burnt-offering. It was a sort of coffer or chest made of shittim-wood, resting on feet of brass. The four corners of the altar projected upwards so as to resemble horns. 1 Kings ii. 28. To these the victims were bound. At the four corners were rings through which were put the poles used for carrying the altar. On the south side was an ascent to the altar, Lev. ix. 22, made of earth heaped up. There were various articles for the use of the altar, as pots, shovels, basins, flesh-hooks, and fire-pans, all of brass. The fire upon this altar was miraculously kindled, and was kept continually burning. Lev. ix. 24, vi. 12 and 13. Prideaux states that from the building of the second temple the altar of burnt-offering was a large pile, built of unhewn stones, thirty-two cubits square at the bottom, and twenty-four at the top. The altar of incense was placed near the veil, and was made of shittim-wood, twenty-one inches in length and breadth and three feet and a half in height. It was ornamented and plated with gold, hence it was called the golden altar, to distinguish it from the brazen altar, which stood in the outer court. It had an ornamented border, and rings for the staves by which it was carried. On this altar incense was burned every morning and evening. (See INCENSE.)

ALTAR is employed, by a figure of speech, for the sacrifice or offering itself: "Whoso therefore shall swear by the altar, sweareth by it, and by all things thereon." Matt. xxiii. 20. Hence, in a typical sense, it occasionally signifies Christ, the sacrifice of atonement, "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world:" "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle. For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp. Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate. Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach. For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come. By him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to his name." Heb. xiii. 10-15. There were two altars employed in the service of the Jewish temple; one without (the altar of burnt-offering), upon which the offerings of atonement were made for the people; the other within the temple, upon which the incense was offered. In both of these the typical signification is the same; for it is through Christ crucified alone—himself the altar, himself the sacrifice—that we can approach to the Father; and it is through him only that we can plead his merits, and offer up praises and thanksgivings before God. "And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne." Rev. viii. 3. And as in the temple worship, the sacrifice of atonement must first be made before the incense could be offered; so likewise in the services of God's spiritual temple, the atoning influence of Christ's sacrifice must be received into the heart by faith before any offerings of the believer can be acceptable to him. In a bad sense, the type applies to idol-sacrifices, and the mediatorial object of idol-worship. "Behold Israel after the flesh: are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar? What say I then? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing? But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils; ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils." 1 Cor. x. 18-21.

The first Christians acknowledged no temple made with hands,—no material altar,—no mortal priest,—no carnal sacrifice; they considered that an end was put to all these things by the death of Christ, and to have continued the use of them, would have been to deny by their actions what in words they professed to believe,—that God had now fulfilled the mercy promised unto their fathers by the prophets; that he had visited and redeemed his people; that Messiah had been cut off for the sins of others; and that he had, by his death, "finished transgression, made an end of sin-offerings, made reconciliation for iniquity, and brought in everlasting righteousness." Psal. xl. 6-8; Isa. liii. 4-12; Dan. ix. 24, 25. Since the days of the apostles, indeed, the use of altars has been resumed in places professedly appropriated to the purposes of Christian worship; but this did not take place until Christianity became corrupted from its original simplicity, and men, forsaking the form of sound words, began to mingle their own inventions with the doctrines and precepts of the apostles. When their minds once became darkened as to the nature and import of the memorial of the Lord's death, and they began to consider it in the light of a sacrifice, the necessity of altars on which to offer them, as well as that of officiating priests, followed of necessary consequence. But these things belong to the corruptions of Christianity, to Popery and Puseyism, and are easily understood by such as have "an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches."

ALTAR AT ATHENS, inscribed "To the unknown God." Acts xvii. 22, 23. This altar has exercised the learning and ingenuity of commentators and critics. The Greek writers make mention of many altars dedicated to the unknown gods. Eichhorn conjectures that there were many altars at Athens originally with no inscriptions, from the art of writing having been at the period of their erection unknown, or not generally received; and that these, in a later age, the Athenians did not destroy, but since they knew not to whom they were dedicated, they inscribed on them, "To an unknown God;" and that of several altars so inscribed, Paul saw only one. The most plausible explanation seems to be, that the altar in question had been erected in consequence of some benefit received, which seemed attributable to some god, though they knew not to whom. The following is Dr Doddridge's note on the passage, which, indeed, contains a summary of the different opinions entertained on this contested point:—"The express testimony of Lucian sufficiently proves that there was such an inscription at Athens, and shows how unnecessary as well as unwarrantable it was in Jerome, to suppose that the apostle, to serve his own purpose, gives this turn to an inscription which bore on its front a plurality of deities. Whence this important phenomenon arose, or to what it particularly referred, it is more difficult to say. Witsius, with Heinsius, understands it of Jehovah, whose name, not being pronounced by the Jews themselves, might give occasion to this appellation; and to this sense Mr Biscoe inclines. Dr Wellwood supposes that Socrates reared this altar, to express his devotion to the one living and true God, of whom the Athenians had no notion; and whose incomprehensible being he insinuated, by this inscription, to be far beyond the reach of their understanding, or his own. And in this I should joyfully acquiesce, could I find one ancient testimony in confirmation of the fact. As it is, to omit other conjectures, I must give the preference to that which Beza and Dr Hammond have mentioned, and which Mr Hallet has laboured at large to confirm and illustrate; though I think none of these learned writers has set it in its most natural and advantageous light. Diogenes Laertius, in his 'Life of Epimenides,' assures us, that in the time of that philosopher (about six hundred years before Christ), there was a terrible pestilence at Athens; in order to avert which, when none of the deities to whom they sacrificed appeared able or willing to help them, Epimenides advised them to bring some sheep to the Areopagus, and letting them loose from thence, to follow them till they lay down, and then to sacrifice them to the god near whose temple or altar they then were. Now, it seems probable, that Athens not being then so full of these monuments of superstition as afterwards, these sheep lay down in places where none of them were near, and so occasioned the rearing what the historians call anonymous altars, or altars, each of which had the inscription, To the unknown God; meaning thereby the deity who had sent the plague, whoever he were; one of which altars, at least, however it might have been repaired, remained till Paul's time, and long after. Now, as the God whom Paul preached as the Lord of all was indeed the Deity who sent and removed this pestilence, the apostle might, with great propriety, tell the Athenians, he declared to them Him whom, without knowing Him, they worshipped,—as I think the concluding words of the 23d verse may most fairly be rendered."

ALVAH, the name of the wood with which it is said that Moses sweetened the waters of Marah. Exod. xv. 25. The name of this wood is not found in Scripture; but the Mahometans give it that of alvah, and pretend to trace its history from the patriarchs before the flood. Nothing, however, is known of the tree to which Moses refers with any degree of certainty.

ALWAYS, continually, Deut. v. 29; habitually, Acts x. 2; through life, 2 Sam. ix. 10; to the end of this world, Mark xiv. 7; for ever, Job vii. 16. In Matt. xxviii. 20, the literal rendering is, "And mark, I am with you all the days, until the conclusion of the world."

AM: I AM THAT I AM, one of the distinguishing names and characters of JEHOVAH. Exod. iii. 14. This solemn name demands our greater reverence and veneration, because it is the very name by which the Lord was pleased to reveal himself to Moses at the bush. The very expression carries with it its own explanation; that is, as far as creatures such as we are can enter into an apprehension of the meaning. When JEHOVAH saith, I AM THAT I AM, it is setting forth a right and power of existence, exclusive of every other. Of all others, some have been, some now are, and others may be,—all are what they are from him, and by his appointment; but he that is I AM is, and must be, always and eternally the same. His is a self-existence underived, independent, subject to no change, and impossible to be any other,—“the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.” Heb. xiii. 8; Rev. i. 8.

And what tends yet more to endear it to the heart of his people is, that the glorious name becomes the security of all his promises. I AM gives certainty to all he hath said, and becomes a most sure security for the fulfilment of all that he hath promised. Oh! for grace to bend with the lowest humbleness to the dust, in token of our nothingness before this great and almighty I AM. And no less, to rest in holy faith and hope, in the most perfect confidence that he will perform all his promises. See JEHOVAH.

AMAD, the name of a town belonging to the tribe of Asher. Josh. xix. 26.

AMALEK, the son of Eliphaz, by Timnah his concubine, and the grandson of Esau.

AMALEKITES, a powerful people who in remote antiquity inhabited Arabia Petrea between the Red Sea and the Dead Sea. They were descended from Amalek, the grandson of Esau. They seem to have resembled the Arabs in their wandering habits. It is not improbable that their antiquity stretches much further back than the grandson of Esau, as Moses speaks of them as a people in the days of Abraham. The Arabians accordingly trace their descent from Amalek, a son of Ham, and grandson of Noah. This tradition is keenly maintained by Calmet, but contested by Dr Wells. The enmity between the Amalekites and the Hebrews was ancient and powerful, originating, as has been alleged, from Jacob having deprived their ancestor Esau of the birthright and the blessing. No sooner had the Israelites passed through the Red Sea than they were attacked by the Amalekites in the Desert of Rephidim. But in answer to the prayers of Moses on Mount Horeb, the Amalekites were routed with great slaughter. Under the Judges we find them again uniting with the Midianites and Moabites to oppress Israel, but while Ehud delivered the Israelites from the Moabites, Gideon rescued them from the Amalekites. At an after period, Saul, King of Israel, marched against the Amalekites and overthrew them, but spared Agag their king, contrary to the command of God (see AGAG)—thus bringing upon himself the displeasure of God, his deposition from the throne, and the complete extirpation of his family. In the time of David we find a troop of Amalekites engaged in pillaging Ziklag, when they were pursued and totally dispersed. About one hundred and sixty years afterwards they joined in an alliance against Jehoshaphat, which reduced them still further; and in the days of Hezekiah they were completely extirpated by the Simeonites, who took possession of their country. Thus was fulfilled the declaration of the prophet, “Amalek was the first of the nations, but his latter end shall be that he shall perish for ever.”

AMAM, a town of Judea, in the southern part of Judah. Josh. xv. 26.

AMANA, a mountain mentioned in Cant. iv. 8, and by some supposed to be mount Amanus, in Cilicia. Jerome and the Rabbins describe the land of Israel as extending northward to this mountain; and it is known that Solomon's dominion did extend so far. Mount Amanus, with its connections, separates Syria and Cilicia, and reaches from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates.

AMARIAH, a descendant of Aaron, who is mentioned in 1 Chron. vi. 7, as the son of Meraioth, and the father of Ahitub, all of whom occur in the regular line of the high-priesthood, though it is very doubtful whether they ever fulfilled the office. They were priests in right, but there is no evidence that they were priests in fact. And a person of the name of Amariah is mentioned in Zeph. i. 1, who was the father of Gedaliah, and the great grandfather of Zephaniah.

AMASA, a nephew of David, being the son of Abigail, his sister. When Absalom rebelled against his father, so highly did he appreciate the valour of his cousin Amasa, that he appointed him commander of the forces. When Absalom's unnatural rebellion had been suppressed, David made offer of the royal pardon to Amasa, and also of the command of his army instead of Joab. This excited the envy and jealousy of Joab, who sought an early opportunity of putting his rival-cousin to death. The manner in which he accomplished his bloody purpose was treacherous in the extreme. Pretending a friendly concern for his health, and affecting to salute him in the most affectionate manner, with his right hand he held him by the beard, and with his left killed him with the sword. It is certainly remarkable, and indicates strongly the popularity of Joab, that David did not dare to punish him for this atrocious crime. There is an individual of the same name mentioned in 2 Chron. xxviii. 12, as one of the heads of the children of Ephraim.

AMASAI, a captain of a small body of men from the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, who joined David at Ziklag. 1 Chron. xii. 17, 18.

AMAZIAH, the eighth king of Judah. He was the son and successor of Joash. At the age of twenty-five he ascended the throne, and reigned for twenty-nine years in Jerusalem. No sooner did he enter upon the government of the kingdom than he proceeded to punish the murderers of his father, sparing their children, however, from a regard to the law of Moses, “The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin.” Deut. xxiv. 16. Amaziah, anxious again to subdue the Edomites who had revolted from the authority of Judah in the reign of Jehoram, bribed the king of Israel with a large sum of money to aid him in his enterprise. For this association with a wicked king he was rebuked by a prophet of the Lord, and immediately sent back the auxiliaries whom he had hired. This prompt obedience to the Divine command was followed by a complete victory over the Edomites. The successful monarch, proud of his conquest, fell into idolatry, which brought upon him the Divine judgment in his defeat by Joash, king of Israel, and his being carried a prisoner to Jerusalem. A conspiracy was formed against him, and although he attempted to escape to Lachish, he was put to death, and his body buried in the royal sepulchre in the city of David.

AMBASSADOR, a public minister sent from one sovereign prince and government to another, not only carrying a message, but representing the person by whom he is sent; and in this sense the ministers of the everlasting gospel are styled ambassadors in 2 Cor. v. 20, indicating not only that they are authorized to proclaim the message of reconciliation, but that they also, in Christ's name and stead, beseech men to be reconciled unto God.

AMEN, a Hebrew word, which, when prefixed to an assertion, signifies assuredly, certainly, or emphatically, so it is; but when it concludes a prayer, so be it, or so let it be, is its manifest import. In the former case, it is assertive, or assures of a truth or a fact, and is an asseveration, and is properly translated indeed. John iii. 3. In the latter case it is petitionary, and, as it were, epitomises all the requests with which it stands connected. Numb. v. 22; Rev. xxii. 20. This emphatical term was not used among the Hebrews by detached individuals only, but on certain occasions by an assembly at large. Deut. xxvii. 14, 26. It was adopted, also, in the public worship of the primitive churches, as appears by that passage, 1 Cor. xiv. 16, and was continued among the Christians in following times; yea, such was the extreme to which this custom was carried, that Jerome informs us, in his time, that, at the conclusion of every public prayer, the united amen of the people sounded like the fall of water, or the noise of thunder. Nor is the practice of some professors in our own time to be commended, who, with a low though audible voice, add their amen to almost every sentence, as it proceeds from the lips of him who is praying. As this has a tendency to interrupt the devotion of those that are near them, and may disconcert the thoughts of him who leads the worship, it would be better omitted, and a mental amen is sufficient. The term, as used at the end of our prayers, suggests that we should pray with understanding, faith, fervour, and expectation. We find the word AMEN applied, in Rev. iii. 14, as a title to our blessed Lord, with the view of indicating that he is faithful and true, and that in him all the promises are "yea, and amen."

AMETHYST, one of the precious stones mentioned in Rev. xxi. 20 as forming the foundations of the wall of the New Jerusalem. It is a transparent gem, generally of a purple colour, but sometimes almost colourless. It is found of various sizes and of different shapes in the East and West Indies, and in different parts of Europe.

AMIANTHUS; an adjective derived from this word is used in 1 Pet. i. 3, 4. The amianthus is a greenish or silvery white mineral, of fibrous texture, which is generally known under the name of asbestos,—a term derived from the Greek, and signifying "unquenchable," "indestructible by fire."

This mineral, and particularly a silky variety of it, in long slender filaments, was well known to the ancients, who made it into an incombustible kind of cloth, in which they burned the bodies of their dead, and by which means they were enabled to collect and preserve the ashes without mixture. This cloth was purchased by the Romans at an enormous expense. Pliny states, that he had seen table-cloths, towels, and napkins of amianthus, taken from the table at a great feast, thrown into the fire, and burned before the company,—and by this operation rendered cleaner than if they had been washed.

From its peculiar property of not being destroyed by fire, the term amianthus is figuratively used for imperishable, indestructible. Thus in 1 Pet. i. 3, 4, we read, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away." This blessed inheritance is called incor- ruptible, because it will not, like the earthly Canaan, be corrupted with the sins of its inhabitants (Lev. xviii. 28), for into the heavenly country entereth nothing that defileth. Rev. xxi. 27. It is declared to be amianthon (indestructible), because it shall neither be destroyed by the waters of a flood, as the earth has been, nor by fire, as in the end this world will be; and it is to be unfading, because its joys will not wither, but remain fresh through all eternity.

AMMAH, a hill opposite to Giah, not far from Gibeon, where Asahel was slain by Abner. 2 Sam. ii. 24.

AMMI (my people) and RUHAMAH, or perhaps more properly RACHAMAH (having obtained mercy.) See Hos. ii. 1. This name being given to the Ten Tribes after their rejection, imports that in the latter days, or millennium, God shall redeem them from their misery and bondage, and bring them into special covenant-relation with himself.

Let the reader observe, that the Lord commands the prophet to call by this name the brethren and sisters of the Church: "Say ye to your brethren, Ammi, and to your sisters, Ruhamah; plead with your mother, plead." Though put away, by reason of her gross infidelity, yet the provision made for her recovery in Christ is such that she shall return to her rightful Lord. "For this reason" (saith the Lord) "plead with your mother, plead,"—work upon her maternal feelings,—give her to see, that though by adulteries she is by law justly liable to be divorced for ever, yet the right and interest of her (first) husband hath never been lost. He claims her as his own. Return again unto me, saith the Lord.

If the reader be led to consider the subject in this point of view, the expressions of Ammi and Ruhamah, with all the doctrines connected with both, become interesting and tender beyond all imagination.

AMMON, or No-AMMON, a city in Egypt, on both the eastern and western banks of the Nile, generally regarded as Thebes. It is thus referred to by Ezekiel under the name No (xxx. 14-16), "And I will make Pathros desolate, and will set fire in Zoan, and will execute judgments in No. And I will pour my fury upon Sin, the strength of Egypt; and I will cut off the multitude of No. And I will set fire in Egypt: Sin shall have great pain, and No shall be rent asunder, and Noph shall have distresses daily." Again in Jer. xli. 25, "The Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, saith, Behold, I will punish the multitude of No, and Pharaoh, and Egypt, with their gods, and their kings; even Pharaoh, and all them that trust in him." The prophet Nahum (iii. 8) styles it "No, situated among the rivers." This corresponds to the ancient Thebes, or as it is called in the Septuagint, Diospolis. This was probably a city of very great antiquity, and the seat of Egyptian royalty. The ruins which still remain, particularly the temples of Karnak and Luscoor, attract the attention of travellers from their peculiar magnificence and splendour. The monuments of Thebes contain inscriptions of very remote antiquity, one monarch, Osirtasen I., being mentioned, who is calculated to have lived in the time of Joseph. Strabo speaks of it as a ruin in his time. Homer mentions it as possessed of a hundred gates. Sir Gardner Wilkinson states that Menes, or Menias, who is allowed by universal consent to have been the first sovereign of Egypt, was the reputed founder of Thebes as well as Memphis. The workmen of these two cities, and afterwards of Alexandria, were famed for the excellent qualities of glassware they produced, with which Rome continued to be supplied long after Egypt became a province of the empire. In the tombs which have been found at Thebes, are many admirable specimens of Egyptian art. Outside the catacombs are found many small altars, which seem to indicate that funeral oblations were offered for the dead. A minute account of the tombs at Thebes has been given in Sir Gardner Wilkinson's "Topography of Thebes." He informs us that the tombs of the kings at Thebes are principally of Pharaohs of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties.

AMMON, or HAMMON, or JUPITER-AMMON, a god of the ancient Egyptians, supposed to have been Ham, from whose son, Mizraim, the Egyptians were descended. There was a famous temple dedicated to this god, where an oracle existed of great renown, which Alexander the Great consulted at the risk of his life. "The oracle of Ammon," says Sir Gardner Wilkinson, "enjoyed for ages the highest celebrity, and was looked upon by foreigners, as well as Egyptians, with the most profound respect, missions from all countries being sent to consult it and learn its infallible answers; but in Strabo's time it began to lose its former renown."

AMMONIANS. See AMMONIUS SACCHUS—ACADEMICS.

AMMONITES, a people descended from Ammon, the son of Lot, who inhabited a region on the east side of Judea, beyond Jordan, forming a part of Arabia Petrea. Having destroyed the Zamzummins, a gigantic race who formed its original inhabitants, they took possession of the country. Little is known of their government and pursuits, except that they were ruled by kings, and were chiefly engaged in agriculture. Jeremiah styles them uncircumcised, and they seem to have gradually fallen into idolatry. They practised the bloody rites of Moloch. Chemosh also was one of their gods. This idolatrous and cruel nation proved the most determined and inveterate foes of the Israelites for a long series of ages, harassing and annoying them in every form; invading their country, oppressing the people, and combining with the Moabites to pillage and destroy all within their reach.

The country anciently peopled by the Ammonites is situated to the east of Palestine, and is now possessed partly by the Arabs and by the Turks. It is naturally one of the most fertile provinces of Syria, and it was for many ages one of the most populous. The Ammonites often invaded the land of Israel, and at one period, united with the Moabites, they retained possession of a great part of it, and grievously oppressed the Israelites for the space of eighteen years. Jephthah repulsed them, and took twenty of their cities; but they continued afterward to harass the borders of Israel, and their capital was besieged by the forces of David, and their country rendered tributary. They regained and long maintained their independence, till Jotham, king of Judah, subdued them, and exacted from them an annual tribute of a hundred talents, and thirty thousand quarters of wheat and barley; yet they soon contested again with their ancient enemies, and exulted in the miseries that befell them when Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, and carried its inhabitants into captivity. In after times, though successively oppressed by the Chaldeans (when some of the earliest prophecies respecting it were fulfilled), and by the Egyptians and Syrians, Ammon was a highly productive and populous country, when the Romans became masters of all the provinces of Syria, and several of the allied cities which gave name to the celebrated Decapolis, were included within its boundaries.

Dr Keith, in his admirable work on 'The Evidence of Prophecy,' gives the following striking comment on the present state of Ammon, as compared with the statements of the Old Testament prophets:—"Even when first invaded by the Saracens, this country, including Moab, was enriched by the various benefits of trade, covered with a line of forts, and possessed some strong and populous cities. Volney bears witness, 'that in the immense plains of the Hauran, ruins are continually to be met with, and that what is said of its actual fertility perfectly corresponds with the idea given of it in the Hebrew writings.' The fact of its natural fertility is corroborated by every traveller who has visited it; and 'it is evident,' says Burckhardt, 'that the whole country must have been extremely well cultivated, in order to have afforded subsistence to the inhabitants of so many towns' as are now visible only in their ruins. While the fruitfulness of the land of Ammon, and the high degree of prosperity and power in which it subsisted long prior and long subsequent to the date of the predictions, are thus indisputably established by historical evidence, and by existing proofs, the researches of recent travellers (who were actuated by the mere desire of exploring these regions and obtaining geographical information) have made known its present aspect, and testimony the most clear, unexceptionable, and conclusive, been borne to the state of dire desolation to which it is and has long been reduced.

"It was prophesied concerning Ammon, 'Son of man, set thy face against the Ammonites, and prophesy against them. I will make Rabbah of the Ammonites a stable for camels and a couching-place for flocks. Behold, I will stretch out my hand upon thee, and deliver thee for a spoil to the heathen; I will cut thee off from the people, and cause thee to perish out of the countries; I will destroy thee. The Ammonites shall not be remembered among the nations. Rabbah' (the chief city) 'of the Ammonites shall be a desolate heap. Ammon shall be a perpetual desolation.' Ezek. xxv. 2, 5, 7, 10, xxi. 32; Jer. xlix. 2; Zeph. ii. 9.

"Ammon was to be delivered to be a spoil to the heathen, to be destroyed, and to be a perpetual desolation.—'All this country, formerly so populous and flourishing, is now changed into a vast desert.' (Seetzen's Travels.) Ruins are seen in every direction. The country is divided between the Turks and the Arabs, but chiefly possessed by the latter. The extortions of the one and the depredations of the other keep it in 'perpetual desolation,' and make it 'a spoil to the heathen.' 'The far greater part of the country is uninhabited, being abandoned to the wandering Arabs, and the towns and villages are in a state of total ruin.' (Ibid.) 'At every step are to be found the vestiges of ancient cities, the remains of many temples, public edifices, and Greek churches.' (Burckhardt's Travels.) The cities are left desolate. 'Many of the ruins present no objects of any interest. They consist of a few walls of dwelling-houses, heaps of stones, the foundations of some public edifices, and a few cisterns filled up; there is nothing entire, though it appears that the mode of building was very solid, all the remains being formed of large stones. In the vicinity of Ammon there is a fertile plain interspersed with low hills, which for the greater part are covered with ruins.' (Burckhardt's Travels in Syria.) While the country is thus despoiled and desolate, there are valleys and tracts throughout it which 'are covered with a fine coat of verdant pasture, and are places of resort to the Bedouins, where they pasture their camels and their sheep.' (Buckingham's Travels in Palestine.) 'The whole way we traversed,' says Seetzen, 'we saw villages in ruins, and met numbers of Arabs with their camels,' &c. Mr Buckingham describes a building among the ruins of Ammon, 'the masonry of which was evidently constructed of materials gathered from the ruins of other and older buildings on the spot. On entering it at the south end,' he adds, 'we came to an open square court, with arched recesses on each side,—the sides nearly facing the cardinal points. The recesses in the northern and southern wall were originally open passages, and had arched door-ways facing each other; but the first of these was found wholly closed up, and the last was partially filled up, leaving only a narrow passage just sufficient for the entrance of one man, and of the goats which the Arab keepers drive in here occasionally for shelter during the night.' He relates, that he lay down among 'flocks of sheep and goats, close beside the ruins of Ammon; and particularly remarks, that during the night he 'was almost entirely prevented from sleeping by the bleating of flocks.' So literally true is it (although Seetzen, and Burckhardt, and Buckingham, who relate the facts, make no reference or allusion whatever to any of the prophecies, and travelled for a different object than the elucidation of the Scriptures), that 'the chief city of the Ammonites is a stable for camels, and a couching-place for flocks.'

"The Ammonites shall not be remembered among the nations."—While the Jews, who were long their hereditary enemies, continue as distinct a people as ever, though dispersed among all nations, no trace of the Ammonites remains,—none are now designated by their name, nor do any claim descent from them. They did exist, however, long after the time when the eventful annihilation of their race was foretold; for they retained their name, and continued a great multitude until the second century of the Christian era. (Justin Martyr.) 'Yet they are cut off from the people. Ammon has perished out of the countries; it is destroyed.' No people is attached to its soil; none regard it as their country, and adopt its name; 'and the Ammonites are not remembered among the nations.'

"'Rabbah' (Rabbah Ammon, the chief city of Ammon) 'shall be a desolate heap.'—Situating, as it was, on each side of the borders of a plentiful stream, encircled by a fruitful region, strong by nature, and fortified by art, nothing could have justified the suspicion or warranted the conjecture in the mind of an uninspired mortal, that the royal city of Ammon, whatever disasters might possibly befall it in the fate of war or change of masters, would ever undergo so total a transmutation as to become a desolate heap. But although, in addition to such tokens of its continuance as a city, more than a thousand years had given uninterrupted experience of its stability, ere the prophets of Israel denounced its fate; yet a period of equal length has now marked it out, as it exists to this day, a desolate heap,—a perpetual or permanent desolation. Its ancient name is still preserved by the Arabs, and its site is now 'covered with the ruins of private buildings,—nothing of them remaining, except the foundations and some of the door-posts. The buildings, exposed to the atmosphere, are all in decay' (Burckhardt's Travels in Syria), so that they may be said literally to form a desolate heap. The public edifices, which once strengthened or adorned the city, after a long resistance to decay, are now also desolate; and the remains of the most entire among them, subjected as they are to the abuse and spoliation of the wild Arabs, can be adapted to no better object than 'a stable for camels.' Yet these broken walls and ruined palaces, which attest the ancient splendour of Ammon, can now be made subservient, by means of a single act of reflection, to a far nobler purpose than the most magnificent edifices on earth can be, when they are contemplated as monuments on which the historic and prophetic truth of Scripture is blended in one bright inscription."

AMMONIUS SACCAS, a Christian philosopher of Alexandria, lived towards the end of the second century. He is considered as the founder of the mystic philosophy, known as the Alexandrian, or neo-platonic. Plotinus, Longinus, and Origen, were among his pupils. His system was, in fact, a crude mass of heterogeneous opinions, borrowed from various schools. He is said by Porphyry to have apostatized from Christianity, but this is denied by Eusebius. A full account of his opinions, as the founder of the New Platonists, will be found under the article ACADEMICS.

AMON, a king of Judah, son of Manasseh. He began to reign A.M. 3362, at the age of twenty-two, and reigned only two years. 2 Kings xxi. 19, 21. He forsook the true God, and fell into idolatry. His servants conspired against him, and slew him in his own house, B.C. 640. There is another individual mentioned in 1 Kings xxii. 26, who appears to have been the governor of Samaria, who kept the Prophet Micaiah in custody by King Ahab's order.

AMORITES, an ancient nation descended from Amor, the fourth son of Canaan. They seem to have been remarkably famed for their gigantic stature, which is likened by the prophet Amos to the lofty cedar, while he compares their strength to the powerful oak. In the earliest period of their history they inhabited the mountainous district of country situated to the west of the Dead Sea, but in process of time they extended their conquests so as to take possession of the country also to the east of the same sea, which had been previously occupied by the Moabites and Ammonites. Josephus tells us that the land of the Amorites extended from the Jabbok northward, to the Arnon southward. This exactly corresponds with the description given in Judg. xi. 22, "And they possessed all the coasts of the Amorites, from Arnon even unto Jabbok, and from the wilderness even unto Jordan." The Amorites appear to have been the most powerful of all the aboriginal nations of Canaan, and accordingly the name is sometimes used in the Old Testament to denote these nations generally.

AMOS, the fourth of the minor prophets, belonged to the little town of Tekoa in Judah. There is no proof, however, that he was a native of this place, except his retirement there, when driven from Bethel. It is probable that he was born in the territories of Israel, to which his mission was principally directed. He prophesied in Bethel, where the golden calves were erected, under Jeroboam II., about A.M. 3215; and Amaziah, high priest of Bethel, accused him before the king, as conspiring against him. Amos answered Amaziah, "I was no prophet, neither was

I a prophet's son ; but I was a herdman, and a dresser of sycamore fruit ; and the Lord took me as I followed the flock, and the Lord said unto me, Go, prophesy unto my people Israel." Amos vii. 10, to end. He then retired into the kingdom of Judah, and dwelt in Tekoa, where he continued to prophesy. Amos complains in many places of the violence offered to him, to oblige him to silence, and bitterly exclaims against the crying sins of the Israelites, such as idolatry, oppression, wantonness, and obstinacy. Nor does he spare the sins of Judah, such as their carnal security, sensuality, and injustice.

"That he prophesied," says Mr Horne, "during the reigns of Uzziah king of Judah, and of Jeroboam II. the son of Joash, we are not only informed from the first verse of his predictions, but we also have internal evidence of it, from the argument or subject-matter of his book. For the prophet describes the state of the kingdom of Israel particularly in chap. vi. 12-14, to be precisely such as is described in 2 Kings xiv. 23, &c. We further learn from Amos i. 1, that he began to prophesy in the second year before the earthquake, in the reign of Uzziah ; which is, by Josephus and most commentators, referred to that prince's usurpation of the sacerdotal office when he attempted to offer incense. Consequently Amos was contemporary with Hosea (though he is supposed not to have lived so long as the last-mentioned prophet), with Jonah, and probably also with Joel.

"The occasion on which Amos delivered his predictions, was the oppression of the Jews and Israelites by the neighbouring nations, and the prosperous state of the two kingdoms under Uzziah and Jeroboam II. But as the inhabitants of those kingdoms, especially the Israelites, abandoned themselves to idolatry, effeminacy, avarice, and cruelty to the poor, contrary to the divine command, the prophet takes occasion thence to reprove them with the utmost severity for their wickedness.

"The scope of the book is, to certify to the twelve tribes the destruction of the neighbouring nations ; to alarm those who 'were at large in Zion,' leading them to repentance ; and to cheer those who were truly penitent with the promise of deliverance from future captivity, and of the greater prosperity of the Messiah's kingdom, of which we have a particular prediction in chap. ix. 11."

The father of the Prophet Isaiah is also called Amos, or Amoz. Augustine conjectured that this is the same person with the Prophet of Tekoa ; but besides that the termination of the two names is different, both Isaiah and his father belonged to Jerusalem.

AMPHIPOLIS, a chief town of Macedonia, now called Emboli by the Turks, on the river Strymon, which flows round the city,—and hence the ancient name. Paul and Silas, being delivered out of prison, left Philippi, and going to Thessalonica, passed through Amphipolis. Acts xvii. 1. It was also called Chrysopolis, or Christopolis. In the division of Macedonia by Paulus Emilius, it was made the chief city of the first region of Macedonia, and a metropolis.

AMRAPHEL, the king of Shinar, or Babylon, mentioned in Genesis as confederate with Chedorlaomer and two other kings, to make war against the cities of the plain. Among the captives whom they carried off was Lot, Abraham's nephew ; but Abraham pursued them, retook Lot, and recovered the spoil.

AMULET, a charm, or supposed preservative against evils of any kind, such as witchcraft or diseases of whatever nature. All the nations of antiquity seem to have been much addicted to the use of such superstitious charms. It is remarkable that while the Jews were much in the habit of wearing them, their use is expressly forbidden by the Mishna, except in some cases. Scapulars and other amulets are much employed by modern Romanists to avert diseases, and gain the favour of the saints. Such superstitious practices are not discouraged by the priests. From the Pagans amulets were introduced among the Basilidians. Their amulets were stones, with the word Abrahas engraved on them. The Jews had many superstitious notions about amulets. Many Christians of the first century wore amulets, which were marked with a fish, as a symbol of the Redeemer. To the Christian divines the use of amulets was interdicted by the Council of Laodicea, under penalty of dismission from office. With the spread of Arabian science these charms came into use in the West, and they prevail among the ignorant and superstitious of almost all countries.

AMYRALDISM, a name given by some writers to the doctrine of universal grace, as explained and asserted by Amyraldus, or Moses Amyraut, and others, his followers, among the reformed in France, towards the middle of the seventeenth century. This doctrine principally consisted of the following particulars, viz., that God desires the happiness of all men, and none are excluded by a divine decree ; that none can obtain salvation without faith in Christ ; that God refuses to none the power of believing, though he does not grant to all his assistance, that they may improve this power to saving purposes ; and that they may perish through their own fault. Those who embraced this doctrine were called Universalists, —though it is evident they rendered grace universal in words, but in reality restricted, at least in its highest exercises, so that it almost appears doubtful whether they were really Universalists.

ANAB, a city in the tribe of Judah, captured by Joshua, who destroyed its inhabitants, the Anakims, men of gigantic stature.

ANABAPTISTS, those who maintain that baptism ought always to be performed by immersion. It is a word which has been indiscriminately applied to Christians of very different principles and practices. The English and Dutch Baptists do not consider the word as at all applicable to their sect ; because those persons whom they baptize they consider as never having been baptized before, although they have undergone what they term the ceremony of sprinkling in their infancy.

The Anabaptists of Germany, besides their notions concerning baptism, depended much upon certain ideas which they entertained concerning a perfect Church establishment, pure in its members, and free from the institutions of human policy. The most prudent part of them considered it possible, by human industry and vigilance, to purify the Church ; and seeing the attempts of Luther to be successful, they hoped that the period was arrived in which the Church was to be restored to this purity. Others, not satisfied with Luther's plan of reformation, undertook a more perfect plan, or more properly, a visionary enterprise,—to found a new Church, entirely spiritual and divine.

This sect was soon joined by great numbers, whose characters and capacities were very different. Their progress was rapid, for in a very short space of time their discourses, visions, and predictions, excited violent commotions in a great part of Europe. The most pernicious faction of all those which composed this motley multitude, was that which pretended that the founders of this new and perfect Church were under a divine impulse, and were armed against all opposition by the power of working miracles. It was this faction that, in the year 1521, began their fanatical work, under the guidance of Munzer, Stubner, Storck, &c. These men taught, that among Christians, who had the precepts of the gospel to direct, and the Spirit of God to guide them, the office of magistracy was not only unnecessary, but an unlawful encroachment on their spiritual liberty; that the distinctions occasioned by birth, rank, or wealth, should be abolished; that all Christians, throwing their possessions into one stock, should live together in that state of equality which becomes members of the same family; that as neither the laws of nature nor the precepts of the New Testament had prohibited polygamy, they should use the same liberty as the patriarchs did in this respect.

They employed, at first, the various arts of persuasion, in order to propagate their doctrines, and related a number of visions and revelations, with which they pretended to have been favoured from above; but, when they found that this would not avail, and that the ministry of Luther and other reformers was detrimental to their cause, they then madly attempted to propagate their sentiments by force of arms. Munzer and his associates, in the year 1525, put themselves at the head of a numerous army, and declared war against all laws, governments, and magistrates of every kind, under the chimerical pretext that Christ himself was now to take the reins of all government into his hands; but this seditious crowd was routed and dispersed by the elector of Saxony and other princes, and Munzer, their leader, put to death.

Many of his followers, however, survived and propagated their opinions through Germany, Switzerland, and Holland. In 1533, a party of them settled at Munster, under two leaders of the names of Matthias and Bockholdt. Having made themselves masters of the city, they deposed the magistrates, confiscated the estates of such as had escaped, and deposited the wealth in a public treasury for common use. They made preparations for the defence of the city; invited the Anabaptists in the Low Countries to assemble at Munster, which they called Mount Sion, that from thence they might reduce all the nations of the earth under their dominion. Matthias was soon cut off by the bishop of Munster's army, and was succeeded by Bockholdt, who was proclaimed, by a special designation of heaven, as the pretended king of Sion, and invested with legislative powers like those of Moses. The city of Munster, however, was taken, after a long siege, and Bockholdt punished with death.

It must be acknowledged that the true rise of the insurrections of this period ought not to be attributed to religious opinions. The first insurgents groaned under severe oppressions, and took up arms in defence of their civil liberties; and of these commotions the Anabaptists seem rather to have availed themselves, than to have been the prime movers. That a great part were Anabaptists, seems indisputable; at the same time it appears from history, that a great part also were Roman Catholics, and still a greater part had scarcely any religious principles at all. Indeed, when we read of the vast numbers that were concerned in these insurrections, of whom it is reported that one hundred thousand fell by the sword, it appears reasonable to conclude that they were not all Anabaptists.

It is but justice to observe, also, that the Baptists of modern times are to be considered as entirely distinct from those seditious and fanatical individuals above mentioned, as they profess an equal aversion to all principles of rebellion on the one hand, and of enthusiasm on the other.

ANAGOGICAL signifies mysterious, transporting; and is used to express whatever elevates the mind, not only to the knowledge of divine things, but of divine things in the next life. The word is seldom used, but with regard to the different senses of Scripture. The anagogical sense is, when the sacred text is explained with regard to eternal life, the point which Christians should have in view; for example, the rest of the Sabbath, in the anagogical sense, signifies the repose of everlasting happiness.

ANAH, son of Zibeon, the Hivite, and father of Aholibamah, Esau's wife. Gen. xxxvi. 24. While feeding asses in the desert, he discovered "springs of warm water," not mules, as the English translators and several others understand the Hebrew jamim. Scripture never calls mules jamim, nor are such creatures hinted at till after the time of David. And Professor Robinson remarks, that five or six miles south-east of the Dead Sea, and consequently in the neighbourhood of Mount Seir, is a place celebrated among the Greeks and Romans for its warm baths. There is some difficulty in the representation, in Gen. xxxvi. 2, of Anah being the daughter of Zibeon; for afterwards, in verse 24, Anah is spoken of as a son. Rosenmüller thinks that a son and daughter of the same name are given.

ANAHARATH, a city belonging to the tribe of Issachar. Josh. xix. 19.

ANAKIM, or SOXS OF ANAK, a nation inhabiting a southern district, and noted for their gigantic stature. They were descended from Anak the son of Arba, who gave name to one of their towns, and also to the whole people. When the Hebrew spies were sent out they returned with an alarming account of the Anakim, as a mighty people, strong and tall, with their cities walled up to heaven. This nation, powerful though it was, gigantic in stature, and apparently invincible, was conquered by Caleb, who took Kirjath-Arba, and so extirpated the nation that only a small remnant escaped, who took refuge among the Philistines.

ANALOGY. This word originally denotes a resemblance or agreement of things in certain respects. When we reason on such real or fancied resemblances among objects, we are said to reason from analogy, —a mode of reasoning, which, as it is very frequently adopted both in the writings of authors, and in the ordinary intercourse of life, we feel it incumbent upon us to explain both in its real nature and precise force. Analogical reasoning must obviously originate in observation, and therefore it is allied to inductive reasoning. They proceed both of them upon one principle, a belief in the uniformity of nature's operations, so that in similar circumstances similar effects are expected; and in proportion as the resemblance between the two cases diminishes, will the confidence be diminished with which we reason from the one to the other. Inductive and analogical reasoning bear a considerable resemblance in their nature. The conclusions of the former, however, are always general, being deductions from particular instances of the same kind; but the conclusions of the latter are often particular, arising from our tendency to argue from one individual being to another of the same class, and from one species to another. Reasoning founded on induction, besides, is direct; that founded on analogy is indirect and collateral,—the coexistence of two qualities in one subject affording no direct evidence of their coexistence in any other. As an instance of analogical reasoning, we may quote an example adduced by Dr Reid. "We observe," says he, "a great similitude between this earth which we inhabit, and the other planets, Jupiter, Saturn, and so forth. They all revolve round the sun as the earth does, though at different distances and in different periods. They borrow all their light from the sun, as the earth does. Several of them are known to revolve round their axes like the earth, and by that means must have a like succession of day and night. Some of them have moons that serve to give them light in the absence of the sun, as our moon does to us. They are all in their motions subject to the same law of gravitation as the earth is. From all this similitude, it is not unreasonable to think that those planets may, like our earth, be the habitation of various orders of living creatures."

So slight is the confidence usually put in the evidence of analogy, that it is seldom resorted to in scientific investigations. It serves to guide the judgment when direct evidence cannot be obtained, and it affords a degree of probability sufficient for the practical business of life. But this is the utmost extent of its utility. It can in no case be regarded as affording any thing equivalent to a direct argument; and yet it is a valuable weapon in controversy, as tending to obviate the objections which may be urged against an opinion. It is of no force comparatively in confuting an antagonist, but it has great force in setting aside the scruples of an unbeliever. Thus, Dr Paley, in his Natural Theology, exhibits a fine instance of an analogical argument from the proofs of intelligent design, apparent in the structure of a watch, to the proofs of intelligent design, obvious in the structure of the world. The analogy is beautifully drawn, and could only be opposed, not by denying the similarity of the two cases in some points, but in the special point referred to as the ground of the argument. Mr Hume, however, attempted to destroy the analogy as a whole, asserting the world to be a singular effect; and proceeding in this way, he admitted the force of the argument, as far as it applied to the watch, but denied it when applied to the world. Just as if it were always necessary, in order to infer a design in any particular case, that we should be able to point to the precise design in that particular case. Traces of intelligence may often be apparent, where we can make no pretence to explain the work which the intelligence designed to accomplish. Nay, the work may be so complicated, that by our most strenuous exertions we cannot succeed in arriving at the particular end which has been had in view; and yet the very complicacy of its structure, all the parts of which are conducing to the accomplishment of some end, may impress our minds deeply with the proofs of intelligence which it exhibits. To perceive proofs of design in a watch, it is not necessary, as Mr Hume would seem to think, that we should be minutely acquainted with the precise design of every part of its intricate structure. It is sufficient that we have reason to think that the whole is conducing to the accomplishment of some design or other, and therefore bears traces of being the workmanship of a designer. In this respect, and in this alone, we would reason analogically, as Paley does, from a watch to a world. The analogy, it is obvious, is confined to one point alone, that both of them bear proofs of being the workmanship of some intelligent workman, though the precise end or design of their construction is not involved in the analogy.

This celebrated attempt on the part of Mr Hume to overturn the analogical reasoning of Dr Paley, teaches us a very important lesson in reference to the precise nature and value of all evidence drawn from analogy. It is founded on the resemblance between two objects, not however in all points, but in one only, and that is the point on which the whole strength of the argument depends. If, then, we are not sufficiently careful to make completely obvious the point to which our analogy is limited, so as to prevent our opponent from directing his whole energies towards the destruction of our argument, as in the case of Mr Hume, on unfair and illegitimate grounds, we are reasoning from analogical evidence; that is, we are reasoning from a real or fancied resemblance between two objects in one respect only. Our opponent, to obviate the argument, denies, and proceeds to disprove the alleged analogy between the objects in question. He exhibits the marked difference in the most vivid and striking light, and yet he has all the while left the main force of our argument entirely untouched. He has pointed out the difference in every other point but that in which alone it was asserted; and in this way he has endeavoured to convey the impression, that in this one point it was also fallacious. This subtle species of sophistical arguing, is the frequent resort of those who, though they feel the force of the analogy, are desirous to prevent its influence from being felt by others. How is it, then, that an analogical argument can be fairly and decisively met? Only by a direct denial and disproof of the analogy in the exact point in which it is asserted; for just as the strongest resemblance in all other circumstances will not authorize our conclusion drawn from this one particular, neither will our disproof of the resemblance in all other circumstances satisfactorily destroy the conclusion drawn from this one particular. If, for instance, to take Dr Reid's example, I should infer, by analogy drawn from this world, that the planet Jupiter is inhabited, my first inquiry must obviously be, on what circumstances does the existence of the living beings upon the earth depend? Are there not certain physical conditions essential to their existence here? And the argument is then reduced to the simple investigation, whether there is reason to believe that the same physical circumstances are to be found in the planet Jupiter? and if so, we may conclude that it is inhabited. This, however, be it observed, is an argument far short of a demonstration; it is only a very high probability. It is quite possible that the same physical circumstances may exist, and yet the conclusion may be false. If, however, we cannot ascertain whether or not the planet Jupiter be in the same condition with our own planet, in a physical point of view, we can proceed no further in our argument; for the strongest resemblance in all other circumstances will not warrant our conclusion. The whole force of the argument rests on this one point, whether or not there be a resemblance in the physical aspect.

and this being ascertained, the degree of weight to which our analogical reasoning is entitled, depends upon the greater or less resemblance in this respect, and in this respect alone.

This mode of reasoning has been sometimes resorted to with singular effect, as in Bishop Butler's admirable work on the Analogy of Natural and Revealed Religion, the main design of which appears to be to obviate the principal objections brought against Divine Revelation, by showing that precisely the same objections may be urged against the works as are sought to be urged against the Word of God. Such a line of argument goes not to prove directly the truth of revelation, but simply to silence the objector. It proves effectually, that whatever may be said of the direct proof, his cavillings, at all events, are without a proper foundation.

ANALOGY OF FAITH, the correspondence of the several parts of Divine Revelation in one consistent whole. Rom. xii. 6. This is considered as furnishing a grand rule for understanding the true sense of Scripture; for, it is evident that the Almighty doth not act without a design in the system of Christianity, any more than he does in the works of nature. Now, this design must be uniform; for as in the system of the universe every part is proportioned to the whole, and made subservient to it, so in the system of the gospel all the various truths, doctrines, declarations, precepts, and promises, must correspond with, and tend to, the end designed. For instance, supposing the glory of God in the salvation of man by free grace, in a way of righteousness and holiness, be the grand design,—then, whatever doctrine, assertion, or hypothesis agree not with this, it is to be considered as false. Great care, however, must be taken, in making use of this method, that the inquirer previously understand the whole scheme, and that he harbour not a predilection only for a part; without attention to this, we shall be liable to error. If we come to the Scriptures with any preconceived opinions, and are more desirous to put that sense upon the text which quadrates with our sentiments rather than the truth, it becomes then the analogy of our faith, rather than that of the whole system. This was the source of the error of the Jews in our Saviour's time. They searched the Scriptures; but such were their favourite opinions, that they could not, or would not, discover that the Sacred Volume testified of Christ: and the reason was evident, for their great rule of interpretation was what they might call the analogy of faith,—i. e., the system of the Pharisean scribes, the doctrine then in vogue, and in the profound veneration of which they had been educated. Perhaps there is hardly any sect but what has more or less been guilty in this respect.

It was from a dread of such an erroneous mode of interpretation being adopted, that Dr Campbell, in his Dissertations, has discarded the analogy of faith altogether, as an auxiliary in the interpretation of Scripture. He ridicules the idea of maintaining the analogy of faith, as amounting to nothing more than an endeavour to affix to an obscure passage of Scripture a meaning in accordance with our own preconceived opinions of the general scope or design of revelation. Such an objection, however, proceeds upon a total misconception of the real meaning of the expression. If it were meant that we should first form a system in our mind, and then proceed to explain the Scriptures by it, nothing would be more absurd. It would, in reality, be reasoning in a circle.

This, however, is not the intention of the interpreter of the Sacred Volume in resorting for assistance to the analogy of faith. It is impossible for any attentive reader of the Bible to deny that there is a perfect harmony which reigns throughout that blessed book. Even in human compositions, written by men of sound minds, we invariably explain obscure passages by keeping in view the main design and scope of the entire work; and is it at all unreasonable to believe that the Holy Ghost does not contradict himself, and that there is a harmony of design in all his declarations? This is the analogy of faith in its true sense, as understood by those interpreters of Scripture who are in the habit of availing themselves of it.

ANALYSIS. The two great instruments of reasoning are, analysis and synthesis. The former is likened by Condillac to our gradual ascent from a valley to the summit of a mountain; and the latter, to our gradual descent from the mountain to the plain. By analysis we separate a general truth into its component elements, and by synthesis we rise from the consideration of particulars to general truths. This diversity in the arrangement of our thoughts has given rise to the twofold division of method established among logicians. When truths are set forth as they have, or might have, been discovered, this is called the analytical method, or method of resolution, as tracing things backward to their source, and resolving our knowledge into its original or elementary principles. When, on the contrary, we set out from these first principles, and we proceed to demonstrate from them those which follow, we are adopting the synthetical method, or the method of composition. The former has been often termed the method of invention, as being that which is generally employed in the invention or discovery of truth; the latter has been often termed the method of doctrine or instruction, as being that which is usually adopted in conveying truth to others. Our inherent tendency to excessive generalization renders the synthetic mode of reasoning the primary source of error. We perceive resemblances, and readily combine and classify objects which, had we instituted a proper examination, we would have found essentially to differ from one another. It is taking advantage of this tendency to combine, that leads us into fallacy at the outset of our inquiries, as reasoning creatures; and it is taking advantage of the power which it possesses of instituting a contrary process, that leads us so to reason as to arrive at truth. To form systems of knowledge, we must reason synthetically; to test the accuracy of our system, we must reason analytically.

ANAMIM. This name occurs in Gen. x. 13 as a son of Mizraim, but having a plural termination in the Hebrew, it may perhaps be regarded as the name, not of an individual, but of a family or people, who, according to the opinion of Bochart, inhabited the countries around the temple of Jupiter-Ammon.

ANAMMELECH, an idol of the people of Sepharvaim. 2 Kings xvii. 31, "And the Avites made Nibhaz and Tartak, and the Sepharvites burnt their children in fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, the gods of Sepharvaim." It is generally spoken of in the Old Testament along with Adrammelech. Human sacrifices appear, from the passage just quoted, to have been offered to both these gods. The barbarous custom of offering human sacrifices to propitiate the favour of the gods belongs to a very remote antiquity, and was only practised by the Syrians and other heathen nations. Hyde explains Anammelech to be, in his opinion, the constellation Cepheus.

ANANIAS, a professed Christian of the city of Jerusalem, who, in concert with his wife, Sapphira, sold an estate, and secreting part of the purchase-money, carried the remainder to the apostles, as the whole price of his inheritance. Acts v. 1.

"A number of conjectures have been formed as to the reasons which induced the Holy Spirit so visibly and suddenly to punish the falsehood of Ananias and Sapphira. Mr Taylor thinks they might possibly be as follows:—1. In the infancy of the Church, to give a solemn notoriety and a self-evident sanction to the doctrine introduced,—not merely by miracles of advantage (as healing), but by miracles of punishment. 2. To deter those who, through worldly motives of gain, or with a design to participate in the profits of the goods sold, might join the Christian Church. 3. To deter spies and false brethren, who could not but be aware of the danger of detection in all cases after this event. If Ananias only had died, he remarks, it might have seemed a mere sudden death, produced by a natural cause." On the sin of Ananias and Sapphira, Olshausen makes the following judicious remarks: "It almost appears as if the act of Ananias were represented as a sin against the Holy Ghost, which would explain the fact, that all admonition to repentance is wanting, and all mention of pardon; the apostles in this case only exercise their prerogative of retaining sin. And from this it follows that the peculiar procedure of Peter in this affair is inexplicable, if you suppose that he had learned by information from others that Ananias committed this fraud: an external communication respecting the fact could not place the apostle in a position to determine the degree of the man's inward guilt. Yet such a determination was necessary to him, if he wished not to do injustice to Ananias, and for this therefore nothing but the power of the Spirit could qualify him." The punishment of Ananias is thus viewed by the same able commentator: "What is natural in itself may become miraculous by connection with circumstances and adjuncts; and in this case it is plain that the death of Ananias is an event supernaturally arranged by a higher power, because it is connected with the penal sentence of the apostle, which was spoken in the power of the Spirit, and like a sword pierced Ananias, on account of his sin."

The remarks of Wetstein on the sin of Ananias and Sapphira are so excellent that they well deserve to be quoted:—"The sin of Ananias and Sapphira admitted of no excuse. The disciples had entered into a society, consisting of the rich, the poor, and the middle classes, on condition that the rich should contribute much, those of the middle class according to their means, and that from the fund so formed all should derive their common support. Ananias, therefore, who pretended to be poorer than he was, thirsted for gain, hoping to receive more from the common treasury than he had contributed. Had this evil example been followed by others, the Church would soon have been severely burthened, nay, the funds would shortly have been exhausted by the expenses incurred through such fraudulent persons, who, under pretence of poverty and piety, would reap the fruit of others' labour. This would have opened a wide door to hypocrisy and idleness, and have utterly extinguished the benevolence of the wealthier classes, whose charitable dispositions would have given way before their wealth should have been exhausted; for who would have supported persons of property, who pretended poverty in order to become a burthen on the bounty of others? This abuse would not only have injured the reputation of the nascent Church, but have cut the very nerves of all its prosperity. Yet this sin Ananias and Sapphira, regardless of law divine and human, had not hesitated to commit, knowingly, voluntarily, and deliberately, without the plea of imminent peril or urgent necessity. Just, therefore, seasonable, and even necessary, was their punishment, that the fraud might not turn to the benefit of its authors, and that all might see that this new society was an assemblage of honest and good men. Ananias sought the praise of liberality: the event, however, was, that the turpitude of his crime was thereby manifested to all, and the memory of it transmitted to every future generation. Ananias and Sapphira sought to live on the labour of others, and lost life itself. By their dissimulation they, as far as in them lay, deprived the really poor of their support, and converted it to their own use,—than which what could be more cruel? Just, therefore, it was, that they should not experience the mercy, but suffer the severity, of the Almighty. Rosenmüller adds, that another and yet more urgent reason for the punishment was, that by this striking and memorable example the authority of the apostles might be confirmed. 'For,' continues he, 'if the fraud of Ananias and Sapphira had succeeded, and the report of it had got abroad, a suspicion would have arisen that the apostles lied when they said that they were endued with the inspiration of the Holy Spirit and the Divine help, to the diminution and destruction of their credit and authority.'"

ANANIAS, a disciple of Christ at Damascus, whom the Lord directed to visit Paul, then recently converted and arrived at Damascus. Acts ix. 10. The modern Greeks maintain, that he was one of the seventy disciples, bishop of Damascus, a martyr, and buried in that city. There is a very fine church where he was interred; and the Turks, who have made a mosque of it, preserve a great respect for his monument.

ANANIAS, son of Nebedæus, and high priest of the Jews, succeeded Joseph, son of Camith, A.D. 47. He was sent by Quadratus, governor of Syria, to Rome, to answer for his conduct to the Emperor Claudius; but he justified himself, was acquitted, and returned. In the meantime, Jonathan had been appointed high priest in his place; but he being soon after murdered, Ananias appears to have assumed the functions from which he had been deposed, before a successor was appointed by Agrippa. It was at this point of time that Paul was brought before him. Acts xxiii. 1. Paul commenced his defence, but Ananias immediately commanded those who were near him to strike him on the face. To this injury and insult the apostle replied, "God is about to smite thee, thou whited wall; for thou sittest to judge me according to the law, but commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law." Being rebuked for thus addressing himself to the high priest, the apostle excused himself by alleging, very properly, that he was ignorant of his office. See PAUL.

The assembly being divided in opinion, the tribune ordered Paul to Cæsarea, and thither Ananias and other Jews went, to accuse him before Felix. Acts xxiv. Ananias was considered the first man of the nation in point of riches, friends, and fortune; yet was the prediction of the apostle fulfilled, for he was put to death by a party headed by his own son. Considerable confusion has existed in the accounts which several writers have given of this individual.

ANANUS, a high priest of the Jews, mentioned under the name of Annas in Luke iii. 2. After having filled the office of high priest for eleven years, he was deposed, but seems still to have retained the title, and perhaps to have occasionally discharged the functions of the high priesthood. It is somewhat remarkable, that of all who before Caiaphas had discharged the office of high priest, Annas alone should be mentioned, and not Ismael, Eliazar, or Simeon, who had all been high priests more recently than Annas. The most probable opinion, however, is, that Caiaphas was the high priest, but that Annas was his vicar or deputy, called in the Hebrew, Sagan. Nor was it unworthy of a man of reputation to hold such an office, the Sagan being, in cases of urgent necessity, as Dr Lightfoot alleges, permitted to enter the holy of holies. If, then, Ananus had formerly filled the office of high priest, and now filled that of high priest's vicar,—more especially when it is borne in mind that all who had been high priests, ever after, by courtesy, were so styled,—there is no great wonder that the appellation is given to Ananus or Annas. Our Saviour was carried before Annas, directly after his seizure in the garden of Gethsemane.

ANATHEMA, something devoted, or set apart, or consecrated to God. The word is generally applied to that which was doomed or devoted to destruction, and could not be redeemed. Such were the Canaanites; Jericho also was in this situation, and hence the aggravation of Achan's sin, in attempting to appropriate what the Lord had doomed. In all such cases, the solemn giving over to destruction is on the part of the Lord, and not of man. "None devoted, which shall be devoted of (or rather from among) men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death." Lev. xxvii. 29. It was applied also to the highest degree of ecclesiastical censure or excommunication among the Jews, in virtue of which the individual was cut off from all church privileges, and separated from the synagogue, being given over to destruction as one incurably impenitent. The older Greek writers use the word anathema in reference to those who devoted themselves for the good of their country. This is the more ancient sense of anathema. Afterwards, when it came to be employed in ecclesiastical censures, it received the signification of separating from or excommunication; importing that the person on whom the sentence was passed was cut off from the communion of the faithful, and given over to the wrath and vengeance of the Almighty. (See next Article.)

ANATHEMA MARANATHA. We meet with this form of expression but once in Scripture (1 Cor. xvi. 22), where the Apostle Paul, in reference to the faction which had sprung up in the Church, and betrayed a great disregard to the authority of Christ, says, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema maranatha." To give additional force and solemnity, he appears to have written it with his own hand. Why these two words were not translated is not obvious. Anathema signifies accursed,—that is to say, condemned and devoted to utter destruction. Maranatha signifies, the Lord cometh. In the Second Epistle of Clemens it is explained, "Let him be accursed until the coming of our Lord." They are the words with which the Jews began their greater excommunication,—whereby they not only excluded sinners from their society, but delivered them to the Divine curse (Hebrew, cherim), including both misery in this life and perdition in that which is to come. They used this form, because Enoch's prophecy of the second coming of Christ, to judge the world and punish the wicked, began with these words,—as we learn from Jude, who quotes the first sentence of that prophecy. Ver. 14. When the apostle, therefore, uses this form of solemn malediction, it is equivalent to saying of the sinner who loves not the Saviour, "It exceeds my power to express what ought to be the consequence of your crime, I therefore leave you to the Lord, when he comes to judge the quick and the dead."

ANATHOTH, a city of Benjamin (Josh. xxi. 18), about three miles from Jerusalem, according to Eusebius and Jerome, or twenty furlongs according to Josephus, where the Prophet Jeremiah was born, and where tradition says he wrote the Book of Lamentations. It was given to the Levites of Kohath's family, and was a city of refuge. Josh. xxi. 18. There is an Arab village built on the site of the ancient Anathoth, and the valley at the head of which it is situated is still called the Valley of Jeremiah. The ruins of the church erected here in primitive times, and dedicated to Jeremiah, now serve as an enclosure for flocks, which couch beside pilasters, on which rude paintings of saints, according to Mariti, are still visible.

ANCIENT OF DAYS. God is so called, because he existed from all eternity. Dan. vii. 9. The Lord's ancients, before whom he will reign gloriously, are his ancient people of Judah and Israel, whom, in the glorious millennium, he will convert to the Christian faith, and rule over as a glorious Church. Isa. xxiv. 23. Three times in the Prophecy of Daniel, and in the same chapter, we find the Lord distinguished by this name, and in no other part of Scripture. Dan. vii. 9, 13, 22.

ANDREW, THE APOSTLE. The Inspired Writings contain full information in reference to some of the apostles of our blessed Lord, but there are others of whom little more than a passing notice is given. Among the latter must be classed the Apostle Andrew. He was a native of Bethsaida, a city of Galilee, standing upon the banks of the lake of Gennesareth. He was the brother of Simon Peter, but whether older or younger is not clearly decided, though almost all the ancient writers, except Epiphanius, agree in thinking him to have been the younger brother. Being the son of a fisherman, he was trained to that humble occupation, at which he continued, until, on the invitation of his Saviour, he became a "fisher of men." He was first a disciple of John the Baptist, who, having pointed out to him the Messiah, as the "Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world," he straightway forsook his former master, and proceeded to follow Jesus. Hence Andrew has often been styled, by the early writers, the "first called disciple," though he can scarcely be considered as such, a considerable time having elapsed, probably more than a year after he began to follow Christ, before he was regularly called. He had previously introduced his brother Simon, and both together being engaged in their wonted occupation on the sea of Tiberias, Jesus announced to them, that henceforth they must quit their worldly calling, and, leaving all must follow him, as his more immediate attendants, and the authorised preachers of his truth. Little more is said in the New Testament of Andrew individually, after he was called to the apostleship; his history is mingled up with that of the other apostles.

When, after the ascension of our blessed Lord, the apostles were scattered throughout different regions, it is generally supposed that the Apostle Andrew laboured in Scythia, and the neighbouring countries; others are of opinion that he preached in Greece; others, in Epirus, Achaia, or Argos. The modern Greeks make him founder of the Church of Byzantium, or Constantinople, and it is alleged that here he ordained Stachys, whom Paul calls his "beloved Stachys," first bishop of the place. It is well known, that, as the end of his faithful labours in the cause of the Redeemer, Andrew was honoured with the crown of martyrdom. A detailed account of this event is given in a work of great antiquity, entitled, the "Acts of his Passion," said to have been written by the presbyters and deacons of Achaia, who had been present at his martyrdom. According to this narrative, which, whether it be authentic or not, it is impossible to say, he was committed to prison at Patræ, by the command of Ægeas, proconsul of Achaia, in consequence of his open profession of the Christian faith, and his refusal to sacrifice to the gods. The day after he had been imprisoned, another attempt was made by the proconsul to persuade Andrew to sacrifice to the gods. The apostle was firm and immoveable, upon which the sentence of death was passed upon him. The proconsul first gave orders that he should be scourged by seven lictors, and this punishment having failed to produce any impression upon the resolute mind of the devoted apostle, he was commanded to be crucified. He walked to the place of execution with a serene countenance, and a firm unflinching step. When he had come within sight of the cross, his soul seemed to kindle into a holy rapture at the thought, that he was to be honoured by suffering the same mode of death as that which was inflicted upon his Lord and Master, and he broke forth into expressions of the strongest exultation and triumph. For two, nay, some say three days, he hung upon the cross, not being fastened to it with nails, but only bound with cords, that his death might be the more lingering. At length he prayed earnestly to be released from his sufferings; the Lord heard him, and he expired, rejoicing in that Saviour whom he had so faithfully served.

The cross on which the Apostle Andrew suffered martyrdom appears to have been of a peculiar form, being composed of two pieces of wood, crossing each other in the form of the letter X. His body, after his death, was taken down from the cross, and interred at the expense of Maximilla, a noble lady. Afterwards, his body was removed by Constantine the Great to Constantinople, and buried in the great church which he had built in honour of the apostles, and where it was still found some hundred years after, by Justinian the emperor.

ANDRONA, a term used for that part in churches which was destined for the men. Anciently it was the custom for the men and women to have separate apartments in places of worship, where they performed their devotions asunder, which method is still religiously observed in the Greek Church. The same custom prevails in the Jewish synagogues.

ANDRONICUS, a kinsman and fellow-prisoner of the Apostle Paul, who tells us that he was "of note," or held in high reputation "among the apostles." Rom. xvi. 7. Nothing more is known of him.

ANEM, or ENGAMMIN, a town of the tribe of Issachar, situated near Bethel, and assigned to the Levites by lot. 1 Chron. vi. 73.

ANER, a city belonging to the half tribe of Manasseh, on the west side of the Jordan, which was given to the Levites. It appears to be the same with Tanach. 1 Chron. vi. 70; Josh. xxi. 25. Aner was also the name of one of the Canaanite princes who joined with Abraham in attacking the confederate kings who had pillaged Sodom, and taken Lot prisoner. Gen. xiv. 24.

ANGEL. The word implies simply a messenger or person sent, and is applied to a particular order of beings, the first in rank and dignity in the creation of God. They are intelligent, immortal spirits, of unwearied activity, and excelling in strength. Their number is spoken of in Scripture as very great. The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels. Many of those exalted beings retain the condition of perfect holiness and happiness in which they were originally created, while others of them have sinned and fallen, and are doomed throughout eternity to reap the bitter consequences of their transgressions. The Apostle Jude says, (verse 6), that some of them "kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation."

On the question of guardian angels, Bishop Horsley observes: "That the holy angels are often employed by God in his government of this sublunary world, is indeed to be clearly proved by holy writ. That they have power over the matter of the universe, analogous to the powers over it which men possess, greater in extent, but still limited, is a thing which might reasonably be supposed, if it were not declared. But it seems to be confirmed by many passages of holy writ; from which it seems also evident that they are occasionally for certain specific purposes, commissioned to exercise those powers to a prescribed extent. That the evil angels possessed before their fall the like powers, which they are still occasionally permitted to exercise for the punishment of wicked nations, seems also evident. That they have a power over the human sensory, which they are occasionally permitted to exercise, and by means of which they may inflict diseases, suggest evil thoughts, and be the instruments of temptations, must also be admitted. But all this amounts not to any thing of a discretionary authority placed in the hands of tutelar angels, or to an authority to advise the Lord God with respect to the measures of his government. Confidently I deny that a single text is to be found in holy writ, which, rightly understood, gives the least countenance to the abominable doctrine of such a participation of the holy angels in God's government of the world. In what manner then, it may be asked, are the holy angels made at all subservient to the purposes of God's government? This question is answered by St Paul in his Epistle to the Hebrews, in the last verse of the first chapter; and this is the only passage in the whole Bible, in which we have any thing explicit upon the office and employment of angels: 'Are they not all,' saith he, 'ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them that shall be heirs of salvation?' They are all, however high in rank and order, nothing more than 'ministering spirits,' or, literally, 'serving spirits;' not invested with authority of their own, but 'sent forth,' occasionally sent forth, to do such service as may be required of them, 'for them that shall be heirs of salvation.'" See Matt. xviii. 10; 1 Cor. xi. 10; Eccles. v. 6.

ANGELICS, an ancient sect, supposed by some to have got this appellation from their excessive veneration of angels; and by others, from maintaining that the world was created by angels.

ANGELITES, a sect in the reign of the emperor Anastasius, about the year 494; so called from Angelium, a place in the city of Alexandria, where they held their first meetings. They were called likewise Severites, from Severus, who was the head of their sect; as also Theodosians, from one Theodosius, whom they made pope at Alexandria. They held that the persons of the trinity are not the same; that none of them exists of himself, and of his own nature; but that there is a common God or Deity existing in them all, and that each is God by a participation of this Deity.

ANGEL OF THE LORD, or THE ANGEL JEHOVAH, a title of Christ in his appearances to the patriarchs and others in the Old Testament. The ancient Rabbins understood the Messiah under the denomination of the Angel. In Mal. iii. 1, he bears this express designation,—“Behold, I will send my Messenger,” &c. Stephen says, “There appeared to Moses in the wilderness of Mount Sinai, an angel of the Lord in a flame of fire.”

ANGELS OF THE CHURCHES. This title is somewhat disputed. Dr Prideaux observes, that the minister of the synagogue, who officiated in offering the public prayers, being the mouth of the congregation, delegated by them, as their representative, messenger, or angel, to address God in prayer for them, was in Hebrew called sheliack-zibbor, that is, the angel of the church; and that from hence the chief ministers of the seven churches of Asia are in the Revelation, by a name borrowed from the synagogue, called angels of those churches. And the reason of the application of the word angel to the ministers of the gospel, will be sufficiently obvious from various considerations. The literal import of the word is sufficient to suggest at least one reason of the name. It signifies a messenger, or one sent upon any special errand. Our Lord himself is frequently termed an angel. He is called the Angel of God's presence, the Angel the Redeemer, and the Angel of the Covenant. All the prophets had messages from God to deliver; they are therefore called angels, or messengers. “Then spoke Haggai, the Lord's messenger,” or in Hebrew, the angel of the Lord, “the Lord's message unto the people.” The term in this view of it is equally applicable to the ordinary ministers of religion; because the same message which the angel of God's presence gave unto the prophets, is now committed to the faithful ambassadors of Christ, the ministers of the truth. Various additional reasons might be given for such a use of the term angels, such as the spiritual nature of the ministerial office, and the peculiar qualities of those who scripturally discharge that office. It is impossible to read attentively those passages in which the words “angel of the Church” occur, without perceiving that the word angel is used as equivalent to elder, presbyter, bishop, or overseer; and yet Episcopalians have drawn, from the circumstance of the word angel being employed in the singular number, an argument in favour of there being only one minister in the Church, or that a diocesan bishop was intended. It must be borne in mind, however, that the word angel is not to be understood of an individual, but of a collective body, as including all the office-bearers, and perhaps even the members of the Asiatic Churches.

ANGER, a painful passion of the mind, arising from the actual or supposed reception of an injury, with a present purpose of punishment. All anger is by no means sinful; it was designed by the Author of our nature for self-defence; nor is it altogether a selfish passion, since it is excited by injuries offered to others as well as ourselves, and sometimes prompts us to reclaim offenders from sin and danger. Eph. iv. 26. But it becomes sinful when conceived upon trivial occasions or inadequate provocations; when it breaks forth into outrageous actions; vents itself in reviling language, or is concealed in our thoughts to the degree of hatred.

ANGER OF GOD. See WRATH.

ANGLO-CALVINISTS, a name given by some writers to the members of the Church of England agreeing with the other Calvinists in most points, excepting church government. See CALVINISM.

ANIMAL, an organized and living body, endued with sensation and the power of voluntary movement. The characteristics of the three kingdoms of nature are thus briefly laid down by Linnæus,—“Minerals grow; vegetables grow and live; animals grow, live, and feel.” The objects of natural history, however, are no longer divided into three kingdoms, but the divisions now established are those of organic and non-organic; the former including all animals and plants, the latter all mineral substances. The Hebrews distinguished animals into clean and unclean, or those which might be eaten and offered, and those whose use was prohibited.

The following list of animals accounted unclean by the Hebrews, is chiefly founded on the Vulgate:—

UNCLEAN ANIMALS.

Quadrupeds.

The Camel, Hare, Hog, Porcupine or Hedgehog.

Birds.

The Eagle, Ossifrage, Sea Eagle, Kite, Vulture and its species, Raven and its species, Ostrich, Owl, Moor-hen, Sparrow-hawk, Screech-owl, Cormorant, Ibis, Swan, Bittern, Porphyrio, Heron, Curlew, Lapwing.

Creeping Quadrupeds.

The Weasel, Mouse, Shrew-mouse, Mole, Cameleon, Eft, Lizard, Crocodile.

All that have not cloven hoofs, and do not chew the cud, were accounted unclean, and could neither be eaten nor offered in sacrifice. The division of animals into clean and unclean, existed before the Law of Moses, and even before the flood. The reason of it, therefore, is probably to be traced to the regulation of sacrifices. That the original distinction had no reference to the food of man is plain, from the circumstance that animals were not allowed to man for food till after the flood. The prevailing reason assigned by the fathers of the Christian church, is the design of Jehovah to teach his people that they must be holy as separated from the impure heathen around them. And this idea is farther borne out by the explanation which Peter received in his vision at Joppa, when he was plainly taught, that the distinction between Jew and Gentile was now at an end.

ANIMAL FEELING, a term used (of late) by theological writers to describe that sort of religious excitement which may be produced through sympathy and the imagination, or merely physical causes in some way associated with religion, while neither the reason, the conscience, or the heart, are brought into their proper action. The term is derived from the fact, that affections of this kind have their source and seat, not in the mind strictly speaking, but in the animal frame, and are liable to be mistaken for the genuine affections of piety, while in truth they may and do exist, often in the highest degree, where the subject of them exhibits incontestible evidence of being still unrenewed in the spirit of his mind.

Many even of the truly pious, it is to be feared, judge of their spiritual state, under the mistaken supposition, that the force of the religious affections is to be mainly estimated by the physical thermometer—by the degree of mere animal fervour—by ardours, and transports, and raptures, of which, from constitutional temperament, a person may be easily susceptible; or into which, daily experience must convince us, that people of strong conceptions, and warm passions, may work themselves, without much difficulty, where their hearts are by no means truly or deeply interested. Every tolerable actor can attest the truth of this remark. These high degrees of the passions, bad men may experience; good men may want. They may be the natural operations of either a genuine or a fictitious piety, and therefore cannot be the true standard by which to determine either the nature or the strength of the religious affections.

To ascertain the true nature of our feelings, we must examine,—1. Whether they are grounded in evangelical knowledge. Animal feelings are ignorant, erroneous, or vague; but evangelical affections have their root in strong and just conceptions of the supreme excellence of their object, and lead us to count all things loss, in comparison with the knowledge of Christ, and an interest in his great salvation. 2. Whether they are permanent, or habitual. Animal feelings are but occasional visitants; evangelical affections are the abiding inmates of the soul. 3. Whether they are of holy tendency. Animal feelings often coincide with some vicious passion or propensity; but evangelical affections are irreconcilably opposed to every sin. 4. Whether they exert a conscientious control over the whole man. Animal feelings generally disturb the intellect, and often overpower and exhaust the frame by their violence; but evangelical affections, when most intense, regulate the appetites, and moderate all the inferior desires, which are culpable only in their excess; thus striving to reign serenely in the bosom, with a settled, undisputed predominance. Above all, 5. Whether they are practical in their influence. Animal feelings end in the mere terror, or luxury, of the excitement; but evangelical affections prompt to the active discharge of the duties of life,—the personal, domestic, and relative, the professional, and social, and civil duties. Here the wideness of their range, and the universality of their influence, will generally serve to distinguish the evangelical feelings from those which are merely animal. From the daily incidents of conjugal and domestic life, we learn that a heat of affection, occasionally vehement, but superficial and transitory, may consist too well with a course of conduct exhibiting incontestible proofs of neglect and unkindness. But IF A MAN LOVE ME, says Christ, HE WILL KEEP MY WORDS. John xiv. 23. Without suffering ourselves, therefore, to derive too much complacency from transient fervours of devotion, we should carefully and frequently prove ourselves by this unequivocal text, given us by our Saviour and Judge; impartially examining our daily conduct; and often comparing our ACTUAL with our POSSIBLE SERVICES; the fair amount of our exertions, with our natural or acquired means, and multiplied opportunities of usefulness among men.

ANIMAL WORSHIP. One of the most degrading forms which idolatry has assumed, is that of the worship of animals of various descriptions. In what country this species of worship was first practised cannot be traced; but the Egyptians appear to have been the first, as far as we can find, who reduced it to a regular system. From them the Israelites appear to have acquired a tendency to this sin, as exhibited in the adoration of the golden calf. What reasons can be alleged for such a strange and perverted practice as the worship of animals, we cannot conceive. Whether it arose from any real or fancied peculiarities connected with the beasts themselves, or whether they were viewed allegorically, or as emblems of great historical facts or epochs, cannot now be known. The animals selected for worship, were of the most varied description. The ox, the sheep, the ichneumon, the cat, the dog, the serpent, all shared in the fervent adoration of the Egyptian people. Serpents, bulls, and calves, appear to have been favourite objects of worship. Lands were set apart for the support of the sacred animals; men and women were employed in feeding and maintaining them. If a person killed any of these creatures undesignedly, he was put to death, and when any of them died, great lamentation was made, and often large sums were expended on their funeral.

ANISE, an annual umbelliferous plant, the seeds of which have an aromatic smell, a pleasant, warm taste, and a carminative quality. But by anithon (Matt. xxiii. 23), the dill is meant. Our translators, according to Dr Campbell, seem to have been first misled by a resemblance of the sound. No other versions have fallen into the mistake. The Greek of anise is anison; but of dill, anithon. The anise of Matthew was no doubt a species of the genus anethum, class pentandria, order digynia. It is usually supposed to have been the anethum graveolens of botanists.

ANKLETS. The prophet Isaiah (iii. 18) speaks of “tinkling ornaments about the feet” of Jewish women, evidently referring to a custom of wearing ornamental rings round the legs, to which little bells were fastened. This custom has prevailed from the earliest times in Persia, Arabia, and India.

ANNA, the daughter of Phanuel, a prophetess and widow, of the tribe of Asher. After having been only seven years married, she lost her husband in early life, and continued a widow till her death at the advanced age of fourscore and four. Some commentators think that the eighty-four years should be reckoned from the commencement of her widowhood which would make her considerably above a hundred years old; the majority, however, are of opinion that her age altogether was eighty-four years. She is described as serving God day and night in the temple, which explains as implying that she regularly and devoutly attended the morning and evening sacrifice at the temple. Luke ii. 36, 37. Why Anna is called a “prophetess,” commentators are not agreed. Some take the word in the sense of a predictress of future events; others think she is so called as being the wife of a prophet. Kopp explains it as meaning “Consecrated and devoted to God;” but nowhere is the word to be found bearing such a signification. We know nothing more either of the life or death of this holy woman.

ANNAS. See ANANUS.

ANNIHILATION, the act of reducing any created being into nothing. The sentiments of mankind have differed widely as to the possibility and impossibility of annihilation. According to some, nothing is so difficult,—it requires the infinite power of God to effect it: according to others, nothing so easy. Existence, say they, is a state of violence,—all things are continually endeavouring to return to their primitive nothing; it requires no power at all,—it will do itself; nay, more, it requires an infinite power to prevent it. With respect to human beings, it appears probable from reason, and it is fully confirmed by Scripture, that they will not be annihilated, but exist in a future state. Matt. x. 28; Eccles. xii. 7; John v. 24; 1 Thess. v. 10; Matt. xxv. 34, 41; Luke xvi. 22, 28, xx. 37, 38; 1 Cor. xv.

ANNUNCIATION, the tidings brought by the angel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary of the incarnation of Christ. It is also used to denote a festival kept by the Roman and Anglican Churches on the 25th of March, in commemoration of these tidings. See CONCEPTION, MIRACULOUS.

ANOINTING or UNCTION, a ceremony frequently employed by the Hebrews. It was not only used for religious purposes, but for purposes of health and cleanliness. When a guest entered the place of entertainment, it was a common custom to pour perfumed oil on his head, and even over the whole body—a custom which prevailed also in Egypt, as one of the principal tokens of welcome. Hence the Psalmist says, “Thou anointedst my head with oil;” and, to testify her respect for Jesus, a woman is mentioned as bringing an alabaster box of ointment, very precious, and pouring it over him. “In the time of Christ,” says Dr Nevins, “it was the custom in many cases to anoint the sick with oil. This was counted a remedy in some particular diseases, and was originally applied merely on account of its natural healing power. It came, however, to be abused by the Jews as a magical charm. That people in later ages gave themselves up very much to the folly of enchantments and superstitious rites of various kinds. Some such form of sorcery seems to have grown into use in making applications of oil to the sick, whereby it was thought the remedy would be rendered powerful and certain. When the disciples of our Lord were sent forth, they thought proper not to neglect this common sign of healing, although the cures which they performed were altogether miraculous; ‘they anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.’ Mark vi. 13. So the apostle James directs the elders to pray over the sick, ‘anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord;’ by which he means, that while they observe the customary usage in this matter, they should do it in the name of Christ, and with prayer to him for healing power, when his blessing might be expected to raise the sick to life and health. Jas. v. 14. There might be, perhaps, in the exhortation, a reference to the superstitious manner in which the Jews sought to render the application effectual, as if he had said, ‘Be ye not like unto them’—‘I show unto you a more excellent way.’” The dead bodies of relatives also among the Greeks and Romans were anointed with oil. To this custom Homer refers.

Anointing was often resorted to by the Jews for sacred purposes. The high priest was consecrated to his mystical office by an unction with the most holy oil (Exod. xxix. 7, xxx. 30), which was poured upon his head in abundance, while inferior priests were only sprinkled with this oil. Thus, in a figure, we are taught that the Spirit is poured upon Christ without measure, but upon his people in measure. Thus was Christ anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows. Saul was anointed king; Elisha was anointed prophet; Aaron was anointed high priest; but Jesus alone was anointed prophet, priest, and king, in one glorious combination; and thus is he, in all the emphatic force of the expression, the Christ of God, the Messiah, the Lord’s Anointed One, the holy oil which the Jews were commanded to prepare and to use for sacred purposes being emblematic of the Holy Ghost.

The holy anointing oil, which was made by Moses (Exod. xxx. 22, 33), for the maintaining and consecrating of the king, the high priest, and all the sacred vessels made use of in the house of God, was one of those things, as Dr Prideaux observes, which was wanting in the second temple. The oil made and consecrated for this use, was commanded to be kept by the children of Israel throughout their generations, and therefore it was laid up in the most holy place of the tabernacle and the first temple. The consecration of Christ to the office of High Priest and Mediator, is beautifully presented to us in Scripture, under the figure of anointing oil being poured forth upon him. Hence he is called in the Old Testament, Messiah; and in the New Testament, Christ,—the Anointed one. The high priest under the law was consecrated to his mystical office by an unction with the most holy oil, which was poured upon his head so copiously, as “to run down upon the beard, and even to the skirts of his garments.” In this he typified the Lord Jesus Christ, on whom was poured out the Spirit without measure. As Christ received the unction from Jehovah the Father, so he communicates the same privilege to all his people. And accordingly, they are said to have an unction from the Holy One, and to know all things. The Apostle Paul tells the Corinthian believers that they were anointed of God. And again we are told, that “this anointing which they receive of Him abideth in them, and teacheth them.”

ANT, nemleh; in the Turkish and Arabic, neml, Prov. vi. 6, xxx. 25. It is a little insect, famous from all antiquity for its social habits, its economy, unwearied industry, and prudent foresight. It has afforded a pattern of commendable frugality to the profuse, and of unceasing diligence to the slothful. Solomon calls the ants “exceeding wise; for though a race not strong, yet they prepare their meat in the summer.” The foresight of the ant is quite proverbial. Both sacred and profane writers speak of it. On this subject we may quote the following interesting remarks from ‘The Introduction to Entomology,’ by Kirby and Spence: “Till the manners of exotic ants are more accurately explored, it would be rash to affirm that no ants have magazines of provisions; for although, during the cold of our winters in this country, they remain in a state of torpidity, and have no need of food, yet in warmer regions, during the rainy seasons, when they are probably confined to their nests, a store of provisions may be necessary for them. Even in northern climates, against wet seasons, they may provide in this way for their sustenance and that of the young brood, which, as Mr Smeatham observes, are very voracious, and cannot bear to be long deprived of their food; else why do ants carry worms, living insects, and many other such things, into their nests? Solomon’s lesson to the sluggard has been generally adduced as a strong confirmation of the ancient opinion; it can, however, only relate to the species of a warm climate, the habits of which are probably different from those of a cold one; so that his words, as commonly interpreted, may be perfectly correct and consistent with nature, and yet be not at all applicable to the species that are indigenous to Europe. But I think, if Solomon's words are properly considered, it will be found, that this interpretation has been fathered upon them, rather than fairly deduced from them. He does not affirm that the ant, which he proposes to the sluggard as an example, laid up in her cell stores of grain; but, with considerable prudence and foresight, she makes use of the proper seasons to collect a supply of provision sufficient for her purposes. There is not a word in them implying that she stores up grain or other provision. She prepares her bread, and gathers her food, namely, such food as is suited to her, in summer and harvest,—that is, when it is most plentiful; and thus shows her wisdom and prudence by using the advantages offered to her. The words thus interpreted, which they may be without any violence, will apply to the species among us as well as to those that are not indigenous."

ANTEDILUVIAN WORLD. This is the name given to the world before the flood. What was the actual state of matters during that time, including nearly two thousand years, we have scanty materials from which to draw a correct conclusion. We are informed, however, that the life of man was protracted to a period far beyond his present term of years; and from this single fact, recorded in the Scriptures, we are warranted in inferring that the atmosphere must have been much more healthful then, both in its nature and qualities, than now. From the few brief hints, also, which the Bible gives, it would appear that man, in his antediluvian condition, must have been superior in stature; and accordingly, we find it declared, that there were giants in those days. From the organic remains of that period, indeed, not man only, but the whole of the animal and vegetable world, must have been of gigantic dimensions. In many respects, the earth must have been nearly the same as at present. An abundant vegetation must have covered the surface; metals, particularly brass and iron, must have been dug from its bowels, and manufactured for the use and convenience of man; many of the arts, and some even of the sciences, must have attained a considerable extent of cultivation. All traces of the skill, and monuments of the industry of mankind before the deluge, were swept away with the world itself. But whatever may have been the knowledge and the ingenuity of individuals, the great mass of the human family were probably wandering tribes, living chiefly a pastoral and agricultural life, feeding upon vegetables and fruits, and using the animals only in sacrifices. What form of government prevailed in the antediluvian world is unknown, but probably the patriarchal, as being the simplest and best suited to an early period of the world's history, would predominate. Each head of a family or tribe would exercise authority over his family and dependants, over whom he possessed unlimited control. Whatever may have been the form of their civil polity, it seems to have been utterly inadequate to prevent the rapid growth of profligacy, and a general corruption of manners. The moral influence of Noah, the preacher of righteousness, was despised and set at naught; and at length "it repented God that he had made man upon the earth." The whole world was destroyed by a flood, with the exception of Noah and his family. The tide of desolation swept from the face of the earth the whole mass of its ungodly inhabitants, leaving scarcely a single trace of its former condition.

ANTELOPE. This animal is not mentioned in our translation of the Bible; but it is generally agreed, that the zebi, which our translators take for the roe, is the gazelle, or antelope. The former animal is extremely rare in Palestine, and the adjoining countries; while the latter is common in every part of the Levant. Add to this, that the zebi was allowed to the Hebrews as an article of food (Dent. xii. 15, &c.), and scarcely a doubt can remain on the subject.

The name of this animal, which is from a verb, signifying, to assemble, or collect together, is very characteristic of the gregarious character of the antelope, which live together in large troops, to the number sometimes of two or three thousand. The Septuagint, or Greek version of the Bible, uniformly translates the Hebrew word, beauty; and it is so translated, 2 Sam. i. 19; Isaiah iv. 2; Ezek. vii. 20, &c.

The gazelle forms a connecting species between the goat and the deer kinds, somewhat resembling the former internally, and the latter externally, except its horns, which are annulated, or ringed round, with longitudinal depressions running from the bottom to the point. Of all animals in the world, the gazelle is said to have the most beautiful eye.

From Dr Russell we learn that the inhabitants of Syria distinguish between the antelope of the mountain and that of the plain. The former is the most beautifully formed, and it bounds with surprising agility; the latter is of a much lighter colour, and is neither so strong nor so active. Both, however, are so fleet, that the greyhounds, though reckoned excellent, cannot come up with them, without the aid of the falcon, except in soft, deep ground. It is to the former species of this animal, apparently, that the sacred writers allude, since they distinctly notice their fleetness upon the mountains. 1 Chron. xii. 8; Cant. ii. 8, 17, viii. 14.

The usual method of taking the antelope is by hunting it with the falcon, or the ounce; but it is sometimes taken by the following expedient:—A tame antelope, bred up for the purpose, is taught to join those of its kind wherever it perceives them. When the hunter, therefore, discovers a herd of these together, he fixes a noose round the horns of the tame animal, in such a manner, that if the rest but touch it they are entangled; and thus prepared, he sends his antelope among the rest. The tame animal no sooner approaches, but the males of the herd instantly sally forth to oppose him; and in butting with their horns, are caught in the noose. Finding itself taken in the snare, terror lends it additional strength and activity, and it makes the most vigorous exertions to disentangle itself, and escape before the hunter can come up with it. Its effort, under these circumstances, is proposed for imitation to the person who had rashly become surety for his neighbour: "Deliver thyself as a roe (an antelope) from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the fowler." Prov. vi. 5. That is, "Thou hast imprudently placed thyself in perilous circumstances, suffer no delay in making an effort for thy release."

ANTHEM, a church song, performed in cathedral service, by choristers who sung alternately. It was used to denote both psalms and hymns.

ANTICHRIST. This is a very important subject. The word is derived from the Greek, Antichristos, and, according to Bishop Hurd, signifies, "a person of power, actuated with a spirit opposite to that of Christ." For, to adopt the illustration of the same learned writer, "as the word CHRIST is frequently used in the apostolic writings for the doctrine of Christ,—in which sense we are said to 'put on Christ,' to 'grow in Christ,' or to 'learn Christ;' so ANTI-CHRIST, in the abstract, may be taken for a doctrine subversive of the Christian; and when applied to a particular man, or body of men, it denotes one who sets himself against the spirit of that doctrine." In this general sense, every person who is hostile to the authority of Christ, as Lord or Head of the Church, and to the spirit of his religion, may be called Antichrist; and the term occurs as thus used by the Apostle John, when, referring to certain false teachers, who corrupted the truth from its simplicity, he says, "Even now are there many antichrists." 1 John ii. 18, iv. 3. But the name is generally employed to denominate a great power that was to arise at a period subsequent to the days of the apostles, and which, in an extraordinary degree, was to corrupt the doctrine, blaspheme the name, and persecute the followers of Christ. 2 Thess. ii. 3-10; 1 Tim. iv. 1-4; 2 Tim. iii. 1-5.

What power is precisely indicated by the Scripture term Antichrist, has given rise to much discussion. The language employed in the apostolic writings, "the man of sin,"—"that wicked one,"—"the son of perdition," clearly points to an apostasy. In the book of Revelation the antichristian power is spoken of as "a great whore," and "the mother of harlots." The whole description, particularly that in 2 Thess. ii. 3-11, seems to point to Antichrist as a false or apostate church, in opposition to the true Church of Christ. "Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things? And now ye know what withholdeth, that he might be revealed in his time. For the mystery of iniquity doth already work: only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way: and then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming: even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie." Speaking upon this passage, Dr Begg well remarks, in his admirable 'Handbook of Popery':—"The place is fixed: the man of sin was to spring up in the Roman empire, for it was the Roman power that 'let' or hindered its development. In the time of this apostle the 'mystery' had begun to 'work,'—the 'little horn' of Daniel had begun to force its way up amongst the Roman kingdoms. The time is fixed: when the Roman secular power is subverted or 'taken out of the way,' then 'that wicked' was to be 'revealed.' The nature of the power is clearly described: it was to be partly temporal, taking to some extent the place of the Roman government, and partly spiritual, 'sitting in the temple of God.' It was like Daniel's 'little horn,' to be a blasphemous and wicked power 'opposing and exalting itself above all that is called God.' The manner of its manifestation is clearly described: it was to come 'after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders.' The end of this power, also, is again clearly foretold. In short, the prediction by Paul and that by Daniel, exactly correspond with each other and with Popery, but are applicable to nothing else. The same apostle gives another description of the approaching 'mystery of iniquity' in the following passage:—"Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their consciences seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth; for every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving." 1 Tim. iv. 1-4. Here a number of additional particulars are stated, all clearly applicable to the Popish Church. The 'latter times' are evidently those of the gospel; and it is vain for the adherents of Rome to allege that the word 'some' cannot apply to them, inasmuch as they are very numerous, for the same word is often used in Scripture to describe nearly a whole people,—as where Paul says, 'some, when they heard, did provoke' (Heb. iii. 16), although he is speaking of nearly the whole congregation of Israel. The apostle's description embraces not only the lying spirit of Popery, which has always been one of its leading features, its prohibition of marriage in the case of nuns, monks, and priests—a most remarkable feature of the system,—its commands to abstain from certain meats, but, as Mede has proved in a learned treatise on this passage, its restoration of the demon or hero-worship of the Pagans, in the form of an impious devotion offered to the Virgin Mary and the real or supposed saints."

Roman Catholic writers have sometimes attempted to apply the vivid description given of Antichrist in the New Testament to the secular Roman empire. This was the view maintained by Bossuet, and it was even supported by Grotius and Hammond. This explanation, however, is altogether untenable; and, accordingly, theological writers in all ages, even from the earliest periods in the history of Christianity, have maintained that the antichristian apostasy was to appear soon after the subversion of the Roman empire. It was the openly avowed opinion of Gregory the Great in the sixth century, that the Antichrist would be properly applicable to any man who should assume the title of Universal Bishop in the Christian Church; and yet it is remarkable that his immediate successor, Boniface III., was invested with this very title by the tyrant Phocas. The year in which the supremacy of the Pope was consummated is sometimes alleged to be A.D. 533; and as Daniel predicts that the antichristian power would exercise dominion for a time, and times, and the dividing of time, which is generally understood to denote 1260 years, we are brought to the year 1793, which was remarkable as being the year in which France, the chief supporter of the Papacy, destroyed and did away with its dominion by an act of the French assembly. Others, however, date from the year A.D. 606, which points forward to the year 1866 as the year in which the Papal power is destined to be destroyed. Regarding its fall, one thing is certain, that the antichristian system of Popery is destined not to be reformed, but to be destroyed.

ANTI-LIBANUS. See LEBANON.

ANTIMONIANS, persons in the fourth century, who are mentioned by Mosheim as having denied the perpetual virginity of our Lord's mother, believing that she had afterwards children by Joseph,—the brethren of our Lord.

ANTINOMIANS. These derive their name from two Greek words, signifying, against law; their favourite tenet being, that the law is not a rule of life to believers under the gospel. The appellation is also generally given to those who carry the doctrine of justification by faith without works to such an extreme as to separate practical holiness from true believing, and injure, if not wholly destroy, every obligation to moral obedience. The following clear account of the doctrine is given by the celebrated Robert Hall:—"The fundamental tenet of the system consists in the denial of the obligation of believers to obey the precepts of Christ,—in supposing that their interest in the merits of the Redeemer releases them from all subjection to his authority; and, as it is acknowledged on all hands that he is the sole Lord of the Christian dispensation, the immediate consequence is, that, as far as they are concerned, the moral government of the Deity is annihilated,—that they have ceased to be accountable creatures. But this involves the total subversion of religion; for what idea can we form of a religion in which all the obligations of piety and morality are done away,—in which nothing is binding or imperative on the conscience? We may conceive of a religious code under all the possible gradations of laxness or severity,—of its demanding more or less, or of its enforcing its injunctions by penalties more or less formidable; but, to form a conception of a system deserving the name of religion, which prescribes no duties whatever, and is enforced by no sanctions, seems an impossibility. On this account it appears to me improper to speak of Antinomianism as a religious error; religion, whether true or false, has nothing to do with it: it is rather to be considered as an attempt to substitute a system of subtle and specious impiety in the room of Christianity."

Antinomianism may be traced to the period of the Reformation. Its founder was John Agricola, at first a disciple of Luther, but afterwards an opponent both to him and Melancthon. While Luther was eagerly employed in censuring and refuting the popish doctors, who mixed the law and the gospel together, and represented eternal life as the fruit of legal obedience, John Agricola went into another extreme, and took occasion to advance sentiments which Luther deemed Antinomian. He is said to have taught, that the law ought not to be proposed as a rule of life, nor used in the Church as a means of instruction,—and, of course, that repentance is not to be preached from the decalogue, but from the gospel only; that the gospel alone is to be inculcated and explained; and that good works do not promote our salvation, nor evil works hinder it.

In the seventeenth century, some of his followers in England are said to have expressly maintained, that as the elect cannot fall from grace, nor forfeit the Divine favour, so neither are the evil actions they commit really sinful, or to be considered as violations of the Divine law; and that, consequently, they have no occasion to confess their sins, or to seek renewed forgiveness. The Antinomian does things wrong in themselves, but they are not wrong when he does them, because he is a believer; so that were he to steal, the crime commonly called theft would in him lose all its criminality, and cease to be a breach of the eighth commandment.

It does not appear that any set of professed Christians ever called themselves Antinomians,—it is rather a term of reproach, which one party has too freely applied to another, and which, therefore, requires to be received with caution. The unguarded expressions which some persons have used, the bold positions they have advanced, and the construction to which their language is liable, have led others to charge them with Antinomian principles, when, in reality, they meant not so. Thus, when they have spoken lightly of good works, or asserted that believers have nothing to do with the law of God, without fully explaining what they mean,—when they assert that God is not angry with his people for their sins, nor in any sense punishes them on that account, without at all distinguishing between fatherly correction and vindictive wrath;—these, and similar expressions, whatever be the private sentiments of those who advance them, have a direct tendency to injure the minds and morals of mankind, though it be under a pretence of enhancing the riches and freeness of Divine grace.

Properly speaking, those only are Antinomians who are avowedly hostile to the law of God,—who neither preach nor profess to embrace it, but term those Legalists who do. With them, preaching the law is an abomination; and they will have nothing to do with it, except to vilify and condemn. Others of a similar description, but who are not aware of the tendency of their own statements, have embraced a system which, by perverting the doctrine of Divine decrees and efficacious grace, sets aside all moral obligation, and destroys the accountability of man. "The most effectual antidote," to use the words of Robert Hall, "to the leaven of Antinomianism, will probably be found in the frequent and earnest inculcation of the practical precepts of the gospel; in an accurate delineation of the Christian temper; in a specific and minute exposition of the personal, social, and relative duties,—enforced at one time by the endearing, at another by the alarming, motives, which Revelation abundantly suggests. To overlook the distinguishing doctrines of the gospel, under the pretence of advancing the interests of morality, is one extreme; to inculcate those doctrines, without habitually adverting to their purifying and transforming influence, is another, not less dangerous. If the former involves the folly of attempting to rear a structure without a foundation, the latter leaves it naked and useless."

ANTIOCH, a city of Syria, situated on both sides of the river Orontes, about twenty miles from the place where it discharges itself into the Mediterranean. There were formerly many cities which bore that name; but this was the metropolis of Syria, and indeed of all the East. It was built three hundred years before Christ, by Seleucus Nicanor, and named in honour of his father Antiochus. Seleucus built in the same country the city of Seleucia, named from himself; Apamea, from his wife Apama; Laodicea, from his mother Laodice; and these three, together with Antioch, gave to that quarter of Syria the name of Tetrapolis, or the country of the four cities. The same name was afterwards given by Strabo to Antioch itself, because it consisted of four distinct divisions, built at different times, each surrounded with its own wall, but all enclosed by one common line of defence.

It was built in a square form, had many gates, and, on the north side stood a rising ground of considerable elevation. Like other eastern cities of note, it was richly adorned with galleries and fountains, and numerous works of art and beauty. Ammianus Marcellinus says that it was celebrated throughout the world, and that no city surpassed it in fertility of soil, or in extent of commerce.

The ancient capital passed through many vicissitudes, both physical and political. Three times in the fourth century, once in the fifth, and twice in the sixth, it was almost totally destroyed by earthquakes. In 529, the Emperor Justinian rebuilt it, and called it, as Evagrius informs us, Theopolis, or, the city of God.

In A.D. 548, Chosroes, king of Persia, seized on it, burned it to the ground, and massacred the greater part of its inhabitants. Justinian rebuilt it A.D. 552. A second time was it taken by Chosroes, in 574, in the reign of Justin, when its walls and principal buildings were levelled to the ground. In the year 588, it was visited by a tremendous earthquake, by which sixty thousand of its inhabitants perished. It was again built, and again exposed to fresh calamities. In 637, or 638, in the reign of Heraclius, it was taken by the Saracens, and retaken by Nicephorus Phocas, in 966. In 970 Cedraus relates that an army of a hundred thousand Saracens besieged it, without success; but afterwards accomplished their purpose, raised new fortifications around it, and rendered it almost impregnable. Godfrey of Bouillon, when engaged in his crusading expedition for the recovery of the Holy Land, besieged Antioch in 1097. The struggle was long and sanguinary; but the Christians (so called), by their great bravery, and by means of a secret correspondence with the inhabitants, carried the day, June 3, 1098. This city having been frequently attacked by the Saracens, was ultimately taken, May 29th, 1268, by the Sultan of Egypt, who completely demolished it; and it has ever since been deprived of its former fame and magnificence, and has groined beneath the yoke of its Turkish oppressors. Once so beautiful, so flourishing, and so illustrious, it is now comparatively obscure and desolate, the mere shadow of its former greatness.

We learn, in the eleventh chapter of the book of Acts, that the persecution which arose at the time of the martyrdom of Stephen drove many of the disciples from the city of Jerusalem, and that, in their exile, they 'travelled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching to none but unto the Jews only,' that is, to native born Jews. Some of those thus dispersed 'were men of Cyprus and Cyrene,' who understood the Greek language, and who, when they arrived at Antioch, 'spoke unto the Grecians,' or Hellenistic Jews, 'preaching the Lord Jesus.' From this history it appears that extraordinary success attended their efforts; 'the hand of the Lord was with them; and a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord.'

In the first planting of the gospel at Antioch, we have a beautiful illustration of the genuine sympathies of Christianity in the parent church at Jerusalem. No sooner did it become acquainted with the success which had attended the preaching of its dispersed brethren at Antioch, than it sent one of its number, richly gifted, to inquire into the state of things, to aid the rising cause, and report the happy result. 'Then tidings of these things came unto the ears of the church which was in Jerusalem; and they sent forth Barnabas, that he should go as far as Antioch.' This 'son of consolation,' as his name denotes, proceeded on his grateful mission, and discovered, to his great joy, that the intelligence which had reached the church at Jerusalem was abundantly verified by the facts of the case. And 'when he came, and had seen the grace of God, he was glad, and exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord; for he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith; and much people was added unto the Lord.' In this brief sketch there is a fulness and a beauty not surpassed in any other scriptural narrative. What he saw, what he felt, what he enjoined, what he was enabled to effect, and what were the general bearings of his character, are all points of remarkable and touching interest.

Meanwhile Saul, who had sought refuge from persecution, as a Roman citizen, in Tarsus, his native city, was regarded by Barnabas as a person eminently qualified to advance the cause of Christ at Antioch. He proceeded, therefore, after a time, 'to Tarsus, for to seek Saul. And when he had found him he brought him to Antioch. And it came to pass, that a whole year they assembled themselves with the church, and taught much people.' The fact that he was the apostle of the Gentiles, and that he was well acquainted with the Greek tongue, no less than his remarkable conversion, and his ardent zeal, peculiarly pointed him out as a suitable messenger to the church at Antioch, where some of the most distinguished men of the age were wont to resort. Many things of special interest occurred in this city while Paul and Barnabas sojourned in it. Great numbers were converted to the faith of Christ, the disciples were there first called Christians, and Paul and Barnabas were sent, A.D. 44, with the alms of the church to their poor brethren at Jerusalem. On their return to Antioch, with John Mark, the cousin or nephew of Barnabas, the Holy Ghost intimated to them that they were to be separated to an extensive mission of mercy to the surrounding regions; and after prayer, fasting, and imposition of hands, they set out on their evangelic tour, and visited Cyprus, Perga, Iconium, Derbe, and Lystra, every where preaching Jesus to the people. After quitting Lystra, by reason of persecution, they revisited Antioch, from whence, A.D. 51, they were sent to Jerusalem, on occasion of certain disputes which arose concerning the observance of legal rites, to which the Jews were anxious to subject the Gentile converts. Having attended the council at Jerusalem, they returned immediately to Antioch, to deliver the mind of the apostles and brethren; but Peter, soon following, entangled Barnabas in a course of dissimulation with the Jews, and rendered it necessary for Paul, in his own noble simplicity and energy of character, to withstand them to the face, and to rebuke them sharply, for their timid and disingenuous conduct. After this Paul and Barnabas separated, the former passing into Asia, and the others proceeding towards Cyprus.

Antioch was the birthplace of Luke, and also of Theophilus, to whom his two books of the evangelical history were addressed. In this city, also, the name of Christians was first given—and, as the original word indicates, by Divine authority—to the followers of Christ, who before this were commonly styled Nazarenes, as being the followers of Jesus of Nazareth,—a name by which the Jews in scorn call them to this day, with the same intent with which the Gentiles of old were wont to call them Galileans.

Antioch, under its modern name of Antakia, is now but little known to the Western nations. It occupies, or rather did till lately occupy, a remote corner of the ancient enclosure of its walls. Its splendid buildings were reduced to hovels; and its population of half a million, to ten thousand wretched beings, living in the usual debasement and insecurity of Turkish subjects. Such was nearly its condition when visited by Pocock about the year 1738, and again by another traveller in 1813. But its ancient subterranean enemy, which, since its destruction in 587, never long together withheld its tremendous assaults, has again triumphed over it. The earthquake of the 13th of August 1822 laid it once more in ruins. The Jewish missionary, Wolfe, who was present at the awful scene, transmitted to his friends a most vivid description of this closing catastrophe. Every thing relating to Antioch is now past.

ANTIOCH, of Pisidia. Besides the Syrian capital, there was another Antioch, visited by Paul, when in Asia, and called, for the sake of distinction, Antioch in Pisidia, as belonging to that province, of which it was the capital. Here Paul and Barnabas preached. The site of this town was supposed until lately to be the spot on which Ak-Shekr now stands; but recent travellers have shown that it was situated probably near the town Yalobatch. There were several other cities of the name of Antioch (sixteen in number) in Syria and Asia Minor, built by the Seleucidæ, the successors of Alexander in these countries; but the above two are the only ones which it is necessary to describe as occurring in Scripture.

ANTIOCHUS. This was a common name applied to the Syrio-Grecian kings. There are references to several of those kings in the Old Testament prophets, and some of them are connected with Jewish history as related in the books of the Maccabees.

ANTIOCHUS SOTER, the son of Seleucus Nicanor. He derived the name of Saviour from having prevented the invasion of Asia by the Gauls, an event which is supposed to be referred to in 2 Mac. viii. 20. He began to reign, B.C. 276.

ANTIOCHUS THEOS, or THE GOD, was the son and successor of Antiochus Soter. He married Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. Laodice, his first wife, being herself despised, poisoned Antiochus, Berenice, and their son, who was intended to succeed in the kingdom. After this, Laodice procured Seleucus Callinicus, her son by Antiochus, to be proclaimed king of Syria. These events were foretold by Daniel xi. 6.

ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT, son of Seleucus Callinicus. He made war against Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, but was defeated, 3 Mac. i. On the death of Ptolemy, however, he resolved to obtain possession of Egypt. He immediately seized Cœlo-Syria, Phœnicia, and Judea. These were soon retaken by Scopas, general of the Egyptian army, only, however, to be again conquered by Antiochus. The Jews readily submitted to his government, and in return for their kindness, he granted them large sums of money to defray the expenses of their worship, and the free exercise of their religious privileges. Antiochus was conquered by the Romans, A.M. 3815; and two years afterwards, he and his army were surprised and cut off in an attempt to seize the treasures of the temple of Belus, at Elymais, B.C. 187. He left two sons, Seleucus Philopator and Antiochus Epiphanes who succeeded him.

ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, son and successor of Antiochus the Great, and a noted persecutor of the Jews. He is generally regarded as the subject of the predictions of Daniel xi. 21-29. The same prophet applies to him the epithet of "vile," v. 21, and Polybius, a contemporary historian, instead of Epiphanes, or the "illustrious," calls him Epimanes, or the "madman." Antiochus set his heart upon the conquest of Egypt. That country was then under the government of Ptolemy Philometor, his nephew, son to his sister Cleopatra. He entered Egypt, A.M. 3833, and reduced almost the whole of it to his obedience. 2 Mac. v. 3-5. The next year he returned, and while engaged in the siege of Alexandria, a false report was spread of his death. The Jews, on hearing this intelligence, were unable to restrain the open manifestation of their joy, whereupon Antiochus, enraged, entered Jerusalem by force, and slew multitudes of the inhabitants. To savage cruelty he added wicked profanity, for, conducted by the high priest Menelaus, he forced his way into the holy of holies, and carried off the most precious vessels of the temple. From that time he appeared to be determined upon the complete extirpation of the Jews. He issued an edict, prohibiting their usual religious rites. He caused the statue of Jupiter Olympus to be placed upon the altar of the temple. Judas Maccabæus resisted him with amazing valour, retook the temple, and restored the Jewish worship and sacrifices. On learning the success of Judas, Antiochus was transported with indignation, and declared that he would make Jerusalem a grave for the Jews. Providence, however, frustrated his plans. He fell from his chariot, and received such injuries that he died in the most excruciating torture of body, aggravated by the most intense agony of mind. His death happened B.C. 164.

ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR, son of Antiochus Epiphanes. He was only nine years old when his father died. Lysias, who conducted the government of the kingdom in the name of the young prince, carried on for some time the war against the Jews, but at length he concluded peace with them, and retired into Syria. In the meantime, Demetrius Soter, nephew to Antiochus Epiphanes, to whom by right the government belonged, having escaped from Rome, came into Syria. The inhabitants of Antioch opened the gates to him, and gave into his hands both Lysias and the young Antiochus Eupator, whom he caused to be put to death, B.C. 162.

ANTIOCHUS THEOS, son of Alexander Balas, king of Syria, an impostor, who personated Antiochus Eupator, and killed in battle Demetrius Soter, was treacherously put to death by Tryphon, his minister, after a short reign, B.C. 139.

ANTIOCHUS SIDETES, or EUSEBES THE PIOUS, the son of Demetrius Soter. On the death of his father, he came into Syria, and wrote to Simon Maccabæus to engage him against Tryphon, by whom his father had been murdered. 1 Mac. xv. 1-3. Antiochus pursued Tryphon until he forced him to kill himself. He assisted Ptolemy in the siege of Jerusalem, and succeeded in taking it, B.C. 134. A few years after he was killed in a war with the Persians or Parthians, B.C. 130.

ANTI-PÆDOBAPTISTS, a denomination given to those who object to the baptism of infants. See BAPTISM.

ANTIPAS. See HEROD.

ANTIPAS, the faithful martyr or witness mentioned in the book of Revelation, chap. ii. 13. He is said to have been one of our Saviour's first disciples, and to have suffered martyrdom at Pergamos, of which he was bishop. His Acts relate that he was burnt in a brazen bull. Though ancient ecclesiastical history furnishes no account of this Antipas, yet it is certain that, according to all the rules of language, what is said concerning him by John must be understood literally, and not mystically, as some interpreters have done.

ANTIPATER, an Idumean by birth, father of Herod the Great, and who both by birth and wealth was a great person in Idumea. He was appointed by the Roman Emperor to the office of Procurator of Judea, and took advantage of his position to nominate Phasael, his elder son, governor of Jerusalem, and Herod his younger, governor of Galilee. Antipater was at length poisoned, at the instigation of Malichus, who, after his death, seized upon the government of Jerusalem.

ANTIPATER, son of Herod the Great and Doris, his first wife. He attempted to poison his father, who imprisoned and afterwards put him to death.

ANTIPATRIS, a town in Palestine, anciently called Caphar-Saba, according to Josephus; but named Antipatris by Herod the Great, in honour of his father Antipater. Buckingham considers Mukhalid to be the site of Antipatris, but Dr Wilson prefers Caphar Saba, which he believes must stand in some of the Wadis near the source of the Nahr Arsnf. Paul visited Antipatris on his way to the governor of Judea at Cesarea. Acts xxiii. 31.

ANTI-SABBATARIANS, those who reject both the Jewish and the Christian Sabbaths. Directly opposed to these are Sabbatarians, who adhere rigidly to the original institution. When we have stated their reasonings under the latter denomination, we may endeavour to ascertain the Scripture doctrine on this important subject. See SABBATH.

ANTI-TALMUDISTS. This word is applied to those of the Jews who reject and oppose the Talmud. This class is not confined to the small sect of the Caraites, but has for some years been a growing, and has at length become a very numerous party. From the dispersion to the latter end of the last century, Rabbinism prevailed almost universally among the Jews. The Talmud was reckoned of equal authority with the Old Testament Scriptures,—nay, by many it was valued more highly; and this opinion is maintained by the Rabbinical Jews with as much tenacity as it was held by the Scribes and Pharisees in the days of our Lord. Early initiated in their traditional lore, they despise modern literature, and consider it a sin to learn any modern language. Their childhood is wholly occupied in acquiring a knowledge of Hebrew, and in learning to read and translate the Five Books of Moses. The boy then proceeds, if the state of his finances permits, to the study of the Talmud; and it is expected that at the age of thirteen he will be able to expound a difficult passage publicly in the synagogue. Learning, indeed, according to the Rabbinical axiom, is “equal to the fulfilment of all the other commandments.” It was due, however, to the writings of Mendelsohn, that the absurd tenets of Rabbinism have been gradually declining, both on the Continent and in Britain. Rabbinism is now a tottering fabric, and a licentious freedom of thought has been introduced among the Jews, which, if measures be not speedily and actively taken for their instruction in Christianity, may lead to the prevalence of a widespread infidelity. It is to Mendelsohn this change is chiefly due. He has infused into the minds of his countrymen a spirit of reckless speculation, which refuses to yield implicit submission to the Sacred Oracles, once the glory and the guide of their fathers. Rationalism has taken the place of Judaism. Thus have the writings of this reformer of Judaism led the way to a neglect, and in many instances to an entire disuse, of the mass of absurd and inconsistent traditions forming the Talmud. He gave a bright example of a Jew becoming learned in the languages, and literature, and philosophy, of the Gentiles. This, of itself, gave rise to an important change,—a revolution. It was contrary to the whole spirit of Rabbinism for a Jew to study a profane language, or to read Epicurean books, as Gentile works were termed. From the days of Mendelsohn this prejudice has been dispelled; the whole field of modern literature has been opened up to the Jews, and, trampling under foot the Rabbinic exclusiveness, parents now educate their children in the language and literature of the country in which they reside. The accomplishment of this one object was of no small importance. The access to the Jewish mind is thus rendered easier, and, by the study of other writings than the Talmud, their minds are expanded and disencumbered from a host of prejudices, which for a long time shut them out from almost the possibility of becoming acquainted with Christianity. In so far as the Rabbinic power has been broken, the Jews are more easily accessible to the light of Christian truth; but it is a lamentable fact, that in an immense number of instances they have cast off the fetters of Rabbinism only to throw themselves without reserve into the ranks of infidelity. That this has been the actual effect of the Anti-Talmudic principles inculcated by Mendelsohn, is abundantly evident from the following remarks made by Dr Jost, in his ‘History of the Jews’ :—“Although no system has been formed, we think that we have perceived amongst thinking Jews a general adoption of the following principles :—All agree that the Jews are no longer a chosen people, in the hitherto received sense, and look upon expressions of this nature, in the liturgy, only as an old form. They, however, assert, that the Holy Scriptures are the only source of a true religion, capable of standing the test of reason. They remain strangers to the doctrines of Christianity, and no one believes that a confession of the Christian faith, free from hypocrisy, is possible, unless in those who have been convinced by education and custom. This pure religion consists in the conviction, that a supernatural revelation had been made to the forefathers of Israel, to Moses and the prophets,—consequently, in the belief that there is one God. For the instruction of man God has made known, through human instrumentality, that he is the moral Governor of the world, and that his eyes are upon men, valuing and retributing according to their moral worth. This presupposes the immortality of the soul. The moral code of Scripture is looked upon as the only true one, in so far as it agrees with principles generally to be acknowledged. It therefore requires not only a moral life, but one based upon religious principle, and not on worldly philosophy. Every thing that appears to militate against this is rejected, and every passage of Scripture that appears hostile, is explained from the circumstances of the times; as, for instance, the evil deeds of the patriarchs: and the same expedient was also applied to the miracles, which some explained away altogether,—others endeavoured to explain on natural principles; but this system never became general. As to the ceremonial laws, no clear opinion has been expressed, but every one agreed with Meudelsohn, that they were only the shell that enveloped the kernel. In the course of sifting the huge mass of Rabbinic additions, a distinction was soon made between essential and non-essential. As the Divine origin of the Mosaic legislation could not be denied without the absolute overthrow of Judaism, all unauthorised additions were rejected; and a conviction was formed, that the majority of the laws still in force were not applied in the sense of the legislator, as they belonged to the Holy Land, and in other lands could not be exactly observed; that in strange countries many duties of another kind, as military service, and such like, must arise; and that, until the unknown period of the restoration of the Israelite monarchy by the expected Messiah, such laws only were to be observed as were necessary for preserving the essence of religion, or were useful for forming the congregations into a pious ecclesiastical community, without interfering with the existing relations of life, and intellectual improvement. In this way the religion remained orthodox, though not in the sense of the Rabbies."

This statement of the religious opinions prevailing among the modern Jews on the continent of Europe, affords a strange idea of the existing state of Judaism. It has lost many of its characteristic peculiarities, and mixed itself up with a species of Rationalism; and the same spirit has developed itself to a great extent among the Jews of Britain. A large and influential body have declared themselves openly Anti-Talmudists; and though they have abated little, if any thing, of their deadly hostility to the Christian faith, they have, by their renunciation of the Talmud, rendered it a much easier task to argue with them upon the principles and true scriptural foundation of Christianity. One grand obstacle in the way of their conversion is thereby removed; and though it has undoubtedly led to little or no real improvement in their views, we trust that, by the Divine blessing, the time is not far distant when all the children of Abraham, whether belonging to the Rabbinical or the reformed party, will be led to recognise Jesus of Nazareth as the true Messiah, and to look upon Him whom their fathers pierced, and to mourn.

ANTITHETIC-PARALLEL, an important rule of Biblical interpretation. See POETRY OF THE HEBREWS.

ANTI-TRINITARIANS, all who deny the doctrine of the Trinity, and who call themselves Unitarians, as admitting of only one person in the Deity. These may be conveniently considered under four classes (which see):—1. Sabellians, who maintain the Father, Son, and Spirit, to be one in person as well as in essence. 2. Arians, who believe the person of Jesus to be in a sense Divine, but not of the same essence with the Almighty Father. 3. Socinians, who consider our Lord to be only man; but still, considering the high honours to which he is advanced, as entitled to a degree of Divine worship. And, 4. Humanitarians, who contend that the Lord Jesus is a man only, "like ourselves, fallible and peccable," and entitled to no higher honour than that of a good man, a moral philosopher, and a prophet. Such were the sentiments of Dr Priestley, and such are those of most Anti-Trinitarians of the present day.

ANTITYPE, that which answers to a type or figure. A type is a model, mould, or pattern; that which is formed according to it is an antitype. See TYPE.

The word antitype occurs twice in the New Testament, viz., in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 24), and in the First Epistle of Peter (iii. 21), where its genuine import has been much controverted, but, in our view, unnecessarily. The former says, that "Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures" or antitypes "of the true—now to appear in the presence of God." Now, a type signifies the pattern by which another thing is made; and as Moses was obliged to make the tabernacle, and all things in it, according to the pattern shown him in the mount, the tabernacle so formed was the antitype of what was shown to Moses; any thing, therefore, formed according to a model or pattern, is an antitype.

ANTI-UNIVERSALISTS. See UNIVERSALISTS.

ANTONIA, one of the towers or fortresses of Jerusalem, called by Herod after Mark Antony. It stood on a steep rock adjoining the north-west corner of the temple, whose two outer courts it overlooked, and with which there was a ready communication, by means of secret passages, that the soldiers might easily find their way into the temple, in case of any tumult or insurrection arising. The Romans generally kept a garrison in this tower; and from thence it was that the tribune ran with his soldiers to rescue Paul out of the hands of the Jews, who had seized him in the temple, and designed to have murdered him. Acts xxi. 31, 32. It was taken by Titus, at the memorable siege of Jerusalem, who thus became master of the temple and the city.

ANXIETY, intense solicitude, the extreme of care. (See CARE.) Solicitude and anxiety, as habits of the mind in relation to worldly things, and especially to providential events yet future, are irreconcilable with the faith of a Christian, which requires him to cast all his burdens on the Lord. The charge of our Saviour (Matt. vi. 25–34), literally rendered, is, "Be not anxious about your life, indulge no anxiety respecting the morrow; for sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

APAMEA,—1. A city of Syria, on the Orontes, built, as is believed, by Seleucus I., king of Syria; or by his son, Antiochus Soter, in honour of Queen Apamea, wife of Seleucus, and mother of Antiochus. It was probably the same with Shepham, a city of Syria. Numb. xxxiv. 10, 11. 2. A city of Phrygia, on the river Marsyas; near which, as some have been of opinion, Noah's ark rested; whence the city took the surname of (Kibotos) Ark. On a medal, struck in honour of Adrian, is the figure of a man, representing the river Marsyas, with this inscription—A medal of the Apameans;—the Ark and the river Marsyas. That this was one of the commemorative notices of the ark and of the deluge there is little doubt; but only in the sense, that traditional shrines, or memorials of the ark, were here very ancient; and that, journeying direct from Shinar, Babylon, or adjacent places, here one of the arks, commemorative of the original ark, rested and settled. That is, here the Arkite worship was commenced, before it spread over the neighbouring country. In reference to the medal we may add, that Strabo affirms the ancient name of Apamea to have been Kibotos; by which name the ark (probably of Noah) was understood. Kibotos is, apparently, not a Greek term; it might be the name of the temple in which commemoration was made of the ark, and of the preservation of man by it. There are several medals of Apamea extant, on which are represented the ark, with a man in it, receiving the dove, which is flying to him; and part of their inscription is the word NOR, in ancient Greek characters. As they are from different dies, yet all referring to Apamea, it seems that their authors had a knowledge of the tradition of commemoration respecting the ark, preserved in this city. (See ARK.) Many more such commemorations of an event so greatly affecting mankind, were no doubt maintained for many ages, though we are now under great difficulties in tracing them. In fact, many cities boasted of these memorials, and referred to them as proofs of their antiquity. See ARARAT.

APE (cephus.) 1 Kings x. 22; 2 Chron. ix. 21. This animal seems to be the same with the ceph of the Ethiopians, of which Pliny speaks (lib. viii., cap. 19.) "At the games given by Pompey the Great," says he, "were shown cephs, brought from Ethiopia, which had their fore feet like a human hand, their hind legs and feet also resembled those of a man." The Scripture says, that the fleet of Solomon brought apes, or rather monkeys, &c., from Ophir. The learned are not agreed respecting the situation of that country; but Major Wilford says, that the ancient name of the river Landi Sindh, in India, was Cophes. May it not have been so called from the cephim inhabiting its banks?

The ancient Egyptians are said to have worshipped apes; it is certain that they are still adored in many places in India. Maffeus describes a magnificent temple dedicated to the ape, with a portico for receiving the victims sacrificed, supported by seven hundred columns.

"With glittering gold and sparkling gems they shine,
But apes and monkeys are the gods within."

APELLES, mentioned by Paul (Rom. xvi. 10), who calls him "approved in Christ." The Greeks believe that Apelles was one of the seventy-two disciples, and bishop of Heraclea.

APELLITES, a sect of heretics in the second century, who affirmed that Christ received a body from the four elements, which at his death he rendered back to the world, and so ascended into heaven without a body.

APHARSACHITES, a people sent by the kings of Assyria to inhabit the country of Samaria, in the room of those Israelites who had been removed beyond the Euphrates. They greatly opposed the rebuilding of Jerusalem. Ezra iv. 9, v. 6.

APHEK, the name of several cities mentioned in Scripture,—1. A city in the tribe of Judah, where the Philistines encamped when the ark was brought from Shiloh. 1 Sam. iv. 2. A city in the valley of Jezreel, where the Philistines encamped on the eve of the battle of Gilboa. 3. A city in the tribe of Asher, near Sidon, in which the Canaanites were permitted to remain. 4. The chief city of Benhadad, king of Syria, situated between Heliopolis and Biblos, where the Syrians were defeated, and where twenty-seven thousand of them were killed by the falling of the walls. 1 Kings xx. 26, 30.

APHERA, a town belonging to the tribe of Benjamin.

APHES-DAMMIM, or EPHES-DAMMIM, a place belonging to the tribe of Judah, where the Philistines encamped when Goliath insulted the host of Israel. 1 Sam. xvii. 1.

APHTHARTODOCITES, a small sect in the sixth century, who held (as their name implies) that the body of Jesus Christ was incorruptible, and not subject to death. They were a branch of the Eutychians.

APIS, a symbolical deity, worshipped by the Egyptians. It was an ox, having certain exterior marks; in which animal the soul of the great Osiris was supposed to subsist. The ox was probably made the symbol of Osiris, because he presided over agriculture. To this there seems to be an allusion in Psal. cvi. 20: "They changed their glory (the invisible Jehovah) into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass."

APOCALYPSE, a word denoting revelation or unveiling, but generally applied to the vision which John saw in the isle of Patmos, during his banishment for the sake of Christ. For two centuries, not the slightest doubt was entertained of the authenticity of this book; but in the third century some doubts arose. The testimonies, however, in favour of the book being a genuine production, are too numerous and powerful to admit of being questioned. Accordingly, Mr Lowman remarks that "hardly any one book has received more early, more authentic, and more satisfactory attestations." Some German commentators have suspected the Revelation to be spurious; but our own Sir Isaac Newton long ago observed, that there is no other book of the New Testament so strongly attested, or commented upon so early, as the Apocalypse. Various opinions have been entertained in reference to the time when this book was written, some asserting that it was composed in the reign of the Emperor Claudius; and others that it was written in the reign of Nero, before the destruction of Jerusalem. The most probable opinion is, that the vision was seen in Patmos, towards the end of Domitian's reign, but not committed to writing until the apostle had been released from banishment and returned to Ephesus. Neander seems to incline to the opinion that not John the apostle, but a presbyter of Ephesus bearing the same name, was the writer of the Apocalypse. This opinion seems to be utterly without foundation.

"The occasion of writing the Apocalypse," says Hartwell Horne, "is sufficiently evident from the book itself. John, being in exile in the island of Patmos, is favoured with the appearance of the Lord Jesus Christ to him, and is repeatedly commanded to commit to writing the visions which he beheld. The scope or design of this book is twofold; first, generally to make known to the apostle 'the things which are' (i. 19), that is, the then present state of the Christian churches in Asia; and, secondly, to reveal to him 'the things which shall be hereafter,' or the constitution and fates of the Christian church, from its beginning to its consummation in glory."

No book has given rise to more numerous commentaries than the Apocalypse. The extreme difficulty of the book, from its thoroughly prophetic character, and the obscure figurative language in which its prophecies are couched, have rendered its exposition a trying task. Commentaries on the book have been produced by men of great eminence; for example, Mede, Sir Isaac Newton, Bishops Newton and Hurd, Lowman, Faber, Dr Hales, and others. But the ablest, the most erudite, and, on the whole, the most satisfactory exposition which has appeared in our day, is Elliott's "Horæ Apocalypticæ." But were we asked to select the clearest, the simplest, the most elegant unfolding of the apocalyptic vision, we would unhesitatingly point to "The Seventh Vial," and accordingly we present our readers with a valuable digest of the Revelation from that very able work.

"The Apocalypse is, in brief," says the author of 'The Seventh Vial,' "a history of the Church, written in grand symbolical characters, extending from the year when John saw it, which we take to have been A.D. 96, till the second and glorious return of Christ to judgment. On the little stage of Patmos, a rehearsal of Providence, so to speak, took place. It opens with a representation of the exaltation of Christ, and his installation on the right hand of God. This is the grand subject of the vision of the fourth and fifth chapters.

"Having exhibited in symbol Christ's installation on the right hand of God, and his investiture with his high office, the Apocalypse next presents in figure the various acts of his administration. It is here necessary to call to mind the grand end contemplated in the whole of that administration, namely, the universal establishment of his kingdom, the Church, in the unity, purity, and splendour of the millennium, in order to see how each successive act paved the way for the full attainment, in due time, of that glorious object. First of all, the ground had to be cleared. When Christ ascended and sat down at the right hand of God, the ground where he had purposed to plant his Church was occupied by the old pagan empire of Rome. A most degrading polytheism, deeply founded in the fashions and lusts of men, attired in the garb of a most fascinating poetry, enjoying the venerable prestige of a high antiquity, sanctioned by the laws, and protected and upheld by the military power, of the State, was so interwoven with the fabric of the empire, that it had become necessary, in order to eradicate this idolatrous system, and strip it of its props and defences, that the framework of the empire with which it was incorporated should be shaken and rent. This was accomplished in the opening of the seals. Each seal (see chap. vi.) ushered in a new dispensation to the Roman empire; and by these successive acts of judgment,—by the passage across its stage of the red horse, and the black horse, and the pale horse,—symbolizing respectively war, scarcity, and death, with its four terrible agencies, the sword, famine, pestilence, and the beasts of the earth,—that powerful State was so exhausted and broken, that at last, in the opening of the sixth seal, that great revolution was accomplished in which the powers of the pagan firmament were shaken, and Christianity, in the person of Constantine, was elevated to the throne of the empire.

"There is here a stop in the Apocalyptic history. The progression of the symbolical drama now passing before John is arrested. With a professedly Christian emperor on the throne, and with all the helps and facilities naturally springing therefrom for the diffusion of Christianity, we expect to be instantly told of its universal reign. With the winds of persecution and political contention all hushed, with serene skies over the Church, and nothing to impede the labours of the spiritual husbandman, we expect to see him scattering the seed far and wide, and, with zeal worthy of his cause, adding field to field, till at last he had included the whole earth within the vineyard of his Lord. Alas! our anticipations are sadly disappointed. A ranker idolatry springs up than that which had been wellnigh extirpated. A murkier night settles down on the world than any that had ever heretofore darkened its firmament. Fiercer persecutors are seen moving on the scene than any that had defended the cause of Paganism with fire and knife. We are now but a little way off from the commencement of that noted period,—obscurely hinted to Daniel, plainly announced to John,—the twelve hundred and sixty prophetic days or years, for which preparations of a very unusual kind, but requisite, doubtless, are made. This period was to form the gloomiest, without exception, in the annals of the world,—the period of Satan's highest success, and of the Church's deepest depression; and lest she should become during it utterly extinct, her members, never so few as then, were all specially scaled. Thus secured by a Divine precaution against perishing, whether by craft or by violence, they enter the cloud. The long night passes on, darkening as it advances; but the sealed company are not visible: they disappear from the Apocalyptic stage, just as they then disappeared from the observation of the world. That they might escape the dungeons and the fires of their persecutors, they fled away, to hide in the hoary caves of earth, or to inhabit the untrodden regions of the wilderness, or to dwell beneath the shadow of the Alps, or to enjoy fellowship with God, unsuspected and unknown, in the deep seclusion and gloom of some convent. But at last the clouds break away, and the sealed company, having trod the valley of the shadow of death unhurt, one and all of them come forth, the hundred forty and four thousand sealed ones, in white raiment, and carrying palms, not to hunger and to thirst, as aforetime, when the bread and water of life were scantily supplied, nor to be scorched by the hot sun of persecution, but to be fed by the Lamb, and to be led to fountains of living waters, and to have all tears wiped away from their eyes; denoting the happy and prosperous state of the Church which shall succeed the twelve hundred and sixty years, and the exemption she shall then enjoy from all the perils, enemies, and sufferings that have hitherto attended her path. This is the vision of the seventh chapter. The vision affords us a glimpse of the Church, protected against no ordinary danger by the seal of the angel, just before she entered on the fated twelve hundred and sixty days; and another glimpse of her as she appeared after she had come through the 'great tribulation' of those days; but it leaves the events of that disastrous period—the fury with which Antichrist had warred against her, and the noble constancy with which she had withstood the assault—untold, because these were to form the subject of future Apocalyptic narration.

"After this vision the symbolic scene again progresses. The eighth chapter takes up the history exactly at the point where the sixth had dropped it. The seventh and last seal is opened, and the seven trumpets begin to be sounded. The first four trumpets include those irruptions of the barbarous nations of the north by which the Western Roman empire was completely destroyed, and the let or hindrance to the appearance of the Man of Sin, of which the Apostle Paul had spoken, taken out of the way, and the stage left empty for the rise of Antichrist. Rome had ceased to be pagan, and had become Christian; but its Christianity was not worth much; and its imperial government still subsisting, it formed an obstacle to the rise of the Papacy; for how could the Pope become lord of the world, while Cæsar continued to be so? It behoved this empire, therefore, though professedly Christian, to give place, that the predestined enemy of Christ might appear. Accordingly each trumpet announced the descent of a new calamity upon the unhappy empire. First, a tempest of hail and fire, mingled with blood, swept across it,—the symbol of savage war waged by barbarous arms. The hordes of the North had long been collecting on the frontier of the empire; but at last, on the death of Theodosius, A.D. 395, the 'dark cloud,' says Gibbon, 'which was collected along the coast of the Baltic, burst in thunder upon the banks of the Upper Danube.' This trumpet came to an end at the death of Alaric, in A.D. 410. When the second angel sounded, 'a great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea,'—the symbol of the Vandals under the terrible Genseric,—'a name which,' remarks Gibbon, 'in the destruction of the Roman empire, has deserved an equal rank with the names of Alaric and Attila.' He began, A.D. 429, to desolate Africa; and having burned many of its towns, and subjugated its provinces, he collected to his standard a multitude of Moors and Africans. This host he embarked, and precipitated like a burning mountain upon Italy, ravaging its sea-coast, pillaging Rome, and carrying away the wealth of its citizens in his ships. On the sounding of the third trumpet, a star shot down from the firmament, burning as a lamp, and falling upon the rivers and fountains, turned them into wormwood. In this star we behold the scourge of God, Attila, the king of the Huns, who, returning from his Eastern wars in A.D. 450, crossed the Rhine as high as Basle, and descending its course, made the entire valley through which it rolls a scene of slaughter, burning its towns and massacring the inhabitants. Turning then to the south, he inflicted similar calamities on the towns of Mantua, Milan, Venice, and other cities of Lombardy, many of which he converted into heaps of stones and ashes. But at the sounding of the fourth trumpet, the empire which these successive and terrible shocks had brought to the verge of ruin, was utterly dissolved. Its dissolution, under this trumpet, is symbolically exhibited, after the manner of Scripture when the fall of empires is the theme, by the darkening of the sun and stars,—imagery highly appropriate, and imparting a gloomy grandeur to the subject. The mandate of Odoacer, chief of the Heruli, in 476, abolished the title and office of Emperor of the West. The anarchy of the barbarians was succeeded by the short reign of Theodoric the Ostrogoth; after which the Senate, and, in short, the entire framework of the Roman Government, were removed; and that proud city, which for so many ages had held the rank of mistress of the world, was reduced to the miserable condition of a tributary Dukedom. Thus the stage on which Antichrist was to appear was now cleared. The colossal empire which had occupied it so long had been shivered, and its very fragments swept away. There was now no throne at Rome, and the 'let' no longer existed to the appearance of the Man of Sin. John, however, defers entering on the history of the Papacy. He withdraws our attention to the Eastern world, and exhibits, under the fifth and sixth trumpets, the infliction of the woes by which the Eastern empire was destroyed.

"Leaving, then, the Western world, which Providence, by a series of tremendous dispensations, had made empty and void, in order that a more terrible enemy than he who had just been struck down might be suffered to lift up himself, to be destroyed in his turn, the scene changes to the East. Immediately the scenery becomes Eastern. So long as the West was the stage of the Apocalyptic drama, the scenery was of an occidental character,—storms of hail, and burning mountains. But now the symbols become oriental. The fifth angel sounds. The bottomless pit is opened; and forthwith there issues from it a smoke so dense, that, as it rolls its murky folds onward, it darkens the air, and inflicts blight upon the earth,—the symbol of that system of imposture which, arising in Arabia, overspread so large a portion of the world. In the Bible, error is darkness, truth is light. Along with the smoke there came locusts from the pit, which, for the space of five months, tormented men with their stings,—the Saracens, by whose arms the religion of Mahommed was propagated, and the Saracenic dominion, extended from the banks of the Indus to the base of the Pyrenees. Their career of conquest lasted five symbolical months,—an hundred and fifty years.

"The scene of the sixth trumpet, or second woe trumpet, is the banks of the Euphrates. On its sounding, the four angels which were bound in that river were loosed. The term for which they had been prepared was an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year. Their numbers were almost incredible—two hundred thousand thousand. Their equipments and appearance were of a truly martial order. 'I saw the horses in the vision, and them that sat on them, having breastplates of fire, and of jacinth, and brimstone; and the heads of the horses were as the heads of lions, and out of their mouths issued fire, and smoke, and brimstone. Their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt.' Their commission was to slay the third part of men. Of the correctness of the interpretation which applies this symbol to the Turks, it is scarce possible to entertain a doubt. Did our time allow, we could show that the event fulfilled the prediction in all its particulars. At the time referred to in the prophecy, this people, who had come originally from Scythia, were divided into four clans or sultanies, all of whom were located in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates. They were at length let loose, to desolate Asia with their arms, and that part of it particularly which was the seat of the Eastern empire. Their troops consisted mainly of cavalry, and their mode of warfare was new, artillery being now for the first time employed; both of which particulars are not obscurely hinted at in the prophecy. They continued a conquering power for three hundred and ninety-one years, which, putting a day for a year, gives the predicted term of 'an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year.' Their peculiar vocation or mission was, 'to slay the third part of men.' It was against the corrupt and idolatrous Christians of the Eastern empire that the Turks were sent; and they were charged to inflict a fuller measure of vengeance than their predecessors the Saracens had done. The latter were sent to inflict chastisement, if so be those on whom it fell would repent; but not repenting, the Turks were commissioned to destroy them. To the one it was commanded that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree; and accordingly the conquests of the Saracens were comparatively bloodless. The fields were as green, the palm trees as flourishing, behind their army, as in advance of it. But the longer the judgments of God are continued, if they prove ineffectual, they grow the more severe. Accordingly, the commission given to the Euphratean horsemen was, to slay those whom the locusts had power only to sting; and the work assigned them they executed. During their career of conquest, they committed an incredible number of slaughters, and inflicted hitherto unheard-of miseries. All the provinces of the Eastern empire they subjugated and occupied—Egypt, Greece, Palestine, Syria, Asia Minor. At last they crossed the Hellespont, drew their armies around Constantinople, besieged and took it; and thus the empire of the Cæsars came to an utter end.

“The progress of the grand symbolic drama is arrested, till, in a subsidiary vision, John has a history given him of the rise, the character, and the reign of Antichrist, and the sufferings endured by the Church during the period of his domination. The lesser is marked off from the greater vision by its symbols, which are of a completely different sort,—by its subject, which is not the administrative acts of Christ, but the crimes and successes of his enemy,—and by its retrogression in point of time. The great Apocalyptic vision had advanced to the end of the fifteenth century, when, at the sounding of the sixth trumpet, the Greek empire was destroyed; but the vision now exhibited to John recedes to the middle of the sixth century, at which time the Roman empire of the West had been overthrown by the judgment of the fourth trumpet. The events which occurred in the West during this interval,—that is, from the middle of the sixth to the beginning of the sixteenth century,—form the subject of this vision. The fourth trumpet had taken out of the way the ‘let’ which for so long a time had prevented the rise of ‘THE MAN OF SIN.’ The obstruction being removed, he arose. He was really risen, at the middle of the sixth century; but many centuries were required for the full development of his character, and the consolidation of his empire. Accordingly, he did not reach the zenith of his power till about the time that the sixth trumpet had consummated the ruin of the Eastern empire. This was the last enemy who was to arise to oppose the erection of Christ’s kingdom, and whom Christ, in the exercise of his great power, was to destroy, as he had done others. Accordingly, on the passing away of the second woe, the seventh trumpet is sounded, and seven angels, having the seven last plagues, appear upon the scene. Vial after vial is poured out upon the Papacy, and each successive shock helps onward the consummation of its awful doom. The seventh and last is poured out; and every part of the Papal universe is smitten. Its air is convulsed by terrific tempests; its earth is shaken by awful earthquakes; its cities are overthrown; its mountains are removed; its islands are submerged; and ‘a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done,’ announces the complete accomplishment of the grand object of Christ’s administration, in the dissolution of this system. The utter and irretrievable ruin of mystic Babylon is brought vividly before us, by the symbol of the company who stand afar off weeping and wailing, ‘And saying, Alas! alas! that great city, that was clothed in fine linen, and purple, and scarlet, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls! For in one hour so great riches is come to nought. And every shipmaster, and all the company in ships, and sailors, and as many as trade by sea, stood afar off; and cried, when they saw the smoke of her burning, saying, What city is like unto this great city! And they cast dust on their heads, and cried, weeping and wailing, saying, Alas! alas! that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea, by reason of her costliness! for in one hour is she made desolate.’ The immediate erection of Christ’s kingdom is no less vividly presented to us by the symbol of that other company, who hail with shouts of joy and praise the near advent of some long-expected and thrice-blessed event: ‘And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia! for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honour to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready.’”

An attempt to explain these prophecies does not fall within the design of this work; and, therefore, those who are disposed to study this sublime and mysterious book are referred to the writings of the authors already referred to, but more especially to Dr Keith’s “Signs of the Times,” Elliot’s “Horæ Apocalypticæ,” and “The Seventh Vial,” which all agree in their general principles concerning the interpretation of this book, although they differ in some particular points; and it is not to be expected that there should be a perfect coincidence of opinion in the explanation of those predictions which relate to still future times; for, as Sir Isaac Newton observes, “God gave these, and the prophecies of the Old Testament, not to gratify men’s curiosity, by enabling them to foreknow things, but that after they were fulfilled they might be interpreted by the event, and His own prescience, not that of the interpreters, be then manifested thereby to the world.” “To explain this book perfectly,” says Bishop Newton, “is not the work of one man, or of one age; but probably it never will be clearly understood, till it is all fulfilled.” It is graciously designed, that the gradual accomplishment of these predictions should afford, in every succeeding period of time, additional testimony to the Divine origin of our holy religion. The scope or design of the book is twofold,—first, To describe the things which are; and, secondly, The things which shall be. The former constitutes the subject of the first three chapters, and the latter is the subject of the whole of the remaining part of the book. Considerable division of opinion exists among writers, as to the structure and machinery, as well as the design and object of the prophetic part of the Apocalypse. A very general opinion is, that it is a prophecy of the chief events which shall happen to the Christian Church till the end of the world. Wetstein maintains, that it contains a description of the destruction of Jerusalem, of the Jewish war, and of the civil wars of the Romans. The fathers generally entertained the opinion, that it contains predictions of the persecutions of the Christians under the heathen emperors of Rome, and of the happy days of the Church under the Christian emperors, from Constantine downwards. The Protestant writers explain the greater part of the Apocalypse as referring to the Papal Antichrist; and the Roman Catholic writers allege that the prophecy refers throughout to the schism and heresies, as they term them, of the Reformation. Mr Faber supposes that much of the imagery of the Revelation is taken from the ancient mysteries, and Eichhorn has represented it as a drama. In this latter opinion Mr Irving coincides. “I say not,” to quote his words, “that it is a drama, but that it resembles those ancient dramas in which high poetry, Divine morality, and mystical theology, were wont to be set forth in concert."

The views of Eichhorn, Hug, and other German writers, are at utter variance, not only with those of the distinguished writers mentioned above, but with all internal evidence and probability. All the prophecies relative to the great apostasy in the Church itself,—the rise of Antichrist, and his reign of twelve hundred and sixty years, during which the true Church is driven for refuge into the wilderness,—the overthrow of Babylon being immediately followed by the millennium, and the millennium by the final judgment, and the final judgment by the new heavens and earth, and the state of retribution, which endure for ever,—afford a series of proofs fatal to the German hypothesis of interpretation.

APOCARITES, a small sect in the third century, sprung from the Manicheans, who held that the soul of man was of the essence of God.

APOCRYPHA, books excluded from the sacred canon, not being acknowledged to be divine. They were principally the productions of Alexandrian Jews, and generally, in point of time, hold a middle place between the completion of the Old Testament and the commencement of the New. Not one of these books is extant in Hebrew, the original language of the Old Testament. Jerome, in the fourth century, gives the list of Hebrew inspired books precisely as we have it. Not one Apocryphal writer, in direct terms, claims to be inspired. Their works were never received by the Jews as part of the Old Testament. They are never quoted by our Lord or his apostles. The early fathers do not quote them as being on a level with canonical Scripture. The same authority was never ascribed to them as to the Old and New Testament, until the last Council of Trent, at its fourth session, presumed to place them all (except the Prayer of Manassah, and the third and fourth books of Esdras) in the same rank with the inspired writings of Moses and the prophets. From that period they have usurped the name of Inspired Scriptures, and have been intermingled with the canonical books in the Bibles of Roman Catholics. The apocryphal books are not only replete with absurdities, superstitions, and falsehoods, but also with false doctrines directly opposed to the doctrine of the Holy Scriptures,—such as those of purgatory, and prayers for the dead. The vital doctrine of justification by faith in the Lord Jesus is explicitly denied; and in so many words the Apocrypha teaches, that "Whoso honoureth his father maketh an atonement for his sins." This decided opposition of the apocryphal writings to the main doctrines of the Word of God, affords of itself a valid reason for their rejection from the canon.

The apocryphal writings, of which we have hitherto spoken, have been attached to the Old Testament. None have ever been admitted by the Churches into the canon of the New Testament. Several apocryphal writings were published under the name of Jesus Christ and his apostles, which are mentioned by the writers of the first four centuries; most of which have perished, though some are still extant. Few or none of them were composed before the second century; and several of them were forged so late as the third century. Histories, too, were written of the life of Christ; but all of these were rejected as spurious by the first Christians. "Besides our Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles," says Dr Paley, "no Christian history, claiming to be written by an apostle, or apostolical man, is quoted within three hundred years after the birth of Christ, by any writer now extant or known; or if quoted, is quoted with marks of censure and rejection."

"After the four gospels," says Dr Welsh, "had been written by the Evangelists, and had been generally received as of divine authority in the Christian church, heretics and others, who departed from the true faith, had recourse to the expedient of forging gospels, epistles, &c., under the name of some of the apostles, or that of our Lord himself, to which they might refer in support of their tenets. These works were frequently formed out of the genuine gospels, with such additions and omissions as the purposes of the writers required. There were not wanting members of the true church who followed the same practice, with the mistaken idea that the piety of the faithful might thus be promoted, or that an answer might be afforded to some of the objections of Jews and Heathens. In the second century, Irenæus tells us that the Gnostics had an innumerable multitude of spurious and apocryphal books; and in the following age they were greatly increased. The greater part of these writings perished in the course of ages.

"Of such of them as remained, a collection was published by Fabricius, about the beginning of last century, in his Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti. A full account of them is given, with translations, in Jones' well-known work on the Canon. Several of them were republished in London some years ago, in a work entitled, 'The Apocryphal New Testament.'

"That these works are not to be received as genuine, may be proved by their vast inferiority to the canonical gospels, and still more decidedly by the fact, that they were not recognised by the fathers. In 'The Gospel of our Saviour's Infancy,' there are some passages which are referred to by Eusebius, Athanasius, and Chrysostom, as containing some trifling particulars of true history connected with the life of Christ, but it is not ranked by them among the inspired writings. It is worthy of remark, that it was from this production, and from 'The Gospel of the Birth of Mary,' and the 'Protevangelion of St James,' that Mahommed derived all his knowledge of our Saviour's life. Indeed, he does not seem to have been at all acquainted with the canonical gospels; and the legends of the East in general, concerning our Lord, are all from apocryphal sources." The apocryphal books are the following: two books of Esdras, Tobit, Judith, Esther, the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, the Song of the Three Children, the History of Susannah, Bel and the Dragon, the Prayer of Manasses, and four books of the Maccabees. Of these, the Church of Rome acknowledges as canonical only Tobit, Judith, the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, the first and second book of the Maccabees, Baruch, with the additions to Esther and Daniel. "It is a proof," says Dr Dick, "of the stupidity as well as the impiety of the Church of Rome, that she has presumed to elevate them to equal honour with the writings of Moses and the prophets, in defiance of the judgment of the Jewish, and I may add, of the ancient Christian Church. They were not admitted into the catalogues drawn up by individuals, or by councils, for several centuries; and were regarded as inferior to the writings which are accounted inspired, till the meeting of the Council of Trent, which established error, idolatry, and superstition, by law." It is a singular and most remarkable fact, worthy of notice, that the Church of Rome finds her strongest sanction for some of her peculiar and favourite errors in this very Apocrypha, so universally rejected.

APOLLONIA, a city situated in Macedonia, now known by the name of Erisso and Polina. It received its name from the heathen deity Apollo, to whom a splendid temple was erected. It is mentioned, in Acts xvii. 1, as a place through which Paul passed on his way to Thessalonica. Classical geographers enumerate seventeen towns bearing the name of Apollonia.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA, a remarkable personage who attracted much notice in the first century of the Christian era. He was a Pythagorean philosopher, who pretended to work miracles, and succeeded to such an extent in imposing upon the credulity of the ignorant, that he was held in the highest veneration, not only by the people, but by the rulers of the land. The Emperor Aurelian professed to admire his character. Adrian was at much pains in collecting his writings. From Caracalla and Alexander Severus he received divine honours. The heathens blasphemously attempted to compare this lying impostor with Jesus Christ; and Philostratus, who has written his life, represents him as more than a man; so that Eunapius, a philosopher of the fifth century, declares that Philostratus might have entitled his history, "The Descent of a God upon the Earth." But the narrative of Philostratus, written a hundred years after the death of Apollonius, is evidently fabulous, and borrowed, in many instances, from the life of the Redeemer in the Sacred Writings. The miracles are, in several cases, identical in all respects with those attributed to Jesus Christ; and hence infidel writers have been accustomed frequently to try to throw discredit upon the miracles of the New Testament, by putting them on a level with the miracles of Apollonius, those "lying wonders" which, even in that early period, led the way to still further perversions of the truth.

APOLLOS, a Jew born at Alexandria in Egypt, and described in Acts xviii. 24, "as an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures." Nothing is known concerning his early history, but he appears to have been a disciple of John the Baptist, and baptized by him. Even after he came to a recognition of Jesus as the true Messiah, and had engaged with earnestness and zeal in proclaiming the gospel of Jesus, we are told that "he knew only the baptism of John." Providentially, however, he came to Ephesus, where he met with Aquila and Priscilla, who "taught him the way of God more perfectly." Thus fully instructed in the truth of God, he was eminently successful in diffusing the knowledge of Christ, both among Jews and Gentiles. From Ephesus he proceeded to Corinth, and other places of Achaia, where we are informed "he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was Christ." Acts xviii. 28. Apollos succeeded Paul in the ministry at Corinth, and such was his popularity, that it had almost led to a schism in the Church. Thus the apostle remarks, "Now this I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Paul; and I of Apollos; and I of Cephas; and I of Christ." 1 Cor. i. 12. Yet so little was Paul actuated by jealousy of Apollos, that we find him expressly declaring that "he greatly desired Apollos to return unto them." Afterwards the same apostle recommends him in affectionate terms to Titus (iii. 13). Jerome supposes that Apollos became at length bishop at Corinth, and died there.

APOLLYON. See ABADDON.

APOLOGY, a defence of one who is accused. Apologies seem to have been originally carefully written judicial defences. Of this nature are the Apologies of Socrates, attributed to Plato and Xenophon. The name passed over from Heathen to Christian authors, who gave the title of Apologies to the writings which were designed to defend Christianity against the attacks and accusations of its enemies, particularly the Pagan philosophers, and to justify its professors before the emperors. Of this sort were the Apologies of Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Tertullian, Tatian, and others. After the secure establishment of Christianity, such Apologies in a great measure ceased to appear, till, in later times, several writers have again attacked Christian truth, either directly or by indirect insinuation. In consequence, new Apologies have been written, and Christianity has been vindicated against the attacks of the enemy with the most complete and triumphant success.

APOSTASY, a forsaking or renouncing of our religion, either by an open declaration in words, or a virtual declaration of it by our actions. The primitive Christian Church distinguished several kinds of apostasy; the first, of those who went entirely from Christianity to Judaism; the second, of those who complied so far with the Jews as to communicate with them in many of their unlawful practices, without making a formal profession of their religion; thirdly, of those who mingled Judaism and Christianity together; and, fourthly, of those who voluntarily relapsed into Paganism. Apostasy may be further considered as,—1. Original, in which we have all participated. Rom. iii. 23. 2. National, when a kingdom relinquishes the profession of Christianity. 3. Personal, when an individual backslides from God. Heb. x. 38. 4. Final, when men are given up to judicial hardness of heart, as Judas. The warnings of our Lord against apostasy are frequent, and beyond conception fearful. Matt. x. 28-39. It is hard to tell whether they are most needed in times of sanguinary persecution, or in times of seductive peace. See BACKSLIDING.

APOSTLE, a messenger, one sent. It is equivalent in meaning to the angel of the church in the book of Revelation, and Jesus himself is styled the Messenger of the Covenant. During the second year of his ministry, the followers of Jesus Christ became so numerous that he chose twelve persons to assist him in his work, and to carry forward that work after he had gone to the Father. These he named apostles, an appellation which, as Mosheim informs us, was appropriated at that time among the Jews to certain public officers who were the ministers of the high priests, and who were occasionally despatched on missions of importance to foreign parts. In proceeding to their selection and appointment, Jesus seems to have felt deeply the solemnity of the occasion; for Luke says, that on the day previous "He retired to a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God." The apostles were twelve in number, probably that the Christian Church might correspond to the Jewish, which was composed of twelve tribes; and to this John alludes in his vision of the New Jerusalem, which "had twelve gates, and at the gates twelve angels; and the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb."

hold office in the Church. And accordingly Paul, when, in Eph. iv. 11, he enumerates the various authorized officers in the Church, places apostles in the very foreground: "He gave some apostles," and then, as different from and inferior to these, he mentions "prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers." The office of an apostle was, from its very nature, limited to the first age of the church. The qualifications essential to the office may be thus briefly noted: (1.) They must have seen the Lord. 1 Cor. ix. 1. (2.) They must have been chosen by Christ himself. Gal. i. 1. (3.) It was necessary that they should be infallibly inspired by the Spirit of God. John xvi. 13. (4.) They must have the power of working miracles. 1 Cor. xii. 8-11. (5.) They alone could impart spiritual gifts to others, by the laying on of hands. Acts viii. (6.) Their office was not limited, like an ordinary pastor, to the charge of a single congregation, but to them was entrusted the care of all the churches. 2 Cor. xi. 28. Such qualifications as these, it is plain, could not possibly be handed down to any class of men, as the hereditary successors of the apostles. The great employment to which the apostles, and indeed all ministers of Christ, must direct their special efforts is to the work of preaching. To the faithful and diligent performance of this duty all other duties must yield, for "it hath pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe;" and the express command of Christ is to "preach the gospel to every creature." The personal ministry of Christ and the early labours of the apostles were confined to the Jews. They were not to go as yet into the way of the Gentiles, nor to enter into any city of the Samaritans. The time had not arrived when Jehovah was to say "Behold me, behold me, to a nation that was not called by his name." Accordingly, even after the resurrection of Christ, when the extended commission was given to the apostles, that repentance and remission of sins should be preached among all nations, Jesus added, "beginning at Jerusalem." And the subject of the apostolic preaching was precisely the same with that of John the Baptist and of Christ himself. They were to proclaim the near approach of the kingdom of Christ. That Messiah, when he came, should establish a kingdom, was a favourite idea among the Jews, and they were amply supported in this view by the declarations of the ancient prophets. Every where did they speak of him as a king who was to sit upon the throne of his father, David. But the true nature of this kingdom the Jews failed to comprehend. Even in the very face of the prophetic announcement, that the sceptre was to depart from Judah, and a lawgiver from between his feet, when Shiloh should come, the universal expectation was entertained that whenever the Messiah should appear he would restore the kingdom to Israel. Jesus never for a moment denied his kingly authority. He spake of a kingdom from the very commencement of his public teaching; but the description of the kingdom, we might have thought, would have dispelled the idea of mere temporal sovereignty. He spoke of it as not an earthly but a heavenly kingdom. It was to the kingdom of heaven set up in the earth—a kingdom which was so essentially spiritual, that when he would speak of its true properties, he declares it to be "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." This kingdom the apostles were to declare was at hand. It was in course of being established on the earth. They and all that were to follow them in the high and holy office of ambassadors of Christ, were to be the heralds of its coming glory. For this the people of Christ were continually to pray, "Thy kingdom come." For this the ministers of Christ were incessantly to labour. And towards this all the events of providence were to contribute. Christ is even now reigning as a king; but all things are not yet put under his feet. The kingdom is only at hand. It is in process of being established, and it will only be fully set up when "the will of God is done upon this earth, even as it is done in heaven." Then the glad cry shall be heard, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." The Lord hasten this glorious event in his own time! See APOSTOLICAL SUCCESSION.

APOSTLES' CREED. See CREED.

APOSTOLIC, apostolical, something that relates to the apostles, or descends from them. Thus we say, the apostolic age, apostolic doctrine, apostolic character, constitutions, traditions, &c.

APOSTOLIC CHURCH, in the primitive Church, was an appellation given to all such Churches as were founded by the apostles; and even to the bishops of those Churches, as being the reputed successors of the apostles. These were confined to four, viz., Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. Byzantium, or Constantinople, is added by Cave, as having been founded by the Apostle Andrew. In after-times, the other Churches assumed the same quality, on account, principally, of the conformity of their doctrine with that of the Churches which were apostolical by foundation, and because all bishops held themselves successors of the apostles, or acted in their dioceses with the authority of apostles.

The first time the term apostolical is attributed to bishops, as such, is in a letter of Clovis to the Council of Orleans, held in 511, though that king does not there expressly denominate them apostolical, but highly worthy of the apostolical see. In 581, we find the bishops called apostolical pontiffs.

In progress of time, the bishop of Rome growing in power above the rest, and the three patriarchates, of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, falling into the hands of the Saracens, the title apostolical was restrained to the pope and his Church alone; though some of the popes, and in particular Gregory the Great, not contented to hold the title by this tenure, began at length to insist that it belonged to them by another and peculiar right, as being the successors of Peter. The Council of Rheims, in 1049, declared that the pope was the sole apostolical primate of the universal Church; and hence a great number of apostolicals,—apostolical see, apostolical nuncio, apostolical notary, apostolical brief, apostolical chamber, apostolical vicar, &c. The only really apostolic Church is that (be it found where it may) which accords throughout with the Divine model prescribed in the New Testament.

APOSTOLIC FATHERS, an appellation usually given to the Christian writers of the first century—Barnabas, Hermas, Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp. Of these writers, Cotelerius, and after him Le Clerc, have published a collection, in two volumes, accompanied both with their own annotations, and the remarks of other learned men. See also the genuine epistles of the apostolic fathers, by Archbishop Wake, and in the Apocryphal New Testament.

APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS AND CANONS, a collection of regulations attributed to the apostles, and supposed to have been collected by Clement, whose name they likewise bear. It is the general opinion, however, that they are spurious, and that Clement had no hand in them. They appeared first in the fourth century, but have been much changed and corrupted since. There are so many things in them different from, and even contrary to, the genius and design of the New Testament writers, that no wise man would believe, without the most convincing and irresistible proof, that both could come from the same hand.

APOSTOLICAL SUCCESSION. It has been uniformly recognised as a favourite doctrine in the Romish Church, that Christ committed to his apostles the power of appointing bishops as their successors; that, in virtue of this authority and power, they actually did appoint certain officers, invested with precisely the same functions which they themselves exercised; and that these successors of the apostles appointed others in turn to succeed them,—and that thus the line of descent hath continued unbroken to the present time. This doctrine has of late years assumed a peculiar prominence, being dwelt upon by the Anglo-Catholic or Puseyite party in the Church of England, as a fundamental tenet of their theology. The ground on which these modern heretics rest their authority, is their alleged apostolical descent. Thus Dr Hook, one of the champions of Puseyite Episcopacy, remarks:—"Our ordinations descend in an UNBROKEN LINE from Peter and Paul, the apostles of the Circumcision and the Gentiles. These great apostles successively ordained Linus, Cletus, and Clement, bishops of Rome; and the apostolic succession was regularly continued from them to Celestine, Gregory, and Vitalianus, who ordained Patrick bishop of the Irish, and Augustine and Theodore for the English. And from those times, an uninterrupted series of valid ordinations has carried down the apostolic succession in our Churches to the present day. There is not a bishop, priest, or deacon among us, who may not, if he please, trace his spiritual descent from Peter or Paul." "We who have been ordained clergy," says one of the 'Tracts for the Times,' "acknowledge the doctrine of the apostolical succession; and for this reason we consider none to be really ordained, who have not thus been ordained." Thus has a doctrine been revived in the bosom of a Protestant Church, which for centuries has been exclusively maintained by the Church of Rome. Let us examine a little more closely this alleged apostolical succession.

We remark, then,—first, That the very nature of the apostolic office was such as to preclude the possibility of successors. Theirs was an office sui generis. They had seen Christ face to face, and they received their commission from himself personally. They were endowed with peculiar qualifications, having been baptized with the Holy Ghost, and invested with the power of working miracles. That such men should have successors, is plainly impossible. Their privileges, their qualifications, their endowments, could never be handed down to others who might come after them. "Indeed, with nearly as much reason," to use the language of an acute writer on the Puseyite controversy, "might you say that our blessed Saviour had successors in the work of redemption. The apostles did a work which could not be repeated. They revealed the gospel,—that cannot be done again. They opened the door of faith to the Gentiles,—that requires no second hand to touch it; it stands open for ever.

They laid the foundation of the Church,—that foundation can never be moved. There cannot be a succession of founders, any more than a succession of inventors." The office of the apostles, then, being peculiar, extraordinary, and miraculous, was necessarily temporary; and in all that was peculiar and essential to their office, the apostles could not possibly have successors. Suffice it to say, they were inspired men, who had the power of working miracles, and received a peculiar and extraordinary commission which never could be conveyed by them to others; they had, in these essential peculiarities of the apostolic office, no successors. Admitting, then, for the sake of argument, that, in the language of the Tractarians, "every link in the chain is known from St Peter to our present metropolitan," we are still prepared to deny that the bishops of the present day are, in any sense worth alluding to, the successors of the apostles. They can lay claim to the possession of no qualification, to the exercise of no authority, which was essentially apostolic. They may have followed, but they cannot imitate, the apostles. They never saw the Lord Jesus, nor did they receive their commission from him, in the sense in which the apostles received it. They are neither inspired nor miracle-working men. They themselves can give us no new revelation; neither can they found a Church which has been already founded, "being built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone."

But, secondly, The alleged line of descent from the apostles is a pure fiction, being neither real nor unbroken. A long catalogue of names is brought forward, but what evidence have we that multitudes of the individuals whose names appear in the list ever existed at all, much less exercised the episcopal office? And even granting that they lived, and were invested with the office of bishops, is it certain that there was no disqualification which destroyed the validity of their ordination? And be it remembered, that the destruction of one link breaks the chain as effectually as ten thousand. Well, therefore, might Chillingworth remark, "that of ten thousand requisites, whereof any one may fail, not one should be wanting, this, to me, is extremely improbable, and even cousin-german to impossible." But on this point we are not left to conjecture. It is capable of being proved, on undoubted historical evidence, that the utmost irregularity has frequently prevailed in the ordination of bishops. "We read," says a writer in the 'Edinburgh Review,' "of bishops of ten years old,—of bishops of five years old,—of many popes who were mere boys, and who rivalled the frantic dissoluteness of Caligula,—nay, of a female pope." "For about three hundred years," says Bishop Burnet, "the popes were made upon the emperors' mandate. Nor did the emperors part easily with this right; but after that, the Othos and Henrys kept up their pretensions, and came oft to Rome, and made many popes; and the most of the popes so made, were generally anti-popes and schismatics; yet some of them, as Clement II., are put into the catalogues of the popes by Baronius and Binius, and by the late publishers of the Councils, Labbeus and Cossartius. There was, indeed, great opposition made to this at Rome; but let their own historians be appealed to, what a series of monsters, and not men, those popes were; how infamously they were elected—often by the harlots of Rome; and how flagitious they were, we refer to Baronius himself, who could not deny this, for all his partiality in his great work." Thus there is an undoubted certainty that not once, but in multitudes of instances, the alleged succession hath been broken and interrupted. At every little interval in our attempt to trace the line of descent, we find that one link in the chain after another disappears, and that the whole melts from our view "like the baseless fabric of a vision, which leaves not a wreck behind." "What should we think," says Dr Alexander, in his 'Anglo-Catholicism not Apostolical,' "of a man who should claim a dormant peerage on such pretences as those on which the Anglican clergy claim spiritual descent from the apostles,—whose genealogy, when it came to be examined, was found to contain the names of persons who apparently never existed,—of persons of whom it was not known which was the father and which the son—one document averring that Richard was the son of John, and another that John was the son of Richard, while a third omitted the existence of Richard altogether,—of persons of whose legitimacy there was no competent evidence, and of persons who seem never to have belonged to the family at all! Such a claim would be at once cast aside as ridiculous; and yet it is just upon such evidence as this that the Successionists rest their claim to an official descent from the apostles, and demand, for that shadowy Eidolon which they have set up, the religious homage of 'all people, nations, and languages.'" But while we agree with Archbishop Whately, that "there is not a minister in all Christendom who is able to trace up, with any approach to certainty, his own spiritual pedigree," we are far from denying the apostolical succession of the Christian ministry generally; that is, the succession of the ministerial office, not of the men. All regularly ordained ministers are entitled to be regarded as ambassadors of Christ; and while, therefore, we repudiate the doctrine of apostolical succession as held by the Romanists and the Puseyites, we hold an apostolical succession in the best sense of the expression, that in which it is used in the following excellent remarks by the Rev. James Buchanan, in his little work "On the 'Tracts for the Times?'"—"Is there, then, no apostolical succession at all? I answer—There is a succession, if by that you mean a transmission of what the apostles taught and instituted in the Christian Church. There is, in this sense, the succession of Divine truth, transmitted from the apostles in the imperishable record of Scripture;—there is the succession of Divine ordinances, the preaching of the Word, the administration of sacraments, and the exercise of discipline, which have their warrant in the Word, and have been observed, with greater or less purity, from the apostolic age till now;—there is the succession of the Church, the body of Christ, the society of the faithful, including all in every age and country who have been gathered into his fold; and, finally, there is a ministerial succession, or the stated ministry of the Church's office-bearers, which will continue till 'the end of the world.' They receive their message from the Word,—their commission from Christ,—their inward call from the Spirit,—their outward call from the Church, the congregation of the faithful. But what that ministerial succession is, and whether it may be perpetuated by bishops or presbyters, must be determined, like every other question bearing on the order and government of Christ's house, by an appeal to the written Word."

tool of Amsterdam, in the seventeenth century. They appear to have been Calvinists and Millenarians in sentiment, and strict in their terms of communion. See GALENISTS and MENNONITES.

APOTACTICS, or APOTACTIÆ, the first and purest sect of the Apostolics, who stand charged with no heresy, but with imitating the manners of the first age in austerity, and particularly, in renouncing all worldly professions, and having all things in common. They were of the second century, and flourished chiefly in Cilicia and Pamphylia.

APPEAL, a legal term, denoting a request for the transfer of a cause from one judge to another, or from an inferior to a superior tribunal. The Sempronian law secured this privilege to the Roman citizens, that they could not be capitally convicted, but by the suffrage of the people; and in whatever provinces they happened to reside, if the governor showed a disposition to condemn them to death, to scourge, or deprive them of their property, they had liberty to appeal from his jurisdiction to the judgment of the people. This law, which was enacted under the republican form of government, continued in force under the emperors; so that if any freeman of Rome thought himself ill-used and aggrieved by the presidents, in any of the provinces, he could, by appeal, remove his cause to Rome, to the determination of the emperor. A number of persons, we are told, were delegated by Augustus, all of consular rank, to receive the appeals of the people in the provinces. Thus Paul (Acts xxv. 11, 12), when he found that Festus was too much inclined to favour the prejudiced populace of Judea to do full justice to his cause, or deliver him from the lawless fury of his enemies, stood upon his rights as a Roman citizen, and said, I appeal unto Cesar. So, if at any time unjustly condemned on earth, it is consoling to reflect that we can appeal, with confidence of redress, to the judgment-seat of Christ. Rom. xiv. 10; 1 Cor. iv. 3-5; 2 Thess. i. 6-10. But if condemned there by Eternal Justice, where can we appeal? 1 Pet. iv. 18.

APPETITES, properly those keen sensations of bodily want which, without reference to any specific object, arise from the constitution of our nature, and prompt mankind, by some means, to seek supply or relief. There is a material difference between the appetites and the passions. The passions have no existence, till a proper object is presented; whereas the appetites exist first, and then are directed to an object. A passion comes after its object; an appetite goes before it, as is obvious in the appetites of hunger, thirst, and the like. Hunger and thirst are the strongest of all our appetites, being the most essential to our preservation; it is generally owing to criminal indulgence, when any other appetite acquires unreasonable strength. In obeying the natural call of appetite, in eating when hungry, or drinking when thirsty, there is neither virtue nor vice; unless, by so doing, we intentionally promote some good purpose, or violate some duty. But rightly to manage our appetites, so as to keep them in due subordination to reason, is a chief part of virtue; as the unlimited or licentious indulgence of them degrades our nature, and perverts all our rational faculties.

Though the appetites, properly speaking, belong to the body, yet the word is sometimes, by a beautiful analogy, transferred from the animal inclinations and impulses to the affections of the mind; but, in such cases, it always denotes some strong general desire. Thus we speak of an appetite for knowledge,—for fame,—for conquest,—for riches. It is to desires of this strong, irrepressible, and even painful character, that our Saviour refers, in that beautiful passage, “Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled.” Matt. v. 6. See also John iv. 14, vii. 37; Rev. xxii. 17, &c.

Our appetites and passions were given us for our preservation, protection, and improvement; and also for the continuance of the human race; but all excess, as well as all perversion of them from these objects, is evidently sinful, and that according to the degree in which it is indulged. Therefore, says the apostle, “I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection.” 1 Cor. ix. 27.

APPII FORUM, a place about fifty miles from Rome, near the modern town of Piperno, on the road to Naples. It probably had its name from the statue of Appius Claudius, a Roman consul, who paved the famous way from Rome to Capua, and whose statue was set up here. To this place some Christians from Rome came to meet Paul. Acts xxviii. 15. On the ruins of this ancient little village there is now erected an abbey, called Fossa Nuova. The Appian Way, sometimes termed “Queen of the Roman Ways,” on account of its length, and the difficulties attendant on its construction, commenced at Rome, and was first laid down as far as Capua,—a distance of about one thousand stadia, or one hundred and twenty-five miles. From Capua it was afterwards extended to Beneventum, and then to Brundisium, now called Brindisi, a celebrated city on the coast of Apulia, in the territory of the Calabris, when that port became the great resort of those who crossed or recrossed from Asia Minor to Greece; and hence, in the time of the Apostle Paul, it was the chief road to the city of Rome.

APPLE TREE. Prov. xxv. 11; Cant. ii. 3, 5, vii. 8, viii. 5; Joel i. 12. As the best apples of Egypt, though ordinary, are brought thither by sea from Rhodes, and by land from Damascus, we may believe that Judea, an intermediate country between Egypt and Damascus, has none that are of any value. Can it be imagined, then, that the apple trees of which the Prophet Joel speaks (chap. i. 12), and which he mentions among the things that gave joy to the inhabitants of Judea, were those that we call by that name? Our translators must surely have been mistaken here, since the apples which the inhabitants of Judea eat at this day are of foreign growth, and at the same time but very indifferent.

There are five places, besides this in Joel, in which the word occurs; and from them we learn that it was thought the noblest of the trees of the wood, and that its fruit was very sweet or pleasant (Cant. ii. 3), of the colour of gold (Prov. xxv. 11), extremely fragrant (Cant. vii. 8), and proper for those to smell that were ready to faint. Cant. ii. 5. We may be sure that the taphuach was very early known in the Holy Land, as it is mentioned in the Book of Joshua as having given name to a city of Manassah and one of Judah. Several interpreters and critics render Lev. xxiii. 40, “Branches or fruit of the beautiful tree,” and understand it of the citron; and it is known that the Jews still make use of the fruit of this tree at their yearly feast of tabernacles. The plant alluded to is the citrus medica of botanists. The editor of the ‘Pictorial Bible’ says, that this tree grows in the East to a fine large size. Others describe it as attaining, in its wild state, the height of eight feet, and as growing erect, with long reclining branches. The citron is a native of all the warm regions of Asia. We learn from Josephus that the Jews, at the feast of tabernacles, threw the citrons at Alexander Jannæus, which they carried in their hands, according to the law.

Citron trees are very noble, being large, their leaves beautiful, ever continuing on the trees, of an exquisite smell, and affording a most delightful shade. It might well, therefore, be said, “As the citron tree is among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons.” This is a delicate compliment, comparing the fine appearance of the prince amid his escort, to the superior beauty with which the citron tree appears among the ordinary trees of the forest; and the compliment is heightened by an allusion to the refreshing shade and the exhilarating fruit. The exhilarating effects of this fruit are mentioned Cant. ii. 5, “Comfort me with citrons.” Egmont and Heyman tell us of an Arabian who was in a great measure brought to himself, when overcome with wine, by the help of citrons and coffee. To the manner of serving up these citrons in his court Solomon seems to refer, when he says, “A word fitly spoken is like golden citrons in silver baskets;” whether, as Maimonides supposes, in baskets wrought with open work, or in salvers curiously chased, it nothing concerns us to determine; the meaning is, that an excellent saying, suitably expressed, is as the most acceptable gift in the fairest conveyance. So the Rabbins say, that the tribute of the first ripe fruits was carried to the temple in silver baskets.

APPLES OF SODOM. This was a species of fruit which was said by the ancients to grow near the Dead Sea, and which was represented to be beautiful to the eye, but bitter to the taste, and full of ashes. This is generally regarded as a mere fable. Nothing has ever been discovered growing on the shores of the Dead Sea which answers in all respects to the description of the ancients; but one of the vegetable products of the valley resembles it. The plant we refer to is called the ösher, and grows abundantly on the declivities of the south and south-west. Burckhardt describes it as “a fruit of a reddish-yellow colour, about three inches in diameter, which contains a white substance resembling the finest silk, and enveloping some seeds.” A substance of this sort received into the mouth would be felt something like ashes. Irby and Mangles were surprised to find it, on the southern shore of the lake, “grown to the stature of a tree;” and Professor Robinson, who likewise saw it, says that it “corresponds best to the ancient descriptions of the apples of Sodom.”

APPLICATION. In sacred eloquence, the close of a discourse is often termed the application; obviously because the preacher, having finished his argument or exposition, proceeds to apply it practically to the hearts and consciences of his hearers. This has in some periods been done by means of a series of inferences, or uses. In the sermons of the Puritans this practice was carried to an extreme, the uses generally consisting of many divisions, with a still greater number of subdivisions. After the Restoration of Charles II. this excessive formality in the application gradually diminished in the sermons of the best English divines. Still, the scholastic manner has been retained by many distinguished preachers both of the past age and the present. Sometimes the application, instead of being formal, is desultory, rambling, incoherent. This is, if possible, more to be avoided than the opposite fault, being indicative of false taste, if not of a vacant mind. Avoiding both these extremes, the preacher should aim at practical effect, by a direct appeal to the hearts of his hearers. His whole sermon should be so composed as to tend to a single and combined effect in the close. This imparts a unity to the whole performance, and interests the hearers unceasingly as the preacher proceeds. "There is something," says an American divine, "in this principle of oratory analogous to the current of a great river; it rises in remote mountains a mere rill, then it becomes a rivulet, then a brook, then, by the accession of tributary streams, it swells, and widens, and deepens in its course, till it rolls on a flood of waters to the ocean."

APPREHEND. In the language of Scripture this word is peculiarly significant. Paul the apostle best explains it when he saith, "I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus." Phil. iii. 12. That is, that by faith I may be enabled to lay hold of heavenly glory, as the Lord by grace hath laid hold of me, to prepare me for it.

APPROBATION AND DISAPPROBATION. We are so formed as naturally and intuitively to approve what is good, and to disapprove what is evil, whether in our own actions or in those of others. In the performance of any action, whether good or bad, we are conscious of a peculiar affection of our emotional nature, so distinct in its character from every other feeling that it usually receives a separate name, being ascribed to conscience, or, as it is termed by some writers, the moral sense. We are conscious of feelings as well as of thoughts, and the judgment which we pass upon our own actions partakes more of the nature of a feeling than of a process of the mind. There is no perceptible train of thought which gives rise to the feeling,—it arises spontaneous and unbidden, refreshing our hearts with a sense of conscious well-doing, or mantling the cheek with the blush of self-reproach and shame. This feeling is intuitive, and forms the foundation of our moral nature, giving rise to the distinction which we instantly recognise between vice and virtue. It requires no process of reasoning to show that deceit is wrong; there is a monitor within, "a judge within the breast," as Dr Adam Smith terms conscience, which instantly prompts me to feel that I have erred. There is no perceptible interval of time between the performance of the act and the rise of that approving or condemnatory feeling which is attributed to conscience. It is immediate and irresistible, and its evidence is equally strong with our other intuitions, being dogmatically and indisputably certain. It is, no doubt, possible, that this feeling may be apparently overborne for a time, but the moment the unnatural pressure is removed, the feeling is as strong and as resistless as ever. Sometimes the attempt has been made to resolve conscience into a process of reasoning of some kind or other; but besides that the instantaneousness of the judgment seems to exclude such a supposition, it is impossible to adduce a process of the kind which does not involve the very feeling for which it would wish to account. Every feeling of approbation or disapprobation, whether exercised upon our own actions or extended to the actions of others, supposes necessarily some standard to which the action is referred. That standard, then, must either exist in our own constitution, or must exist without us. If it exist within us, the judgment may be immediate, but if it exist without us, the comparison with the standard must involve a process of intellectual reasoning, which, of course, to lead to any thing like a uniform conclusion, must proceed upon some fundamental principles of the human constitution; or if it does not so proceed, the most discordant views will be entertained upon the subject. In the experience of each individual, he is prompted irresistibly to feel complacency in the performance of some actions, and shame and remorse in the performance of others. This is with him no conclusion drawn from reasoning in regard either to the nature or the consequences of the action, but simply an emotion excited naturally and involuntarily. It is an universal principle, pervading the whole human family, and no combination of circumstances has ever succeeded in totally destroying its influence and authority. To this all our other faculties yield a ready submission, and, amid all the strange perversions of the human mind and heart, conscience asserts a supremacy which, however reluctantly, the whole man is bound to acknowledge. "Brute creatures," says Bishop Butler, "are impressed and actuated by various instincts and propensities; so also are we. But additional to this, we have a capacity of reflecting upon actions and characters, and making them objects of our thought; and in doing this, we naturally and unavoidably approve some actions, under the peculiar view of being virtuous and of good desert, and disapprove others, as vicious and of ill desert. That we have this moral approving and disapproving faculty is certain, from our experiencing it in ourselves, and recognising it in others. It appears from our exercising it unavoidably in the approbation or disapprobation even of feigned characters; from the words right and wrong, odious and amiable, base and worthy, with many others of like signification in all languages, applied to actions and characters; from the many written systems of morals which suppose it, since it cannot be imagined that all these authors, throughout all these treatises, attached absolutely no meaning at all to their words, or a meaning merely chimerical; from our natural sense of gratitude, which implies a distinction between merely being the instrument of good, and intending it; from the like distinction every one makes between injury and mere harm, which Hobbes says is peculiar to mankind; and between injury and just punishment,—a distinction plainly natural, prior to the consideration of human laws." The evidence of conscience, then, has all the strength and undeniableness of an intuition. Its power may be overborne by the raging fury of ungovernable passions, but it can never be destroyed. Its still small voice is often heard, even amid the war of tumultuous feelings which prevails within us. "It is not," as has been beautifully and eloquently remarked by the most distinguished moralist as well as theologian of our own day, Dr Chalmers, "it is not that every man obeys her dictates, but that every man feels he ought to obey them. These dictates are often in life and practice disregarded; so that conscience is not the sovereign de facto. Still there is a voice within the hearts of all, which asserts that conscience is the sovereign de jure; that to her belongs the command rightfully, even though she do not possess it actually. . . . She may be outraged in all her prerogatives by the lawless appetites of our nature ; but not without the accompanying sense within of an outrage and a wrong having been inflicted, and a reclaiming voice from thence which causes itself to be heard, and which remonstrates against it." A state of matters such as this might seem, at first sight, to diminish the weight of the evidence of conscience. It is far otherwise. Her voice may appear to be drowned, but it is not silenced. She still declares on the side of truth and virtue,—she still claims to be heard as the advocate of all that is good, and honourable, and just ; and her words are as weighty as ever. We may refuse to listen to her urgent plea on the side of virtue ; but her plea is not the less valid on that account. Vice she never for a moment sanctions or countenances, in the slightest degree. And is not all this sufficient to show the strength of that evidence which conscience gives,—evidence not in favour of intellectual truth, but of moral goodness,—evidence in favour of a class of truths which are all the more important that they bear not merely upon the understanding, but upon the heart. Had there been no intuitive conviction in favour of such truth, there would have been something like an imperfection in the framework of the human constitution. There is, however, an intuitive, irresistible, and immediate testimony borne to moral truth, by the governing power of our moral nature,—conscience ; and there is not a human being on the earth who carries not within him this faithful monitor and witness, whose employment it is to counsel, and direct, and warn, that all may be led in the paths of virtue, and be enabled to shun the paths of vice. "Upon whatever," to use the language of Dr Adam Smith, in one of the most eloquent and interesting works ever published upon moral science,—“upon whatever we suppose our moral faculties to be founded—whether upon a certain modification of reason, upon an original instinct, called a moral sense, or upon some other principle of our nature,—it cannot be doubted, that they were given us for the direction of our conduct in this life. They carry along with them the most evident badges of this authority, which denote that they were set up within us to be the supreme arbiters of all our actions, to superintend all our senses, passions, and appetites, and to judge how far each of them was either to be indulged or restrained. It is the peculiar office of these faculties to judge, to bestow censure or applause upon all the other principles of our nature.”

APPROPRIATION. This term is often used by divines to express that act of the mind by which we accept the blessings of the gospel as our own. It has been a matter of frequent controversy, whether faith involves, in its real nature, this act of appropriation. Faith, in its simplest sense, denotes nothing more than a belief in testimony ; but when we take into consideration the nature of the objects believed in the act of saving faith, it is impossible to deny, that the very act of believing on Christ is an act of receiving or appropriating Christ, and thus resting on him alone for salvation. Without such an appropriation, faith would not only be vague and indefinite, but altogether inoperative upon the heart and life. We speak not now of the consciousness of having appropriated Christ, but of the act of doing so. The former is rather to be regarded as assurance,—the latter as strictly appropriation. The former ought not to be regarded as necessarily belonging to faith,—but the latter is an essential element, without which we cannot be said to believe unto the saving of the soul. It is one thing to say with Thomas, “My Lord, and my God,” and a very different thing to say, “Christ is mine.” The one is the act of taking Christ,—the other, an expression of our consciousness that we have so taken him. The one is plainly believing,—the other is an assurance that we have so believed. See ASSURANCE.

APRIES, a king of Egypt who is mentioned in Scripture under the name of Pharaoh-Hophra. “Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will give Pharaoh-Hophra king of Egypt into the hand of his enemies, and into the hand of them that seek his life ; as I gave Zedekiah king of Judah into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, his enemy, and that sought his life.” Jer. xlv. 30. In Ezek. xxix. 2–5 he is thus represented by a great dragon or crocodile lying in the midst of his rivers : “Son of man, set thy face against Pharaoh king of Egypt, and prophesy against him, and against all Egypt : speak, and say, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself. But I will put hooks in thy jaws, and I will cause the fish of thy rivers to stick unto thy scales ; and I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers, and all the fish of thy rivers shall stick unto thy scales. And I will leave thee thrown into the wilderness, thee and all the fish of thy rivers : thou shalt fall upon the open fields ; thou shalt not be brought together, nor gathered : I have given thee for meat to the beasts of the field, and to the fowls of the heaven.” The river Nile, as is well known, is one great source of the fertility of Egypt, and it abounds in crocodiles which are voracious, and domineer over the other inhabitants of the river. Such was Pharaoh-Hophra or Apries, of whom Herodotus says that he boasted that no god could deprive him of his kingdom. Apries was the son and successor of Psammis, and grandson of Necho, who waged war against Josiah, king of Judah. He reigned thirty years, Prideaux says only twenty-five. In consequence of his failure in an expedition against the Cyrenians, the Egyptians rose in rebellion against him. Amasis, one of his officers, was employed to endeavour to conciliate the people, but, proving treacherous, he joined the rebels, and marched against Apries, whom he defeated and took prisoner. Amasis would have treated him with kindness, but such had been his tyrannical disposition, that the people, as Herodotus informs us, summarily strangled him. Thus was fulfilled the threatening of Jeremiah, that he should be given into the hands of his enemies, as he had given Zedekiah, king of Judah, into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. He had entered into a league to defend Zedekiah, but when Nebuchadnezzar advanced with a great army, and laid siege to Jerusalem, Apries made a pretence of coming to his aid, but speedily retreated to Egypt, and abandoned his ally. Ezekiel reproaches Egypt with this baseness, and predicts that it should be reduced to a solitude, and that God would send against it the sword, which would destroy in it both man and beast. Ezek. xxix. 8, 9.

AQUARIANS (water-drinkers), a branch of the Enkratites, who carried their aversion to wine so far that they substituted water in the holy communion, though some refused it only in their morning communions. It is well known that the ancient Christians mingled water with their wine for sacred use ; partly, perhaps, from economy, and partly from sobriety; but Cyprian gives a mystical reason,—because the wine and water represent Christ and his people united. See ENCRATITES.

AQUATICS, an ancient sect, who, according to Augustine, maintained water to be uncreated and eternal; probably adopting the philosophical system of Thales,—that water was the first principle of all things.

AQUILA, a native of Pontus, by occupation a tent-maker. The Apostle Paul met with him at Corinth, and finding that both he and his wife (Acts xviii. 1) were zealous advocates of the gospel of Christ, he lodged with them, and seems to have obtained employment from them, so as to enable him to earn his livelihood. Previous to his stay at Corinth, Aquila had resided at Rome, but was forced to leave the city in consequence of an edict issued by the Emperor Claudius, commanding all Jews to quit Rome. The intercourse which he enjoyed with Paul at Corinth seems to have given a great impulse to his feelings and views as a Christian, for from that period he became an energetic and successful preacher of the gospel. Paul calls both Aquila and his wife Priscilla, Rom. xvi. 3, “helpers in Christ Jesus.” On leaving Corinth, Aquila accompanied Paul to Ephesus, where he remained while the apostle went forward to Jerusalem. On the occasion of the disturbance which took place at Ephesus, in the matter of Demetrius, Aquila and Priscilla seem to have risked their lives to preserve the apostle. That they afterwards returned to Rome is plain, from Rom. xvi. 4, where the apostle sends his salutation to them; and that they were again at Ephesus appears from 2 Tim. iv. 19. At this point our knowledge of their history terminates.

AQUILA, the author of a translation of the Old Testament from the Hebrew into the Greek. He was a native of Sinope in Pontus, who, though of Jewish descent, had originally professed Christianity, but afterwards became a Jew, and is supposed to have undertaken his work in opposition to the Christians, not only that the Septuagint might be superseded, but that a new version might be given of those passages on which they chiefly relied in their controversies with the Jews. The authors of the Talmud, according to Lightfoot, sometimes quote this version, though they never quote the Septuagint. Aquila lived in the second century, and it is probable that his translation was executed about the middle of that century. According to Jerome, Aquila published two editions of his version, the second of which was the most literal; it was allowed to be read publicly in the Jewish synagogues, by the hundred and twenty-fifth novel of the Emperor Justinian. This version has always, indeed, been held in considerable estimation by the Jews, by whom it is termed the Hebrew verity.

AQUINAS (THOMAS.) Thomas D'Aquin or Aquinas stands without a rival at the head of the scholastic theologians. He is commonly called the Angelic Doctor, and by Roman Catholic writers he is held in the highest estimation, being uniformly regarded as the Homer of their theological writers; and in our own day, his works have been extravagantly lauded by the Puseyites, as containing a mine of valuable information. This eminent man was born in Naples in the beginning of the thirteenth century. He early dedicated his time and his talents to the study of both philosophy and theology. His fame as a philosopher rests chiefly on his comments on Aristotle, whose opinions, in the days of the schoolmen, it was accounted a capital crime to controvert. At the age of seventeen, he entered the Dominican order, and when only twenty-four, he taught dialectics, philosophy, and theology in the University of Paris, with great applause. He was descended from a noble family, but, like his distinguished cotemporary Albert the Great, he renounced worldly honours, and applied himself exclusively to literary and theological pursuits. His eminence as a writer is undoubted. “He exhibited,” says Erasmus, “a constancy of application, a soundness of understanding, and a solidity of erudition, which scarcely any of the modern divines have equalled. He has made so excellent a use of the learning then in vogue, that one cannot help lamenting that he enjoyed not the advantages of the learned languages, and the other materials of politer literature.” In this extravagant eulogium of Aquinas by Erasmus we cannot sympathize. His talents, and perseverance, and learning, were undoubtedly of a high order; but his writings, though very voluminous, extending to twenty-one volumes in folio, contain so much of the absurd and useless dialectics of the schools, that they by no means compensate the labour of perusing them. Aquinas took Aristotle as his guide and his model. The five first volumes of his works are dedicated to a careful discussion of the opinions of the Stagyrice, and a review of the various commentaries, chiefly of the Arabian writers, which had appeared before his time. It is in his Summa Theologiæ, however, that we find a complete methodical exposition of his theological opinions. He is a subtle dialectician, a profound metaphysician. He delights in speculative inquiries into subjects of a mystical character, such as the different orders of angels,—their nature and functions. Aquinas occupies a high rank among Christian moralists, not from any peculiarity in his fundamental notions on the theory of Christian duty, but from the minuteness with which he has distinguished the various classes of duties, and the bearing of each upon the varied circumstances of individuals. He is distinguished also among the schoolmen, by the superiority of his method,—a quality which is remarkably apparent in that work which is regarded as the masterpiece of the middle ages, his Summa Theologiæ. He is the founder of a sect which, deriving its name from him, is called the Thomists, in opposition to those who, following the opinions of Duns Scotus, are termed the Scotists. Aquinas was a Dominican, and Scotus a Franciscan. Aquinas held that goodness originated in the nature of God, while Scotus resolved all goodness into the will of God. The former held the Virgin Mary to have been in all respects like other descendants of fallen man; the latter held the immaculate conception of the Virgin, or that she was born without original sin. The Scotists and Thomists likewise disagreed about the nature of the Divine co-operation with the human will, the measure of Divine grace that is necessary to salvation, and other abstruse and minute questions which it is unnecessary to mention. Aquinas died in 1274. He was canonized by Pope John XXII., in the year 1323, and Pius V., in 1567, gave him the title of the Fifth Doctor of the Church.

AR, the capital city of the Moabites, situated in the hills twenty-five miles on the south of the river Arnon. This city was likewise called Rabbah, or Rabbath-Moab, to distinguish it from the Ammonite Rabbah. It was afterwards called by the Greeks Areopolis; and is at present termed El-Rabba. Sihon, king of the Amorites, burnt it; and it was afterwards pillaged by the Assyrians, under Shalmanezzer. Isa. xv. 1. Jerome informs us, that this city was destroyed by an earthquake, towards the end of the third century. In Isa. xvi. and Jer. xlviii. it is called Kir-hareseth and Kir-heres,—the city with walls of burnt brick. Mr Wylie, in his work on 'Modern Judea,' thus adverts to the present condition of Ar, in connection with the fulfilment of ancient prophecies:—"It was over this city, whose palaces then covered this now naked eminence, that the prophet poured this lament, 'Therefore will I howl for Moab, and I will cry out for all Moab; mine heart shall mourn for the men of Kir-heres.' There is not at this day either dwelling or inhabitant on the spot,—there is nothing even amongst her ruins which could betoken that the city had ever possessed the wealth and splendour of a capital. 'Ar of Moab is laid waste, and brought to silence.' Isa. xv. 1. Considering that this was the capital, the ruins cover a very disproportionate space,—not much more than a mile in circuit; but it is probable that great part of the city is buried in the earth. The remains are chiefly those of private dwellings, their appearance indicating unusual strength. The ruins of a temple still remain, the gate of another edifice, and two Corinthian columns. In a plain west of the ruins is an insulated altar; but no worshipper is there. The shrine is forsaken and desecrated. 'Moab shall be ashamed of Chemosh, as the house of Israel was ashamed of Beth-el, their confidence.' Jer. xlviii. 13. Irby and Mangles say that they could find no traces of the city walls: 'For the foundations of Kir-hareseth shall ye mourn; surely they are stricken.' Isa. xvi. 7." See MOAB.

ARAB, a city belonging to the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 52.

ARABAH, a city belonging to the tribe of Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 22.

ARABIA, a large region of Asia, whose inhabitants are supposed to be descended from Ishmael, the son of Abraham, by Hagar the Egyptian. The inhabitants of Arabia are called in Scripture, children of the East, Judg. vi. 3, 1 Kings iv. 30, while in other passages they are spoken of as Arabians. 2 Chron. xxi. 16. The country has been divided by geographers into three separate regions, called Arabia Petræa, Arabia Deserta, and Arabia Felix. These divisions, however, were not known anciently to the inhabitants of the East, nor are they recognised in the sacred Scriptures. The Arabians are mentioned in 2 Chron. xvii. 11, as paying tribute to Jehoshaphat, from their flocks and herds; and the kings of Arabia are said to have furnished Solomon with much gold and silver. 2 Chron. ix. 14. Like the Jews, the descendants of Ishmael form a standing miracle, being, at this day, "a wild people dwelling in the presence of all their brethren." Their plundering habits have naturally provoked the hostility of other nations, and subsisting as they have done for many successive generations by rapine, there is scarcely a single people who have figured in the history of the ancient world, that has not by turns directed its arms against this turbulent race. But, amid all the efforts made to subdue them, this bold, enterprising people have maintained their national independence. It appears from Gal. i. 17, that Paul commenced his public ministry in Arabia; but the exact time when it was first preached after the apostle is not known.

It is plain, however, that there were Arabian Jews present at the feast of Pentecost, Acts ii. 11. The first monarch of Yemen, who is recorded to have adopted the Christian creed, appears to have reigned about the fourth century. Claudius Buchanan, in his Christian Researches, tells us that frequent mention is made in the early monuments of the bishops of Arabia; and a bishop of Bosra (Bussora) is known to have been present at the council of Antioch, which was held A.D. 269. "Whatever doubt there may exist respecting the state of Christianity in Arabia, in the first and second centuries, more definite information is obtained when we descend to the third, fourth, and fifth. 'The persecutions and disorders,' Salc observes, 'which happened in the Eastern Church soon after the commencement of the third century, obliged great numbers to seek shelter in that country of liberty (Arabia), where the principal tribes which then embraced Christianity, were those of Hanyar, Rabia, Taglab, and Bahra, and the inhabitants of Heirah.

"It is curious to observe how, in different countries, but which have the same religion, there should exist such an opposite mode of treating Christians. Niebhur, in his travels in Arabia (vol. ii. p. 192), informs us that he never could perceive that the Arabians had any actual hatred for those of a varying religion; though he allows that they treated them with pretty nearly the same contempt with which the Christians look upon the Jews in Europe. This contempt amongst the Arabs is regulated—falling heaviest on the Banians, next after them upon the Jews, and least of all on the Christians, who in their turn express least aversion to the Mussalmans. At the time that Niebhur travelled, in 1761–1762, he says he found no Christian Church remaining in Arabia, however numerous the followers of our Saviour once were in that country. 'There were, notwithstanding,' he adds, 'in the province of Lachsha, many Sabeans, or Christians of St John, whose doctrines seem to be a strange medley of the opinions and ceremonies of several different religions.'" Arabia has been the grand seat of Mohammedanism ever since its founder appeared in the seventh century.

The Arabs, inheriting the character of Ishmael, their progenitor, have in all ages led a wandering life. Many attempts have been made to subdue them, but to this hour they preserve their national independence.

Of late years a sect has arisen in Arabia termed Wahabees, professing to restore the religion of Mahommed to its original purity. This sect has been checked in its progress, in the meantime, by the exertions chiefly of the present Pacha of Egypt; but at no distant period it threatens to overturn the institutions of Islam. There has been discovered, in the neighbourhood of Mecca, the remains of a remarkable people, who boast of being descended from Jonadab, the son of Rechab, of whom it is declared, in Jer. xxxv. 19, that he "shall not want a man to stand before me for ever." These Beni-Rechab or Beni-Khebir, as they are also called, exist as a distinct people, professing pure Judaism, and understanding the Hebrew language. Dr Wolff has called the attention of the Christian world to this people, though they were mentioned by Benjamin of Tudela in the twelfth century. Their number is stated to be at present sixty thousand.

The character and history of the Arabians affords a remarkable instance of the fulfilment of prophecy

It was prophesied concerning Ishmael, "He will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him: and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren. I will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly,—and I will make him a great nation." Gen. xvi. 12, xvii. 20. This is exactly the description of the Arabs at this day; and accordingly we find an intelligent traveller, Sir R. K. Porter, remarking, "That an acute and active people, surrounded for ages by polished and luxurious nations, should, from their earliest to their latest times, be still found a wild people, dwelling in the presence of all their brethren, as we may call those nations, unsubdued and unchangeable, is indeed a standing miracle,—one of those mysterious facts which establish the truth of prophecy."

ARABICI; early in the third century, a sect of minute philosophers, from Arabia (whence their name), who conceived that the soul died with the body, and would be raised with it. Origen being called from Egypt to convert them, publicly argued with such remarkable success (having probably no leader able to contend with him), that they immediately gave up their peculiar notions, and returned to the bosom of the Church.

ARABIC LANGUAGE, one of the languages which may be considered as cognate or kindred to the Hebrew; but it abounds much more in consonants, has more inflections, and is in all respects more copious. Still its agreement with the Hebrew is such, that an acquaintance with it is found to resolve many exegetical difficulties. "All the cognate languages, indeed," as has been remarked, "supply the deficiency of the Hebrew, and make us fully acquainted with the force and meaning of obscure words and phrases, by restoring the lost roots of words, as well as the primary and secondary meanings of such roots; by illustrating words whose meaning has been hitherto uncertain; and by unfolding the meanings of other words that are of less frequent occurrence, or are only once found in the Scriptures." In securing all these advantages to the Hebrew student, Arabic is peculiarly valuable. Some philologists, indeed, allege that it is simply an enlarged and highly improved dialect of the Hebrew. One portion of the Bible, at all events,—the Book of Job,—it is impossible to understand without a knowledge of the Arabic idioms. From the various tribes into which Arabia was divided, the language was spoken in different dialects, the principal of which were the Hamyarat and the Koreish. The latter was the purest, the richest, and the most polished of all the Arabic idioms. About the beginning of the seventh century the other dialects became incorporated with it, and hence the Arabic has become one of the most luxuriant, copious, and beautiful of languages. The Hamyaritic dialect, which was spoken by the genuine Arabs, derived its name from Hamyar, the grandson of Terah. It approached near to the Syrian or Chaldaic. The Koran, it is well known, is written in the Koreish dialect; and although, as in the case of our own authorized version of the Bible, we might have supposed that it would have given a fixedness to the language, which it might not otherwise have had, we find, on the contrary, that the style of the Koran is in a manner obsolete, from the changes which the language has undergone in little more than a thousand years. The Arabic spoken and written in the age of Mahommed may now be regarded as a dead language. It is taught, indeed, in the College of Mecca as a separate language from the modern.

ARAD, a city in Arabia Petrea, situated to the south of Judah and the land of Canaan. The king of Arad opposed the progress of the Israelites on their way to the Promised Land, defeated them, and took from them a considerable booty. But his country, in consequence, became anathematized; and as soon as they were masters of the land of Canaan, they destroyed all his cities. Numb. xxi. 1-3. Arad was afterwards rebuilt; and Eusebius places it in the neighbourhood of Kades, at the distance of twenty Roman miles from Hebron. The Israelites, in their journey through the wilderness, having quitted Shapher, came to Arad, which in our translation is called Haradah, and from thence to Makheloth. Numb. xxxiii. 23-25.

ARAM, the fifth son of Shem (Gen. x. 22), was the father of the Syrians, who from him were called Aramæans, or Aramites. There are several countries distinguished by this name in Scripture, as Aram Naharaim, or Syria of the two rivers,—that is, Mesopotamia,—Aram of Damascus, Aram of Soba, Aram of Bethrohob, Aram of Maachah; the meaning of which is, that the cities of Damascus, Soba, Bethrohob, and Maachah, were situated in Syria. Homer and Hesiod call those Aramæans who are called Syrians by the Greeks of more recent times. The Prophet Amos intimates that the first Aramæans, or Assyrians, dwelt in the country of Kir in Iberia; and that the Lord brought them from thence as he did the Hebrews out of Egypt (ix. 7); but when that event happened is not known. It must be very ancient, since Moses calls the Syrians and people of Mesopotamia by the name of Aramites. The Syrians often waged war against the Hebrews; but David subdued them, and compelled them to pay him tribute. Solomon preserved over them the same authority; but after the secession of the Ten Tribes, it does not appear that the Syrians were generally subject to the kings of Israel; unless perhaps under Jeroboam II., who restored the kingdom of Israel to its ancient boundaries. 2 Kings xiv. 25.

ARAMÆAN LANGUAGE, the name of the vernacular tongue of the Jews of Palestine in the days of our Saviour, which maintained itself along with the Greek. See GREEK OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The Shemitish languages, says Professor Robinson, may be properly reduced to three great branches, viz.,—1. The Aramæan, which originally prevailed in Syria, Babylonia, and Mesopotamia; and may therefore be subdivided into the Syrian or West Aramæan, and the Chaldee or East Aramæan, called also the Babylonish Aramæan. To this general branch belong also the dialects of the Samaritans, Zabrians, and Palmyrenes. 2. The Hebrew, with which the fragments of the Phœnician coincide. 3. The Arabic, to which also belongs the Ethiopic as a dialect.

The Aramæan, introduced and spoken in Palestine, has also been, and is still, often called the Syro-Chaldaic, because it was probably in some degree a mixture of both the Eastern and Western dialects; or perhaps the distinction between the two had not yet arisen in the age of Christ and his apostles.

So long as the Jewish nation maintained its political independence in Palestine, the Hebrew continued to be the common language of the country; and, so far as we can judge from the remains of it which are still extant, although not entirely pure, it was yet free from any important changes in those elements and forms by which it was distinguished from other languages. But at the period when the Assyrian and Chaldean rulers of Babylon subdued Palestine, every thing assumed another shape. The Jews of Palestine lost, with their political independence, also the independence of their language, which they had till then asserted. The Babylonish-Aramæan dialect supplanted the Hebrew, and became by degrees in Palestine the prevailing language of the people, until this in its turn was in some measure, though not entirely, supplanted by the Greek. The New Testament and Josephus call it the Hebrew. Old as this appellation is, however, it has one important defect, namely, that it is too indefinite, and may mislead those who are unacquainted with the subject to confound the ancient Hebrew and the Aramæan, which took the place of Hebrew after the Babylonish exile. It will probably be most appropriate to bestow on the language of Palestine, in order to distinguish it from other dialects, the simple name of the Palestine-Aramæan, or the Palestine-Syriac; for the terms Aramæan and Syriac are fully identical.

MOUNT ARARAT.

And the Ark rested upon the Mountains of Ararat.

G. N. 71. 1

The character and condition of the language called Hebrew, in the age of Christ and his apostles, can thus be determined with certainty; and it is a point of great importance to an interpreter of the New Testament.

1. The proper names of persons which are given in the New Testament and in Josephus, are mostly Aramæan. We need only refer to the frequent names compounded with the Aramæan Bar (son), as Bar-Tahmai, Bar-Jesu, Bar-Timei, Bar-Abba, &c., all of which sufficiently betray their Aramæan origin.

2. The significant surnames, also, which certain persons bore, on account of their moral or corporeal character, as Boanerges, Barabbas, Cephas, &c., are Aramæan.

3. The same is also true of most of the significant geographical names; among which the most frequent are those compounded with Beth, Caphon, and En, on which one only needs to consult the index of Relandi Palestina.

ARARAT, a mountain of Asia, in Armenia, on which the ark of Noah rested after the cessation of the deluge. Concerning the etymology of the name, Dr Bryant observes that it is a compound of Ar-Arat, and signifies, "the mountain of descent."

In Gen. viii. 4, we find it recorded that "the ark rested upon the mountains of Ararat." The particular mountain here referred to is said to be situated in lat. 39° 30' N., and long. 44° 30' E., in the range of Taurus. Its summit, being 17,700 feet above the level of the sea, is covered with perpetual snow. The name usually given to Ararat by the Turks is, Agri Dag, or the Great Mountain; and by the Armenians, Macis, or the Mother of the World; and by the Persians, Kuhl-Nuach, or the Mountains of Noah. The Armenians entertain the most profound reverence for this mountain, so that, on coming within sight of it, they kiss the earth, and repeat certain prayers, making the sign of the cross. A tradition has long existed in the neighbourhood, that some remains of the ark built by Noah are to be seen there; and Epiphanius says, "that in his time a few relics of that extraordinary structure existed on the mountain." Mr Morier declares, that the Persians told him "many stories of its wonders, such as that no one who attempted to ascend it was ever again seen, and that one hundred men, who had been sent from Arzoum by the Pacha, to effect the undertaking, never returned. The Armenian priest assured me, with a very grave face, that the ark is still there." Various writers, and among the rest the late Dr Pye Smith, chiefly on geological grounds, dispute the locality on which the ark rested; but there can be little doubt that the tradition which fixes the scene as in Armenia, is the best founded of all the different theories that have been proposed. Josephus, quoting from Berosus, a very ancient writer, tells us, that at the very early period when that annalist lived, there was a tradition that some part of the ark was to be found in Armenia, on the mountains of the Cordyæus, or Gordiceus, a name given to the whole range of mountains to which Ararat belongs. It has also been pretended, that angels are stationed to guard the approach to the mountain, that no one may dare to intrude into a place so sacred as that on which the ark rested. The form of the mountain, according to Tournefort, is that of a sugar loaf, having two summits; the lesser sharp and pointed, the higher, which is that of the ark, lies north-west of it, and rears its head far above the other mountains, and may be seen by the traveller from an immense distance. The separate peaks are called Great and Little Ararat, and the distance between is seven miles.

It was until recently believed that the summit of Mount Ararat had never been reached; but we are informed by Professor Parrot that, in 1829, he accomplished this difficult task. The Professor appears to have been in the service of Russia, whose armies, in the last contest with Turkey, were at the period referred to in possession of the surrounding country. After he and his party had failed in two attempts to ascend, the third proved successful. This mountain is alleged by all the travellers who have visited it to be an object of surpassing grandeur and sublimity. "Nothing," says Mr Morier, "can be more beautiful than its shape,—more awful than its height." Sir R. Ker Porter thus described the effect produced upon his mind by a view of the mountain:—"From the spot on which I stood, it appeared as if the hugest mountains of the world had been piled upon each other to form this one sublime immensity of earth, and rock, and snow. The icy peaks of its double heads rose majestically into the clear and cloudless heavens; the sun blazed bright upon them; and the reflection sent forth a dazzling radiance equal to other suns. This point of the view united the utmost grandeur of plain and height. But the feelings I experienced while looking on the mountain are hardly to be described. My eye, not able to rest for any length of time upon the blinding glory of its summits, wavered down the apparently interminable sides, till I could no longer trace their vast lines in the mists of the horizon; when an inexpressible impulse, immediately carrying my eye upwards again, refixed my gaze upon the awful glare of Ararat; and this bewildered sensibility of sight being answered by a similar feeling in the mind, for some moments I was lost in a strange suspension of the powers of thought." "On descending into the plain of Nackshan," says the Rev. Henry Martyn, "my attention was seized by the appearance of a hoary mountain in front at the other end, rising so high above the rest that they sunk into nothing. It was truly sublime; and the interest it excited was not less when, on inquiring its name, I was told it was Agir or Ararat. At four in the afternoon we set out for Shurror. The evening was pleasant; the ground over which we passed was full of rich cultivation and verdure, watered by many a stream, and containing forty villages,—most of them with the usual appendage of gardens. To add to the scene, the great Ararat was on our left. On the peak of that hill the whole Church was contained: it is now spread far and wide, but the ancient vicinity of it knows it no more. I fancied many a spot where Noah, perhaps, offered his sacrifices; and the promise of God that seed-time and harvest should not cease, appeared to me more anxiously fulfilled in the agreeable plain where it was spoken than elsewhere, as I had not seen such fertility in any part of the Shah's dominions. Here the blessed saint landed in a new world: so may I, safe in Christ, outride the storms of life, and land at last on one of the everlasting hills." The incredulity of the Armenians as to the possibility of ascending to the top of Ararat is based on their superstition. They are firmly persuaded that Noah's ark exists to the present day on the summit of the mountain; and that, in order to preserve it, no person is permitted to approach it. We learn the grounds of this tradition from the Armenian chronicles, in the legend of a monk of the name of James, who was afterwards patriarch of Nesibis, and a cotemporary and relative of St Gregory. It is said that this monk, in order to settle the disputes which had arisen with respect to the scriptural account of Noah, resolved to ascend to the top of Ararat, to convince himself of the existence of the ark. At the declivity of the mountain, however, he had several times fallen asleep from exhaustion, and found, on awaking, that he had been unconsciously carried down to the point from which he first set out. God at length had compassion on his unwearied though fruitless exertions, and during his sleep sent an angel with the message that his exertions were unavailing; but, as a reward for his indefatigable zeal, he sent him a piece of the ark,—the very same which is now preserved as the most valuable relic in the cathedral of Etschmiadzen. The belief in the impossibility of ascending Mount Ararat has, in consequence of this tradition, which is sanctioned by his Church, almost become an article of faith, which an Armenian would not renounce, even if he were placed in his own proper person on the summit of the mountain. The Armenian, as soon as he comes within view of it, kisses the earth, and repeats certain prayers, making the sign of the cross.

From Bochart we learn that the Sibylline oracles placed the mountains of Ararat in Phrygia; which cannot be reconciled with the statement of the inspired writer. Dr Shuckford, after Sir Walter Raleigh, argues that the true Ararat lies among the mountains of the north of India; but Mr Faber has answered his reasoning, and proved, by a comparison of geographical notices incidentally mentioned in the Old Testament, that the Ararat of Armenia is the true Ararat.

ARAUNAH (2 Sam. xxiv. 16-18), or ORNAN, as the same person is called (1 Chron. xxi. 18), was an inhabitant of Jerusalem, at or soon after the time that city went by the name of Jebus, whose threshing floor was situated on Mount Zion,—the same spot on which the temple of Jerusalem was afterwards built.

ARBA, or KINJATH-ARBA, the original name given to Hebron. It seems to have received its name from Arba, a man of distinction among the Arabians. The Jewish Rabbins say, the name of Arba, which signifies four, was derived from the circumstance that Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, and Rebekah, were buried there. It was a place of great antiquity, for Moses speaks of it as having been built seven years before Zoan in Egypt, the royal city of the Pharaohs; and it was consequently one of the oldest cities in the world. Joshua mentions Arba as the same with Hebron. See HEBRON.

ARBACES, a general of the Medes, and governor of Media under Sardanapalus, king of Assyria, whose empire he subverted. Prideaux is of opinion that Tiglath-pileser and Arbaces are the same person under two distinct names. Archbishop Usher is of a different opinion, supposing that one possessed Media, and the other Assyria.

ARBELA, or ARBAH-EL, signifies, fine countries, countries of God; for which reason we find several places so named in Palestine. The first, according to Eusebius, was a village on the other side of the Jordan, dependant upon Pella. The second, according to Josephus, was a place in the province of Galilee, in the vicinity of Scphoris. The third was a village in Upper Galilee, noted for its caverns, which were the frequent refuge of robbers.

ARCH. The structure of the arch does not appear to have been known to the Hebrews; and accordingly, in the only passage of Scripture where the word occurs (Ezek. xl. 16), the marginal reading of galleries or porches, which were so common in the East, is certainly to be preferred.

ARCHAD, an ancient city, alleged by the Septuagint to have been built by Nimrod. See ACCAD.

ARCHANGEL, according to some, means an angel occupying the eighth rank in the celestial order or hierarchy, which consists, according to the apostles, of thrones, dominions, principalities, and so on. Col. i. 16; 1 Pet. iii. 22; Eph. i. 21. The fathers who have interpreted the words of the apostles, are not agreed on the number and order of the celestial hierarchy. Origen was of opinion, that Paul mentioned part only of the choirs of angels, and that there were many others of which he said nothing; and this notion may be observed in many of the subsequent fathers. Others have reckoned up nine choirs of angels. The author who is commonly cited under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite admits but three hierarchies, and three orders of angels in each hierarchy. In the first are seraphim, cherubim, and thrones; in the second, dominions, mights, and powers; in the third, principalities, archangels, and angels. Some of the Rabbins reckon four, others, ten, orders, and give the different names according to their degrees of power and knowledge; but this rests only on the imagination of those who amuse themselves with speaking very particularly of things of which they know nothing. These titles of rank are probably allusions to the customary order in the courts of the Assyrian, Chaldean, and Persian kings; hence Michael the archangel tells Daniel that he is one of the chief princes in the court of the Almighty. Bishop Horsley and others of late have contended that the term archangel is a title belonging to our Lord himself; but the arguments which they employ in support of this opinion, though ingenious, are far from being conclusive. See ANGEL.

ARCHBISHOP, the chief or metropolitan bishop in the Episcopal Church, who has several suffragans under him. Archbishops were not known in the East till about the year 320; and though there were some soon after this who had the title, yet that was only a personal honour, by which the bishops of considerable cities were distinguished. It was not till of late that archbishops became metropolitans, and had suffragans under them. The ecclesiastical government of England is divided into two provinces, viz., Canterbury and York. The first archbishop of Canterbury was Austin, appointed by King Ethelbert, on his conversion to Christianity, about the year 598. This dignitary has frequently been consecrated by the pope. His Grace of Canterbury is the first peer of England, and the next to the royal family, having precedence of all dukes and all great officers of the crown. It is his privilege, by custom, to crown the kings and queens of the kingdom. The archbishop of York has precedence of all dukes not of the royal blood, and of all officers of the State, except the lord high chancellor. The first archbishop of York was Paulinus, appointed by Pope Gregory about the year 622. The following extract from 'Foxe's Book of Martyrs,' gives a curious account of the origin of archbishops in England, and of the way in which the bishops' sees were originally settled in that kingdom:—"About the year 180, King Lucius, son of Coilus king of the Britons, hearing of the miracles and wonders done by the Christians at that time, directed letters to Eleutherius, bishop of Rome, desiring to receive the Christian faith from him, although there is great difference in authors about the computation of the time. The good bishop hearing the request of the king, sends him certain preachers called Fagan and Damian, who converted the king and people of Britain, and baptized them with the baptism and sacrament of Christ's faith. They overthrew the temples of the idols, and converted the people from their many gods, to serve one living God. Thus, true religion increasing, superstition decayed, with all other rites of idolatry. There were then in Britain twenty-eight head priests, whom they called flamines; and three archpriests, who were called archflamines, having the oversight of their manners, and as judges over the rest. These twenty-eight flamines they turned to twenty-eight bishops, and the three archflamines to three archbishops."

ARCHDEACON, a priest in the Episcopal Church, invested with authority of jurisdiction over the clergy and laity next to the bishop, either through the whole diocese, or only a part of it. There are sixty in England, who visit every two years in three, when they inquire into the reparations and moveables belonging to churches, reform abuses, suspend, excommunicate; in some places prove wills, and induct all clerks into benefices within their respective jurisdictions. The writers of the Romish Church endeavour to trace this office to the New Testament, alleging that Stephen was the first by whom it was exercised. There is no mention of any office, however, really analogous to that of the modern archdeacon, earlier than the fourth century. Bingham declares the duties of this ecclesiastical functionary to consist in attending the bishop at the altar, and assisting him in the management of the revenues of the Church, in preaching, and in ordaining the inferior clergy. It is obvious, from this description, that the original exclusive secularity of the office has been entirely lost sight of, and the archdeacon, not contented with arrogating an unwarranted superiority to the simple, though highly useful, office of deacon in apostolic times, has been converted into a spiritual officer, on whom is made to devolve preaching and the administration of the sacraments. This perversion of a valuable office by the Episcopalian and Romish Churches has not the slightest foundation in the Word of God, but owes its origin to the corruptions which not long after the days of the apostles crept into the Church. As early as A.D. 400 the archdeacon was regarded as next in authority to the bishop. From this period they gradually rose in authority, until in the eleventh and twelfth centuries they were acknowledged as the most influential prelates of the Church, and at the summit of their power. The office began not long after to decline in authority; and now it has almost wholly been abolished in the Romish Church, at least on the Continent. In the Greek Church, since the seventh century, there have been no archdeacons, except one in the Greek imperial court at Constantinople. In the Lutheran Church they are simply the chief of the deacons; but in the Episcopal Church of England, they are the deputies of the bishops, to superintend the districts.

ARCHELAUS, the son of Herod the Great. Having put to death his sons Alexander, Aristobulus, and Antipater, and disinherited Antipas, whom at first he had declared king, Herod substituted Archelaus in his room, and gave Antipas the title of tetrarch only. On the decease of his father, Archelaus succeeded to the kingdom of Judea, and reigned there at the time that Joseph was returning from Egypt with the young child Jesus and his mother. Apprehending that the new king would be as desirous of taking away the life of his child as his father Herod had been, Joseph was afraid to proceed; but being warned of God in a dream, he turned aside into the parts of Galilee, and dwelt in the city of Nazareth. Matt. ii. 22. Archelaus seems to have inherited no inconsiderable portion of the cruel temper of his father. He governed Judea with so much violence that the chief of the Samaritans and Jews impeached him to Augustus, who immediately summoned him to Rome to answer for his conduct. Upon his arrival there, the emperor ordered his accusers to appear against him, and allowed him to defend himself; but his defence was so little satisfactory to Augustus, that he banished him to Vienne, a city of Gaul, where he continued in exile to the end of his days.

ARCHERY. This art is evidently of very high antiquity. We find, in Gen. xxi. 20, Ishmael spoken of as an archer,—probably in reference to his use of the bow and arrow as weapons of defence; and again in Gen. xxvii. 3,—“Take,” said Isaac, “thy quiver and thy bow, and go out to the field, and take me some venison,”—there is an obvious allusion to the employment of archery in hunting. But although these and other passages show that the Hebrews were familiar with this art from a very early period, we find no express mention of its employment in war until the battle of Gilboa, in which Saul was wounded by the Philistine archers. From that period archery seems to have been cultivated by the Israelites with peculiar care; and accordingly, we find David, the successor of Saul, issuing directions to “teach the children of Judah the use of the bow.” 2 Sam. i. 18. The tribe of Benjamin seem to have excelled particularly in archery. So skilful were the Persians in this art, that they are spoken of in prophecy as characterised by remarkable skill in the use of the bow. “Call together,” says Jeremiah (l. 29, 41, 42), “all the archers against Babylon: all ye that bend the bow, camp against it round about. Behold, a people shall come from the north, and a great nation;” “they shall hold the bow;” “every man put in array against thee, O daughter of Babylon." Herodotus declares, that the Scythians were superior to all other nations in the practice of archery; and that the Ethiopians and Egyptians also greatly excelled the Persians. Among the Greeks archery seems to have prevailed from an early period. See ARROW—Bow.

ARCHI, a city belonging to the half tribe of Manasseh beyond the Jordan. Josh. xvi. 2.

ARCHIPPUS, one of the pastors of the Church at Colosse, to whom the Apostle Paul, at the close of his Epistle, gave an important exhortation to "take heed to the ministry which he had received of the Lord, that he fulfilled it." Col. iv. 17.

ARCHI-SYNAGOGUS, or RULER OF THE SYNAGOGUE. Luke xiii. 14; Mark v. 22. These officers regulated all the concerns of the Jewish synagogue, and gave permission to persons to preach. They were generally old men of superior learning, and highly respected among their brethren. There appears to have been several of them attached to each synagogue. They were termed by the Jews Hacamin, or Wise Men, and exercised considerable influence. They were judges of thefts, and similar offences. Paul is supposed to allude to these officers when he asks, "Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you? no, not one that shall be able to judge among his brethren?" 1 Cor. vi. 5. These rulers had the power of inflicting punishment upon those whom they considered as rebellious against the law. Next to the Archi-Synagogus was an officer whose business it was to offer up public prayers to God for the whole congregation; hence he was called Sheliach Zibhar, or the Angel of the Church. There appears to have been an inferior officer, who is spoken of in Luke iv. 20, as the Minister, who had the charge of the Sacred Books.

ARCHITECTURE. The necessity of obtaining shelter being one of the primary wants of man, architecture must have been one of the earliest arts to which his attention was directed. Accordingly, even in the antediluvian age of the world we perceive traces of considerable advancement in this important art. In Gen. iv. 17, we are informed that Cain built a city; and when we think of the construction of the ark, that stupendous vessel, which was reared of sufficient strength and massiveness to outride the surges of the universal flood, we cannot refrain from wondering at the extent to which the knowledge of architecture among the Antediluvians must have gone. The early history of the inhabitants of Palestine exhibits no indications of their acquaintance with the art of building. The aboriginal occupants of that country appear to have lived in dens and caves of the rocks; and when they were necessitated to move from place to place in quest of pasture for their flocks, they seem to have constructed tents which they could carry about with them, and pitch wherever they wished to settle. The first rude attempt, probably, at the exercise of the architectural art, would be the construction of huts built of mud or clay, as they often are to this day in the East. The villages of modern Egypt still consist of mud and straw-built huts. In such places as Judea and some of the neighbouring countries, where rain often falls in torrents, particularly during the winter season, the people would be compelled to resort to wood and stone in constructing the walls of their dwellings. And this they must have done at an early period; for Moses, in the law concerning the leprous house, declares, "Then the priest shall command that they take away the stones in which the plague is." The greater durability, however, of houses which are built of wood and stone has not led to the abandonment of the practice, which still prevails to a great extent in the East, of building with mud or dried clay. Many of the Oriental buildings display great magnificence and splendour. Specimens of architectural skill among the Hebrews were not limited to the temple of Solomon, and the gorgeous edifices of the sacred city. In such buildings, and indeed in all houses not constituted of wood, the Eastern style of building has a peculiarity, which is thus admirably described and commented on by the Rev. Dr Jamieson, in his valuable additions to Dr Paxton's 'Illustrations of Scripture':—"An immense stone, similar in size to the druidical ruins of Stonehenge, but cut in the rectangular form, is placed at the junction of the two walls, intended and calculated, by its ponderous weight, as well as by the strong cement that is used to fasten it, to give solidity and compactness to the neighbouring portions. With this view the block is laid several feet from the bottom, to press down the layer of small stones that form the corners of the base, and thereby perform an office of no small importance in ensuring the permanence and stability of the building. A stone of this description is prepared with unusual care, and, indeed, is regarded as so holy that it imparts sanctity to the rest of the edifice; and as the customs of Orientals in the practice of the useful arts, as well as in their habits of life, have continued from time immemorial unaltered, it is more than probable, it is certain, that such gigantic stones, which the Eastern notions of architecture require, were hewn for insertion in the houses of the ancient inhabitants of that part of the world. In manifest reference to this custom, the Psalmist, describing the prosperity which his country would enjoy if the people remained steadfast in the ordinances and ways of the Lord, says, 'That our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth; that our daughters may be as corner-stones, polished after the similitude of a palace;' i. e., be prudent, industrious, amiable, and virtuous, qualified to sustain the important relations of wives and mothers, be the ornament of their families, and the bond of union between them. But a far more beautiful and striking allusion is made to this custom in another passage of the Psalms, prophetic of the times of Messiah. One of these stones, which the pious care of David had provided towards the erection of that long meditated structure, had been rejected by the builders,—probably as unsuitable, on account of its plainness and want of elegant proportions; and the oracle having been consulted, God, for reasons of importance, though not specified, had commanded the despised stone to be the only one employed as the chief corner-stone: 'The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner.' Psal. cxviii. 22. It was a common occurrence for builders, out of the multitude of single stones that were usually made ready at the commencement of a building, to make their choice of the one best suited to be the chief corner-stone,—to reject one and prefer another; and it was, therefore, no singularity in the workmen at the temple to exercise the usual discretion. But the gospel history has revealed the symbolical meaning of this action, by showing, that just as the builders of the temple rejected a stone, and would have thrown it aside as worthless among the rubbish, which God afterwards commanded to be used in the walls of that splendid edifice; so the Jews refused and crucified Jesus, whom God, in his wise and holy sovereignty, exalted to be the chief stone of the corner, supporting the whole spiritual temple, and uniting the several parts of it into one building, 'an habitation of God through the Spirit.' In what precise style of architecture Solomon's temple was built has been a subject of much discussion among the learned. Some have actually alleged that the orders of architecture were originated on that occasion, by direct inspiration from God. Others, again, contend that the workmen employed by Solomon being either Egyptians or Phœnicians, the temple must have been in the Egyptian style. The idea has been started, more recently, that it was in the Greek style, and that in its form, proportions, and distribution, it resembled the temple of Ceres at Eleusis. But whatever may have been the order after which this splendid religious edifice was reared, there is no appearance of its ever having been imitated, the Jews being positively forbidden to have any other places for public worship. The result of this restriction in their laws was, that the Jews never seem to have possessed any national system of architecture, at least no trace is to be found of it. See HOUSES.

ARCHONTICS, a branch of the Valentinians, towards the close of the second century, who supposed the world to be created by the higher orders of angels, —archontes, or archangels; but the creation of woman they ascribed to evil demons—which seems to indicate they were woman-haters. They supported their principles chiefly by pretended revelations of their own.

ARCTURUS, the name given to a star of the first magnitude in the northern hemisphere, towards the pole. Astronomers place it at some distance from the Great Bear, and in the constellation Boötes. Job, adverting to the power of God, saith, He "maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south" (ix. 9); and again, "Canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons?" xxxviii. 32. Some are of opinion that in these passages the term Arcturus is used to denote Ursa Major, or the Great Bear. The expression, "his sons," is supposed to indicate the three stars in the tail of the Bear. Boötes, in fact, was often called by the Greeks Arctophylax, or the Bear-keeper. It is not improbable, therefore, that Ursa Major is intended in both passages of the Book of Job.

That the course of the stars influenced the seasons, in the opinion of the ancients, is well known; whence Pliny says (lib. ii. cap. 39), "Arcturus seldom rises without bringing hail and tempests;" and (lib. xviii. cap. 28), "The evils which the heavens send us are of two kinds,—that is to say, tempests which produce hail storms, and other like things, which is called Vis Major, and which are caused, as I have often said, by dreadful stars, such as Arcturus, Orion, and the Kids." The ancients, however, were mistaken in this notion, for the stars only marked that time of the year when such things might naturally be expected. See the article CONSTELLATION.

AREBBA, or RABBAH, a city mentioned in Josh. xv. 60, and which is supposed to be the same with Arba or Hebron.

AREOPAGUS, or HILL OF MARS, the place or court in which the areopagites, the celebrated and supreme judges of Athens, assembled. It was on an eminence, formerly almost in the middle of the city; but nothing remains by which we can determine its form or construction. This hill is almost entirely a mass of stone; its upper surface is without any considerable irregularities, but neither so level nor so spacious as that of the Acropolis, and though of no great height, not easily accessible, its sides being steep and abrupt. On this hill the Amazons pitched their tents, when they invaded Attica, in the time of Theseus; and in aftertimes the Persians, under Xerxes, began from hence their attack on the Acropolis.

The learned are not agreed respecting the number of judges that composed this august court; for some limit them to thirty-one, others to fifty-one, and by some they are extended to five hundred. The truth is, that their number seems not to have been fixed, but to have been more or less in different years. This tribunal originally consisted of only nine persons, who had all discharged the office of archons, had acquitted themselves with honour in that trust, and after a rigorous examination before the logistæ, had given a satisfactory account of their administration. The areopagites were judges for life; they never sat in judgment but in the open air, and that only in the night time, that their minds might be less liable to distraction from surrounding objects, and less susceptible of either pity or aversion from extraneous motives. At first they took cognizance of criminal causes only, but in process of time their jurisdiction became of great extent.

The areopagites took cognizance of murders, impieties, and immoralities; they punished vices of all kinds, idleness included; they rewarded or assisted the virtuous;—they were peculiarly attentive to blasphemies against the gods, and to the performance of the sacred mysteries. It was, therefore, with the greatest propriety that Paul was examined before this tribunal. Having preached at Athens against the plurality of gods, and declared that he came to reveal to the Athenians that God whom they adored without knowing him, the apostle was carried before the areopagites, as the introducer of new deities (Acts xvii. 19, 22), where he spoke with so much wisdom, that he converted Dionysius, one of the judges, and was dismissed without any interference on their part. The appearance of Mars' Hill is thus described by Dr E. D. Clarke:—"It is not possible to conceive a situation of greater peril, or one more calculated to prove the sincerity of a preacher, than that in which the apostle was here placed; and the truth of this, perhaps, will never be better felt than by a spectator, who, from this eminence, actually beholds the monuments of pagan pomp and superstition, by which he, whom the Athenians considered as the 'setter forth of strange gods,' was then surrounded; representing to the imagination the disciples of Socrates and of Plato, the dogmatist of the porch, and the sceptic of the academy, addressed by a poor and lowly man, who, 'rude in speech,' without the 'enticing words of man's wisdom,' enjoined precepts contrary to their taste, and very hostile to their prejudices. One of the peculiar privileges of the areopagitæ seems to have been set at defiance by the zeal of Paul on this occasion,—namely that of inflicting extreme and exemplary punishment upon any person who should slight the celebration of the holy mysteries, or blaspheme the gods of Greece. We ascended to the summit by means of steps cut in the natural stone. The sublime scene here exhibited is so striking, that a brief description of it may prove how truly it offers to us a commentary upon the apostle's words, as they were delivered upon the spot. He stood upon the top of the rock, and beneath the canopy of heaven. Before him there was spread a glorious prospect of mountains, islands, seas, and skies; behind him towered the lofty Acropolis, crowned with all its marble temples. Thus every object, whether in the face of nature, or among the works of art, conspired to elevate the mind, and to fill it with reverence towards that Being 'who made and governs the world' (Acts xvii. 24, 28),—who sitteth in that light which no mortal eye can approach, and yet is nigh unto the meanest of his creatures,—'in whom we live, and move, and have our being.'"

AREOPOLIS, a city of Arabia Petræa, situated on the river Arnon, called also Ar, and Rabbath-Moab. See AR.

ARETAS. There were many princes of Arabia of this name; but the only one mentioned in Scripture is he who had only a year before gained possession of Damascus when Paul, who had preached the gospel there with much zeal, was persecuted by the Jews residing in the city, A.D. 38. Acts ix. 23, 24; 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33. Under Nero, fifteen years after, it appears, by the coins, that the Romans were again masters of the city. The coincidence of time here is worthy of remark.

ARGOB, the name of a district which lay beyond Jordan, belonging to the half tribe of Manasseh, and in the country of Bashan. It is extremely fertile, and included sixty cities, all of which had very high walls and strong gates, independent of numerous villages and hamlets, which were not enclosed. Deut. iii. 4, 14; 1 Kings iv. 13. But the name was more particularly given to the metropolis of the country, a city which, according to Eusebius, lay fifteen miles west of Gerasa. We find another place of this name mentioned in 2 Kings xv. 25, where it is stated that Pekah conspired against Pekahiah, king of Israel, "and smote him in Samaria, in the palace of the king's house, with Argob and Arieih."

ARIUS, the head of a well-known heretical sect, which derived its name from him. He flourished about the commencement of the fourth century, and was a native of Lybia, or, according to Photius, of Alexandria. Little is known of his early history and education. He became distinguished, however, as a divine, and particularly from the erroneous opinions which he entertained and taught on the person of Christ. He taught that Jesus Christ was not a divine person, but merely the highest of created beings. The doctrine that the Son of God was co-eternal, co-essential, and co-equal with the Father, appeared to him to savour too much of Sabellianism, or a confounding of the Persons of the Trinity. To preserve, therefore, the distinctness of the Persons in the God-head, Arius fell into the fatal heresy of denying the proper divinity of the Son. He asserted that the Son was of like substance, not of the same substance, with the Father. Hence the distinction expressed in Greek, the orthodox asserting that the Son was homoousios, while the Arians maintained that he was only homoiousios. These doctrines, opposed as they were to the plainest doctrines of the Word of God, were not long in attracting the attention of the Church, and bringing upon Arius ecclesiastical censure. He was condemned, first by a council held at Alexandria, and afterwards by the celebrated Nicene Council, A.D. 325, at which the Emperor Constantine attended in person. At this council was drawn up what is well known in ecclesiastical history as the Nicene Creed, which is intended to disown the doctrines of Arius. This creed, as containing an exposition of the sentiments of the majority of the council on the question of the Person of Christ, was finally adopted. "At first," says Neander, "seventeen bishops, who probably belonged to the strictly Arian party, declined to go with the majority. But as the creed was to be made known under the imperial authority, and threatened all who would not adopt it with the loss of their places and condemnation, as refractory subjects, the greater part of these yielded through fear; and there remained, finally, but two bishops, besides Arius, namely, Theonas of Marmarica in Libya, and Secundus of Ptolemais, who declared without reserve against the Nicene Creed. The two zealous personal friends of Arius themselves, Eusebius of Nicomedia, and Theognis of Nice, subscribed the creed; declaring with Eusebius of Cæsarea, that they yielded for the sake of peace, after having expressed their views as to the way in which it ought to be understood, so as to be free from all objection. Still they refused to subscribe with the rest the condemnatory clauses against the Arian doctrines, not, as they avowed, because they did not agree with the others as to the doctrinal matter, but because, according to the way in which they had learned to understand the doctrines of Arius from his written and oral communications, they could not believe that he had actually taught the doctrines he was accused of teaching. At that time the thing was overlooked; but Arius and his two faithful friends were excommunicated, as teachers of error, from the Church, deposed from their spiritual office, and by the Emperor Constantine condemned to banishment. The latter was at this time overflowing with a fanatical hatred of the doctrines of Arius, which now appeared to him as blasphemous, and subversive of all Christianity; and this fanaticism impelled him already to apply all the expedients of the Byzantine despotism to suppress these doctrines entirely. In an edict issued at this time, he places Arius in the same class with Porphyry, the antagonist of Christianity; and directed that all the writings of Arius, as those of Porphyry, should be burned—the penalty of death even being threatened against those who should be detected in any clandestine attempt to preserve these writings. While Constantine was in this state of feeling, Eusebius and Theognis, who had already rendered themselves suspected by the emperor in refusing to subscribe the condemnatory clause, could not long remain protected against his displeasure; but it turned out, as Theonas and Secundus had foretold them, that they soon shared the same fate with the latter. Three months after the close of the council, they also were deposed from their places and banished."

Arius was now excommunicated as a heretic, and banished to Illyricum, where also he was soon after proscribed, and obliged to flee farther. After three or four years, however, Arius and his followers were recalled, for what reason, or under what circumstances, historians are not well agreed, and the emperor insisted on his being received into the communion of the Church of Alexandria. That Church, however, with Athanasius now at their head, refused to receive him. Upon this, the emperor sent for Arius to Constantinople, and insisted upon his being received into communion by Alexander, bishop of that city. However, on the day before this was to have taken place, Arius died suddenly, from a complaint in his bowels. Some attributed this to poison; others, to the prayers of his enemies; but it is at least possible that it might proceed from a natural cause, with which neither prayer nor poison was connected.

Arius was a man of great learning and eminent talents. He was peculiarly skilful in the art of disputation, and by his acuteness and subtlety he often succeeded in silencing, where he failed to convince. The point on which he differed from the orthodox creed was one which suited the character of his mind; and by his persuasive eloquence he contrived to recommend his sentiments to the favourable notice of many in his day. The doctrines of Arius, though they agitated the Christian Church for some time after his death, gradually lost their popularity among all classes, and would have probably disappeared altogether long before this time, had they not been revived in the beginning of the last century, by the learned Dr Samuel Clarke. Now, however, the Arians are almost entirely absorbed in the Unitarians, or rather Socinians, who believe the Saviour to have been nothing more than a man.

ARIANISM, a term used to express the system of doctrine taught by Arius in the fourth century. Its leading principle was, that Christ was the first and the most exalted of the creatures of God, and existed before the rest were created, and is not like any thing that was made. This was the opinion for which Arius was condemned by the Council of Nice, and his writings ordered to be burned. His system is thus concisely stated by Dr Hill, in his 'Lectures on Divinity':—"The one eternal God, the source of all being and power, did, in the beginning, before any thing was made, produce, by his own will, a most perfect creature, to whom he communicated a large measure of glory and power. By this creature God made the worlds, all things that are in heaven and that are in earth, so that he alone proceeded immediately from God, while all other creatures not only existed after him, but were called into being by his instrumentality, and placed by the Father under his administration. Having been the creator of the first man, he was from the beginning the medium of all Divine communication with the human race. He appeared to the patriarchs, he spake by the prophets, and in the fulness of time he was incarnate; i. e., clothed with that body which, by the immediate operation of God, was formed out of the Virgin Mary; and thus, according to the Arian system, the man Christ Jesus had a real body, like his brethren. But that body, instead of being animated by a human soul, was informed by the super-angelical spirit, who had been with God from the beginning, who condescended to leave that glory, partook in the sorrow and agony which filled up the life of Jesus, and in recompense of this humiliation and obedience, was exalted to be the saviour, the sovereign, and the judge of mankind." Such was the view of the person of Christ which Arius professed to have received from the Scriptures; and which, opposed as it is throughout to the doctrine of Scripture on the subject, was condemned as heretical. The three precise points which the Nicene Council condemned in the opinions of Arius were these,—That there was a time when Christ did not exist; that he began to exist when he was produced of the Father; and that he was produced, not out of the substance of the Father, but like other creatures, out of nothing. The attempt has frequently been made, and by none more strenuously than Dr Priestley, to show that the fathers of the Church, before the Council of Nice, or, as they are generally termed, the Ante-Nicene fathers, held Arian opinions in regard to the person of Christ. It is impossible, however, to peruse their writings attentively, without perceiving that, although on other points they have occasionally fallen into error, on this point they are sufficiently explicit and precise, maintaining both the eternity of Christ, and his being of the same substance and essence with the Father. This latter point the Council of Nice expressed, by the adoption of the Greek word, homoousios. This word, therefore, became the mark of distinction between the orthodox and the Arian opinions. It is a curious circumstance that this very word had been condemned by the Council of Antioch, which sat sixty years before. But to account for this apparent inconsistency between two early councils of the Christian Church, it must be borne in mind that the controversy, in the time of the Council of Antioch, was with the Sabellians, who denied the distinction of persons between the Father and the Son. Previous to this time the word homoousios had been frequently employed by Christian writers to express the consubstantiality of the Father and the Son; and the Sabellians, to throw discredit upon the word, and thereby, if possible, upon the sentiment which the word expressed, alleged that the very use of such a word as homoousios, implied that there was a substance anterior to the Father and the Son, of which each received a part. The Council of Antioch, perceiving that such an erroneous inference was drawn by the Sabellians from the use of this word, laid it aside altogether. The Council of Nice, however, not being concerned with Sabellianism, but with Arianism, revived the use of homoousios in the sense in which it had been used by the earlier writers, and thus effectually distinguished the orthodox from the Arian doctrine. The Arian never could consent to use this word, as being diametrically opposed to his opinions. But some who received the name of Semi-Arians adopted the word homoiousios, to denote their view of the person of Christ, believing, as they did, not that Christ was possessed of the same, but of a similar substance with the Father. After the death of its founder, Arianism made rapid progress, being countenanced frequently by successive reigning emperors at Rome after Constantine. At length the Bishop of Rome assumed infallibility, and fixed the Athanasian doctrine at Rome, while the African and Eastern Churches, which rejected his authority, supported Arianism, or some of its modifications. Before the end of the fourth century this heresy had almost entirely disappeared in the greatest part of the Roman empire, and it never again raised its head until the seventeenth, or rather the beginning of the eighteenth, century. Since that period it has repeatedly been avowed by individual theologians and small sections of Churches, but has nowhere assumed the form of a distinct and separate sect, being generally the premonitory symptom of an individual being about to lapse into all the gross and palpable errors of avowed Socinianism.

ARIEL, one of the names of the capital city of Moab, called Ar, or Rabbath-Moab. But Ariel, which means Lion of God, is a name also given to Jerusalem. Ariel is used sometimes to signify the altar of burnt-offerings in the temple of Jerusalem, and sometimes the temple itself. Isa. xxix. 1, 2.

ARIMANIUS, the evil god of the ancient Persians. The magi maintained the existence of a good and an evil principle,—the former having been from eternity,—the latter created. The good principle they termed Oromasdes,—the evil principle they termed Arimanus.

ARIMANON, a city of refuge beyond the river Jordan, which is supposed to be the celebrated Ramoth in Gilead. Josh. xxi. 38.

ARIMATHEA, a once beautiful town situated between Lydda and Joppa, about thirty miles to the north-west of Jerusalem, in the plain of Sharon. It is now a poor village called Ramla. It is supposed to have been the Ramah of the Old Testament, where Samuel the prophet dwelt (1 Sam. xxv. 1), and the Arimathea of the New Testament, the city of the wealthy Joseph, whose noble character is referred to by each of the evangelists. Ramah and Lydda were the two first cities that fell into the hands of the crusaders, and the former being abandoned by its inhabitants in the night, was thrown open to the invaders, who made it their rendezvous and place of feasting for three days. Dr Clarke describes Ramla as being in a state of desolation and ruin, while Buckingham thinks that it bears marks of having once been a considerable city, which is not unlikely from its being on the road to Joppa, the principal port of the country. At this Rama, or Ramathaim Tophim, as it is called 1 Sam. i., Samuel was born.

ARIOCH, the name of the king of Ellasar, one of those kings who formed the league with Chedorlaomer against the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah. Gen. xiv. 1.

ARISTARCHUS, spoken of by Paul in his Epistle to the Colossians (iv. 10), and often mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. He was a Macedonian, and a native of Thessalonica. He accompanied Paul to Ephesus, and there continued with him during the two years of his abode in that place, sharing with him in all the dangers and labours of the ministry. Acts xix. 29, xx. 4, xxvii. 2. He was near losing his life in a tumult raised by the Ephesian silversmiths. He left Ephesus with the apostle, and went with him into Greece. Thence he attended him into Asia, from Asia into Judea, and from Judea to Rome.

ARISTOBULUS, of whom Paul speaks (Rom. xvi. 10), was, according to the modern Greeks, brother of Barnabas, and one of the seventy disciples,—was ordained a bishop by Barnabas, or by Paul, whom he followed in his travels,—was sent into Britain, where he laboured much, made many converts, and at last died. Mr Taylor thinks there is good reason for believing that Aristobulus was a Christian minister, who was absent in Britain, with part of the family of Brennus, the British king, at the time when Paul saluted his family. The evidence of the Welsh triads he holds to be clear to this effect; and there seems to be no cause of suspicion, either of the falsity of the assertion, or of any interpolation in these documents; and, certainly, the Greeks and the Britons are witnesses perfectly independent of each other, so that collusion is out of the question. If Aristobulus were ordained by Paul, we see how the Britons might be “disciples of the tentmaker,” as they are called by Theodoret, even if Paul never visited Britain in person. See CHRISTIANITY

ARISTOTLE. This distinguished philosopher, whose writings exercised a powerful influence over the minds of men for many ages, was a native of Stagyræ, a small town in Macedonia. Having lost his father in early life, his education was less complete than it would otherwise have been, and for a short period he followed the profession of arms. Ambitions, however, of acquiring literary renown, he quitted the life of a soldier for that of a student, and for twenty years he was the scholar of Plato, who highly appreciated his talents, and foresaw his future fame. So powerful, indeed, did the genius of Aristotle appear in the eyes of Plato, that he gave him the name of Mind. Nor was the compliment undeserved or exaggerated. The pupil soon became the rival of his master. Having cultivated his mental powers not only by persevering study, but by extensive travels, he was selected by Philip, king of Macedon, to be the tutor of his son. The combination was a happy one. It was befitting the philosopher of Stagyræ to be the preceptor of Alexander the Great. The hero never failed, amid all his greatness, to recognise the obligations under which he lay to his distinguished instructor. Having finished the education of his illustrious pupil, Aristotle retired to Athens, where he opened the Lyceum, and founded that school of philosophy which was destined to rival, and almost to outshine, the school of Plato. And while thus engaged in profound researches into almost every department of speculative truth, he was no inattentive observer of the various changes and revolutions which were taking place in the states of Greece. The part which he took, indeed, in political affairs, sometimes exposed him to obloquy, and even to danger. At length, in old age, he was accused of impiety; and fearing, perhaps, the fate of Socrates, he judged it prudent to flee to Chalcis. Doomed to exile and to false reproach, Aristotle was unable to bear up under the load of calamities which had come upon him in his old age; and we are informed that he poisoned himself. Origen alleges that the accusation of impiety against the gods of Paganism was not undeservedly brought against Aristotle, since he alleged that offerings and sacrifices were altogether useless, and that the gods pay little attention to the pomp of external worship, unless it be accompanied with sincere devotion on the part of the worshipper. The inculcation of such opinions was sufficient to draw down upon the philosopher the wrath of Pagan priests, trenching as it did upon their rights and prerogatives. There is scarcely a single subject within the domain of human intelligence which has not been handled by Aristotle in his writings. With theoretical and practical science he was equally familiar; and differing in this respect from his master, Plato, whose researches were chiefly limited to the ethereal region of speculative philosophy, he made it one of the chief objects of his teaching to render science uniformly practical.

ARISTOTELIAN PHILOSOPHY. It would be impossible to select an uninspired individual whose writings and opinions have exercised a longer and more despotic sway over the intelligence of the world than those of Aristotle. Throughout the middle ages this philosopher ruled with undisputed authority over the empire of mind. It was accounted a capital crime to contradict, or even to doubt, the truth of his doctrines; and the influence of his philosophy pervaded the science, the literature, the theology of centuries. It is only justice, therefore, to the prince of ancient philosophers, to sketch, however briefly and imperfectly, the leading points of his system. In reference to matter, Aristotle held that “matter is only power,” or capability of existing, and that which gives it energy and real existence is form.

Our knowledge he believed to originate in the senses; and in attempting the solution of the question which has puzzled inquirers in all ages, What connects the object perceived with the percipient mind? he maintained the existence of what he called sensible species, or small, imperceptible images, which, coming from external objects, pass along the nerves to the brain, becoming, by some inexplicable process, intelligible species; or, in other words, imparting to the mind a knowledge of the existence of the object from which these images, or, as they were regarded by Plato, shadows of things, proceed. By this hypothesis, unfounded though it is, a chain of connection is established between the external object and the brain; but we are still left in ignorance of that mysterious link which connects the mental feeling or sensation with its object. This theory, absurd though it obviously is, maintained undisturbed possession of the minds of men for ages. It is not, however, on his researches into the science of mind that the fame of Aristotle rests; his dialectical system is that part of his philosophy which has been most powerful for good or for evil over the minds of men; and that part, besides, which has chiefly affected the moral and religious opinions of multitudes. "Without Aristotle," says the historian of the Council of Trent, "we would have had no system of religious belief." The doctrine of the syllogism was, indeed, as Mr Dugald Stewart remarks, "one of the most singular facts in the history of the human understanding." It is an analysis of all reasoning, and may, therefore, be employed as a valuable test to discover the validity either of our own reasonings or those of others. It was the perpetual use of it in the scholastic ages, and the prevalent idea that it was of universal application, not as a test, but a mode of reasoning, which brought the syllogism into so great discredit. Inattention, indeed, to the end which Aristotle had in view in bringing forward the syllogism, has been the fruitful source of all the objections which have been made to it. So much, in fact, has the true design been misunderstood, that from the period when Lord Bacon alleged that discoveries in natural philosophy are not likely to be promoted by the engine of syllogisms, the strange misconceptions which dictated such a sentiment have been handed down to the present day. Under the same false impression, Locke adopts somewhat similar language, asserting, that "He who shall employ all the force of his reason only in brandishing of syllogisms, will discover very little of that mass of knowledge which lies concealed in the secret recesses of nature." Mr Stewart echoes the sentiment, and declares, "The syllogistic art can be of no use in extending our knowledge of nature." Nay, even the penetrating acuteness of Dr Brown fails to perceive the fallacy, and accordingly he remarks: "The imperfection of the syllogism, as an instrument of reasoning for the acquisition of knowledge, is strikingly shown by the very examples which every writer on the subject employs to illustrate its power." These quotations from some of the most eminent writers on mental science since the days of Bacon, afford an interesting illustration of the fact, which has been often exemplified in the history of science, that fallacious opinions given forth by men who are held in high admiration, are in great danger of being received and adopted too hastily by those who succeed them in the path of scientific inquiry. The error of Bacon on this subject is the same with that of the philosophers whose language we have just quoted,—an error in reference to the real object of the syllogistic art. The syllogism is no proper instrument for the discovery of truth, and it was a fatal error of the schoolmen, that they attempted to make it available as an instrument of discovery. For ages science was thus retarded, and it was not until Galileo by his example, and Bacon by his salutary precepts, had taught men the true path of discovery, that the logic of Aristotle began to be disused in physics as well as in abstract science. It must not, however, be supposed that Aristotle and Bacon are the authors of two opposite systems. It is not so. The system of Aristotle was undoubtedly defective, in so far as, while it unfolded the principles of reasoning, it took no cognizance of the materials of reasoning. The system of Bacon, however, directs its whole effort to discover the matters of fact which are to form the ground-work of our reasoning. The former is a logic of words, the latter a logic of things. We are not, however, to imagine that Aristotle was ignorant of induction. He made use of it to a great extent; but he was ignorant of it as a method for the discovery of truth. The whole system of Aristotle was essentially a dogmatical system, and one which encouraged, as it actually led to a blind submission to the sayings of its author. He is, no doubt, regarded by the German philosophers as entitled to be regarded as the founder of the empirical sect of philosophers, who make their uniform appeal to experience. But while this was the character of his own practical researches, the effect of his dialectical system was quite the reverse. It tended to enslave the minds of men, and for ages its injurious influence in this respect was extensively felt. This was, in fact, the main cause of that profound ignorance which has given rise to the appellation of the Dark Ages. Men were at that period engaged busily in acquiring what was termed knowledge; but their knowledge was limited to dialectical subtleties, and the art of angry disputation. In the misnamed schools of philosophy, matter, and form, and existence, were the only subjects discussed, and not a single advance was made in useful knowledge. It is distressingly painful to any one whose feelings are alive to the improvement of his race, to contemplate those ages of melancholy ignorance. Questions and debates about trifles,—contests about words,—a blind subjection to the decisions of Aristotle, prevented the progress of mankind in real knowledge. And no department of inquiry suffered more from the baneful influence of the Aristotelian dialectics than theology. That noblest of all the sciences was reduced to a mass of trifling and unimportant points of debate. "How many angels could dance upon the head of a pin?"—"Does an angel, in passing from one point of space to another, require necessarily to pass through the intervening space?"—such were the topics which grave theologians keenly discussed; and in the solution of such questions as these Aristotle was appealed to with greater deference than the inspired writers themselves. The authority of Aristotle received a severe blow by the rise of the Reformation. The same events which led to the overthrow of the tyrannical power of the Church, led to the partial overthrow of the Church's idol, Aristotle. But the latter was less severely wounded in his power than the former, and for a long period after the blessed Reformation, both the Protestants and the Papists continued to venerate the opinions of the Stagyrice. Over the one he exercised an influence by the number of intricate problems which his writings suggest, affording scope for the exercise of free, expansive thought; over the latter he exercised an influence still more powerful, by the mechanical formulæ, the strict rules of reasoning, which suited well that servility of mind of which the Romanist dare not divest himself.

ARITHMETIC. See NUMERATION.

ARKITES, the descendants of Canaan who inhabited the town of Arca, in Phœnicia, at the foot of Mount Lebanon. It was sometimes denominated, in honour of the Roman emperors, "Cæsarea of Libanus." Of the Arkites nothing is now known.

ARK OF NOAH. The word translated ark by the sacred writers, when speaking of the deluge, means properly a box or chest, and accordingly the same Hebrew word is used to describe the small, floating vessel in which the infant Moses was placed, when he was cast upon the Nile. The vessel called an ark was built by Noah, at the express command of God, when the wickedness of the whole human family had become so great, that it repented the Creator that he had made man upon the earth, and he resolved to destroy the whole world with a flood, with the exception of the righteous Noah and his family, who were appointed to survive the universal deluge, and to repeople the postdiluvian earth.

No point in the sacred narrative has given rise to greater, and in many cases more trifling disputes, than the circumstances connected with the construction of this wonderful vessel. One thing is certain, that from the length of time which was occupied in building it,—one hundred and twenty years,—it must have been a work of enormous labour, and probably more than human skill. The office which the ark was intended to serve—the preservation during the deluge, of Noah, his family, and the several species of creatures—renders it likely that God did not leave his faithful servant in such a momentous crisis to the exercise of his own unaided ingenuity; but that, while Noah wrought "by faith" in this appointed work, he was guided by a wisdom far higher than his own, and accordingly, with infallible accuracy was the ark suited to accommodate and to preserve the precious freight with which it was intrusted. Accordingly, it is a deeply interesting fact, that while in our day, both in Britain and America, naval architecture has made the most astonishing progress, it is found that for strength, durability, and good sailing powers, those vessels are decidedly superior which approach to the proportionate dimensions of the ark of Noah. Thus science, as it advances, only tends to show all the more clearly the truth and inspiration of God's Word. The dimensions of the ark, as given by Moses, are three hundred cubits in length, fifty in breadth, and thirty in height; and Kircher has proved geometrically, that, taking the common cubit of a foot and a half, the ark was abundantly sufficient for all the animals supposed to be lodged in it. Snellius computes the ark to have been half an acre in area. Father Lamy shows that it was one hundred and ten feet longer than the Church of St Mary's at Paris, and sixty-four feet narrower; and if so, it must have been longer than St Paul's Church in London from west to east, and broader than that church is high in the inside, and fifty-four feet of our measure in height. Dr Arbuthnot computes it to have been eighty-one thousand and sixty-two tons.

The wood of which the ark was built is called in the Hebrew gopher-wood, and in the Septuagint square timbers. Some translate the original cedar, others pine, and others box. Pelletier prefers cedar on account of its incorruptibility, and the great abundance of it in Asia; whence Herodotus and Theophrastus relate that the kings of Egypt and Syria built whole fleets of it instead of fir. Bochart prefers the cyprus-tree. In what place Noah built his ark has given rise to much dispute. But the most probable opinion is, that it was built in Chaldea, in the territories of Babylon, where there was so great a quantity of cyprus in the groves and gardens, in the time of Alexander the Great, that that prince built a whole fleet out of it, for want of other timber. And this conjecture is confirmed by the Chaldean tradition, which makes Xisuthrus, another name for Noah, set sail from that country.

Considerable discussion has been raised as to the form of the ark. For a long period it was tacitly agreed that the most probable form was that of a boat; but Professor Robinson seems to think it must have been a large oblong floating house, in the form of a parallelogram with the roof either flat or only slightly inclined. On the arrangements of the ark Dr Candlish thus remarks, "There were rooms and different storeys in the ark, and what is called a window, or perhaps a sloping roof rising a cubit above the sides, and made of some transparent substance. There were probably also other windows in the sides—for the word rendered window, in a subsequent place, at the sixth verse of the eighth chapter, when the sending forth of the raven out of the ark is mentioned, is different from that used when it is said, in the orders given for the building of the ark, 'a window shalt thou make to it.' In that other passage, the word may denote a window on the side, while here probably it is the roof that is spoken of. There were the means, then, of distributing the inmates of the ark, and preserving order among them. And if more questions be asked, as to how untamed and savage animals could be got to live harmoniously and quietly together, let it be remembered that the same Lord who will hereafter make the wolf dwell with the lamb, and the leopard lie down with the kid—when the earth shall be as full of the knowledge of the Lord, as it then was full of the waters covering the sea—that that same Lord, who designed the ark floating on the flood to be the very type and emblem of that holy mountain of his, in all which they shall not hurt nor destroy,—that He, then, with equal ease, could both move the creatures, at Noah's command, to enter in and constrain them for a brief season to resume the peaceful nature which they had in paradise, before this creation began to groan for the sin of man,—and which are they not to have again, when creation is delivered, and paradise restored?"

ARK OF THE COVENANT. This was a chest of shittim-wood, rather more than thirty inches in breadth, the same in depth, and three feet and a-half in length. It was covered over with the purest gold, with an ornamented border on the top; on each side were two gold rings, for the staves by which it was carried, and which remained in them. The ends of these staves were drawn out so far as to touch the veil which separated the apartments. The lid of the ark was of pure gold, adorned with two figures of cherubim, so placed that their faces turned toward each other, and leaned downward toward the ark. The wings were so spread as to form a sort of seat, hence the lid was called the mercy-seat, and might be considered as a throne on which the Shechinah or Divine presence rested, while the ark itself formed, as it were, the footstool. The ark contained the golden pot that had manna, Aaron's rod, and the tables of the covenant. It was deposited in the holiest place of the tabernacle. When the Israelites passed through Jordan, on their way to the promised land, "the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground, in the midst of Jordan; and all the Israelites passed over on dry ground, until all the people were passed clean over Jordan." Josh. iii. 14-17. After remaining for some time at Gilgal, the ark was conveyed to Shiloh. It was taken by the Philistines and detained for many years at Kirjath-jearim; from which David resolved to remove it in a new manner. He accordingly had it placed upon a new cart, which was drawn by oxen; but the latter causing the ark to shake, Uzzah put forth his hand to prevent its fall, when the anger of the Lord was kindled against him, and he was instantly struck dead for his presumption. This awful judgment filled David with terror, and caused him to leave it during three months at the house of Obed-edom; it was, however, removed from thence to his palace in Jerusalem; and when Solomon had built and dedicated the temple, he there fixed it in the most holy place. 1 Chron. xv. 25-28; 1 Kings viii. 1-11. Richard Watson, in his able Biblical and Theological Dictionary, thus describes its history and uses:—

"It remained in the temple till the times of the last kings of Judah, who gave themselves up to idolatry, and even dared to place their idols in the holy temple itself. The priests, being unable to bear this profanation, took the ark and carried it from place to place, to preserve it from the hands of those impious princes. Josiah commanded them to bring it back to the sanctuary, and it was accordingly replaced. 2 Chron. xxxv. 3. What became of the ark at the destruction of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar, is a dispute among the Rabbins. Had it been carried to Babylon with the other vessels of the temple, it would, in all probability, have been brought back with them, at the close of the captivity; but that this was not the case is agreed on all hands; whence it is probable that it was destroyed with the temple.

"The ark of the covenant was, as it were, the centre of worship to all those of the Hebrew nation who served God according to the Levitical law; and not only in the temple, when they came thither to worship, but everywhere else in their dispersions through the whole world; whenever they prayed, they turned their faces towards the place where the ark stood, and directed all their devotions that way. Dan. vi. 10. Whence the author of the Book of Cosiri justly says, that the ark, with the mercy-seat and cherubim, were the foundation, root, heart, and marrow of the whole temple, and all the Levitical worship performed therein; and, therefore, had there been nothing else wanting in the second temple but the ark only, this alone would have been a sufficient reason for the old men to have wept when they remembered the first temple in which it stood, and for the saying of Haggai (ii. 3), that the second temple was as nothing, compared with the first,—so great a share had the ark of the covenant in the glory of Solomon's temple. However, the defect was supplied, as to the outward form, for in the second temple there was also an ark of the same dimensions with the first, and put in the same place; but it wanted the tables of the law, Aaron's rod, and the pot of manna; nor was there any appearance of the Divine glory over it; nor any oracles delivered from it. The only use that was made of it, was to be a representation of the former on the great day of expiation, and to be a repository of the Holy Scriptures; that is, of the original copy of that collection of them made by Ezra after the captivity, in imitation of which the Jews, in all their synagogues, have a like ark or coffer, in which they keep their Scriptures."

ARM. The whole power and resources of men are often in Scripture, by an easy image, called their arm; because on the exertion of these they depend, and by these they are qualified for the execution of their purposes. Psal. x. 15, xxxvii. 17. How forcible and full of beauty, in this point of view, is that passage, "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm!" Jer. xvii. How just the confidence of Hezekiah against Sennacherib,—"With him is an arm of flesh; but with us is the Lord our God, to help us, and to fight our battles!" 2 Chron. xxxii. 8.

It would seem to have been a custom with ancient warriors, when hotly engaged in battle, and aiming to strike an effectual blow, to make bare the arm, and this was the more easily accomplished from the loose dresses worn by the Orientals. So, in allusion to this, when some extraordinary and decisive exertion of Divine power is adverted to, it is not unusual for the sacred writers to describe it as making bare, revealing, and stretching out, the arm. Isa. lii. 10. Hence these phrases always signify some signal act of Jehovah for the destruction of his enemies, and the deliverance of his people; or for the demonstration of his truth among men. Isa. liii. 1.

But inasmuch as the power of God is usually exerted in behalf of his Church in intimate connection with that of the Church herself, we may hence understand the import of Isa. li. 9, which is the call of Zion on her God, "Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord;" which is followed by the call of God upon his people, "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion." Isa. lii. 1. See a similar idea in Phil. ii. 12, 13. Yet when, in obedient love and humble dependence, we have exerted ourselves to the utmost, what sweet propriety is there in the grateful acknowledgment, "THOU HAST WROUGHT ALL OUR WORKS IN US!" Isa. xxvi. 12.

In Eastern countries the relations of deceased persons often express their grief by cutting their naked arms with knives and daggers. To this custom the Prophet Jeremiah alludes (xlviii. 37),—"For every head shall be bald, and every beard clipped; upon all the hands shall be cuttings, and upon the loins sackcloth." This strange custom must have existed before the age of Moses; for we find him expressly prohibiting the practice: "Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead." Lev. xix. 28. And the priests of Baal, we are told, "cried aloud, and cut themselves after their manner with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them." 1 Kings xviii. 28. Nay, Calmet throws out the absurd conjecture, that "the marks of the Lord Jesus," which the Apostle Paul bore about with him, were the scars of wounds which he had inflicted upon his arms in token of his love to the Redeemer.

ARMAGEDDON, a place mentioned in the Apocalypse (xvi. 16), literally signifying the mountain of Megeddon, or Megiddo, a city situated in the great plain at the foot of Mount Carmel, where King Josiah received his mortal wound in the battle with Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt. 2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30. It is also the place where Barak overcame Sisera with his great army. Judges v. 19. At Armageddon, the three unclean spirits coming out of the dragon's mouth, are to gather together the kings of the earth to the battle of the great day of God Almighty. Rev. xvi. 13, 14.

ARMENIA, a province of Asia, comprising the modern Turcomania, and part of Persia; having Georgia on the north; Kurdistan, which was the ancient Assyria, on the south; and Asia Minor, now called Natolia, on the west. This province includes the sources of the Tigris and the Euphrates, the Araxes and Phasis; and here also the country of Eden, in which paradise was situated, is supposed to lie.

Armenia is often confounded with Aramæa, the land of Aram or Syria; but they are totally different. Armenia, which is separated from Aram by Mount Taurus, is supposed by Bochart to have been so denominated from Ar-Men, the mountainous country of Meni or Minni,—the people of which country are mentioned under this name by Jeremiah, when summoning the nations against Babylon. It was anciently divided into Armenia Major and Armenia Minor.

In ancient times, as at present, the Armenians appear to have been famous for their industry and mercantile enterprise. We find Ezekiel mentioning them as trading with Tyre when in its flourishing state (xxvii. 14):—"They of the house of Togarmah traded in thy fairs with horses, and horsemen, and mules." They are remarkable for their cultivation also, and yet it is strange that they have many customs which resemble those of the Jews. Herodotus tells us that they carried on a considerable trade in wine, which they sent down the Euphrates to Babylon. At present Armenian merchants are found dispersed over all Europe, and at one time to such an extent did they carry their mercantile enterprise, that they were in possession of nearly the whole trade of the Levant. "It would seem, that of all the Christians of Asia, the Armenians have preserved themselves the most free from Mohammedan and Papal corruptions. Part of Armenia now belonging to Persia, and part of it to the Turks, it is natural to conclude how much they must have been urged to adopt the Mohammedan creed; and it appears from Chardin (vol. ii. p. 232), that it is almost incredible to conceive the artifices that have been had recourse to by the Church of Rome to endeavour to turn them to the Catholic faith. Buchanan observes, that Armenians are to be found in every capital of Asia, where they are respected for their orderly conduct. In India they are settled in all the chief places, where they arrived many centuries before the English." We have no information as to the period when Christianity was first introduced into Armenia, but it does not appear that it was fully embraced either by the king or the people before the fourth century, and even after that period, the various revolutionary changes to which the country was subjected must have sorely tried the adherence of the people to the Christian faith. They have been successively conquered by the Saracens, the Turks, and the Persians, but still they stood firm; and although at one time, by dint of persecutions, many were gained over to the Mohammedan delusion, the great mass of the people maintained their attachment to Christianity.

The manners and customs of the Armenians scarcely differ, if at all, from those of the Turks and Persians, with the exception of their adherence to various Jewish observances. They are distinguished by superior cultivation, manners, and honesty, from the barbarians under whose yoke they live, and even from the Greeks and Jews. The cause (says the 'Encyclopædia Americana') is to be found in their creed, and in their religious union; but particularly in the BIBLE, which is freely distributed among the people by the clergy, in translations that are esteemed valuable in theological literature. The written language owes its cultivation to the translation of the Bible, begun in A.D. 411, and finished in 511. With the biblical literature of the Armenians, is connected their theological, historical, and mathematical literature; which has recently found many assiduous students in Paris.

ARMENIAN CHURCH. It was formerly considered a branch of the Greek Church, and submitted to the see of Constantinople, until the seventh century, when they withdrew from the communion of the Greek Church, in consequence of their adoption of the Monophysite tenet, that there is only one nature in Christ, or that he is both God and man, without their union in one person. This opinion had been condemned by the Council of Chalcedon. After they became an independent Church, they still retained the Episcopal form of government, but they claimed the privilege of electing their own bishops. In the fifth century, Armenia was divided into fifteen provinces, and subdivided into one hundred and ninety-one dioceses. The Church is governed by three patriarchs, the chief of whom has his residence at Echmiadzin, near Erivan. He exercises jurisdiction over Turcomania or Armenia Major. A second patriarch resides in Lesser Armenia, and a third in Georgia. The chief, or metropolitan patriarch, though elected by the bishops, must have his election confirmed by the King of Persia. He presides over forty-two archbishops, each of whom can claim the obedience of four or five suffragans. The second patriarch, who is under the authority of the first, governs the Church in Cappadocia, Cilicia, Cyprus, and Syria, and has under his jurisdiction twelve archbishops. The third, who governs the Church in Georgia, has only eight or nine suffragans. Besides these patriarchs, the Armenians have others in various countries. Thus there is one at Constantinople, another at Jerusalem, and a third in the Russian empire, all of whom own the authority of the metropolitan patriarch.

The Armenians acknowledge the Nicene, and daily use the Apostles' Creed. They are Monophysites, so far as to believe that there is only one nature in Christ, but they differ from the sect which bears that name in many important respects, and hold no communion with that branch of the Monophysites who are termed Jacobites, nor with the Copts or Abyssinians. The following detailed account of the tenets of the Armenian Church is quoted from the 'Scripture Gazetteer':—"They believe that our Saviour descended into hell, and liberated all the souls of the damned by the grace and favour of his glorious presence; and that this liberation was not for ever, nor by a plenary pardon or remission, but only till the end of the world, when they will return to their former place of torment. They hold that neither the souls nor bodies of any saints or prophets are in heaven, except the Virgin Mary and the Prophet Elijah, and that they will not be admitted into heaven until the day of judgment; yet, in imitation of the Greek and Roman Churches, they invoke those saints with prayers, do them reverence, adore their pictures and images, and burn to them lamps and candles. The worship is conducted after the Eastern manner, by prostrating their bodies, and thrice kissing the ground. When they first enter the church they uncover, and cross themselves three times, after which they cover their heads, and sit cross-legged on carpets. The greater part of the public service is performed before day-light in the morning. They are strictly attentive to the vigils of the Church festivals; and on Saturday evenings they all resort to the churches, and perfume their houses with incense when they return home. In their monasteries, the whole Psalter of David is read every twenty-four hours; but in the cities and churches it is divided into eight portions, and each portion into eight parts, at the end of each of which the Gloria Patri is said. The Armenians acknowledge seven sacraments, as does the Romish Church, and administer baptism and the eucharist in a peculiar manner. They practise immersion, which they consider most essential to the sacrament. After baptism, the enyrop or chrism is applied, and the forehead, eyes, ears, breast, palms of the hands, and soles of the feet, are anointed with consecrated oil in the form of the cross. They also administer the eucharist to the child, with which they only rub its lips. The child is then carried home by the godfather, accompanied by the music of drums and trumpets. The mother does not go to church for forty days after delivery. The eucharist is administered only on Sundays and festivals. They steep the bread in the wine, and thus the communicant receives both kinds together,—a form different from the Greek, the Roman, and the Protestant Churches. The rites and ceremonies of the Armenian Church, in short, greatly resemble those of the Greek. Their liturgies are nearly the same, but the fasts they observe are more numerous, and kept with greater austerity. Their monastic discipline is in high repute, and is extremely severe. The clergy are allowed to marry once, but the patriarchs and bishops must remain in a state of strict celibacy."

ARMENIAN VERSION. At the time when Christianity was first introduced into Armenia, there being no written language used in the country, the Scriptures were read in the Peschito, or old Syriac version. In the beginning of the fifth century an Armenian alphabet was invented by a priest named Meisrob. He proceeded to translate the Scriptures, founding his labours upon the Alexandrian Septuagint. Michaelis speaks highly of this version; but it has undergone considerable alteration, to accommodate it to the old Syriac version, and latterly, to the Latin Vulgate. The Armenian version has been attributed to Chrysostom, but probably without foundation.

ARMHOLES. We find the Prophet Ezekiel (xiii. 18) declaring, "Woe to the women that sew pillows to all armholes," or elbows, as it is in the margin. In using this expression, the prophet probably alludes to a custom which exists in Eastern countries, of placing along the wall, on the rich carpets which cover the floors of their apartments, a range of narrow beds or mattresses, with velvet or damask bolsters. On these couches the guests recline, resting their elbows upon the soft bolsters; thus enjoying a luxurious ease, which the prophet refers to as a sinful indulgence. Roberts, the traveller in the East, informs us that "rich people have a great variety of pillows and bolsters to support them in various positions. Some are long and round, and are stuffed till they are quite hard; whilst others are short and soft, to suit their convenience in taking repose."

ARMIES. See ARMY.

ARMINIUS (JAMES), or HERMANN, the reputed founder of the sect of Arminians, or Remonstrants, was born at Oudewater, in Holland, in 1560. He studied at Utrecht and in the University of Leyden, where he so distinguished himself, that the magistrates of Amsterdam sent him, at the public expense, to finish his studies in theology at Geneva, under the famous Theodore Beza. During his residence at Geneva, he imbibed the doctrines of Peter Ramus, the first writer who openly dared to controvert the opinions of Aristotle. It was accounted a grave offence to maintain, much more to teach, as Arminius did, the philosophy of Ramus; and he found it necessary to quit Geneva, and retire to Basle. There he was treated with the highest consideration, and his public lectures were numerous attended. The Faculty of Theology offered him the degree of Doctor in Divinity, which, however, he declined. After returning to Geneva, where he remained for a short time, he visited Italy, chiefly for the purpose of attending the lectures of a celebrated professor at Padua. On his return he was ordained minister at Amsterdam in 1588, where he soon acquired a high reputation as a preacher and a learned divine. Such was the extent of his theological learning and his acknowledged ability, that he was selected as a fit person to refute a work which had appeared, in which the supralapsarian doctrine of predestination was attacked by some of the ministers at Delft. It so happened, however, that on examining the subject, he became a convert to the very doctrines which he was appointed to refute, and even carried his opinions further than the ministers of Delft had done. He now condemned the doctrine of absolute decrees, and particular election. He maintained that Christ died, not for the elect alone, but for all men without exception; and that none have been chosen to eternal life but those who God foresaw would believe and obey the gospel. This change in the opinions of Arminius took place in 1591, and, as might have been expected, excited the most violent commotion. He was branded as an apostate from the Calvinistic doctrine; and it was only by the superiority of his talents, the unblemished excellence of his private character, and his eloquence as a preacher, that he maintained his footing in Amsterdam. At length, after labouring in that city for fifteen years, he was elected Professor of Theology at Leyden, as successor to Francis Junius, in 1603. Thus occupying an influential position, Arminius inculcated his peculiar opinions with the utmost earnestness upon his pupils. The flame of controversy now burst forth, not in Leyden alone, but throughout the whole of Holland. His colleague at Leyden, Francis Gomar, a man of talent and of polemic power, defended the Calvinistic system, and attacked violently the heterodox tenets of Arminius. Various attempts were made by the States to allay the conflicting elements, but in vain,—the storm of angry disputation raged with tremendous fury. Pamphlets, polemic treatises, public lectures, open disputes between the rival parties,—all were at work in this scene of hottest warfare. At length, worn out by the turbulence of the period, distressed by the calumnies and misrepresentations to which he was exposed, and his health undermined by the intense application and incessant labours which the controversy entailed upon him, Arminius died on the 19th October 1609.

It is impossible to peruse the works of Arminius, without being impressed with the conviction, that he was a man of sincere piety, of decided ability, and extensive information. The opinions which he advanced in opposition to the Calvinistic doctrines, were erroneous and unscriptural; but we cannot deny to the man and the divine those excellent qualities which even his bitterest opponents must admit that he possessed.

ARMINIANISM, strictly speaking, is that system of religious doctrine which was taught by Arminius, Professor of Divinity in the University of Leyden. (See ARMINIUS.) If, therefore, we would learn precisely what Arminianism is, we must have recourse to those writings in which that divine himself has stated and expounded his peculiar tenets.

This, however, will by no means give us an accurate idea of that which, since his time, has been usually denominated Arminianism. On examination, it will be found that, in many important particulars, those who have called themselves Arminians, or have been accounted such by others, differ far more widely from the nominal head and founder of their sect, than he himself did from Calvin, and other doctors of Geneva. There are, indeed, certain points with regard to which he has been strictly and uniformly followed by almost all his pretended adherents; but there are others of equal, or of greater importance, dogmatically insisted on by them, to which he unquestionably never gave his sanction, and even appears to have been decidedly hostile.

Arminius ought not, therefore, to be charged with all the erroneous opinions which those calling themselves Arminians, have from time to time maintained. Arminianism, properly so called, differs from Calvinism in reference to the doctrines of unconditional election, particular redemption, and other points necessarily connected with these. The Calvinists hold that God, of his own free, sovereign mercy, elected some to everlasting life; the Arminians, on the other hand, do not deny election, but they deny that it is absolute and unconditional, maintaining that God elected those who he foreknew would be possessed of that faith and holiness to which salvation is annexed in the gospel scheme. The Calvinists maintain that Christ died for the elect only, and that his death is therefore available for none other; the Arminians hold that Christ died for all men, plainly and literally. The Calvinists assert that the elect are constrained, by the irresistible power of Divine grace, to accept the overtures of mercy, and to receive Christ as their Saviour; the Arminians contend that the grace of God is offered, but that it may be resisted by man, and rendered ineffectual. The doctrine of the perseverance of the saints was left unresolved by Arminius, but his followers avow their belief that saints do not necessarily persevere in a state of grace, but may fall from it after they have been renewed by the Spirit of God. Such are the chief points on which Arminius himself differed from the Calvinists. His followers, however, soon after his death, began to avow opinions which their leader, had he lived, would have reprobated. In regard to the corruption of man, the doctrine of justification, of the righteousness of Christ, of the nature of faith, of the province of good works, of the necessity and operations of grace, they differed widely from Arminius. It is impossible, indeed, to delineate the various changes which Arminianism has assumed, or to describe it as it at present exists. In many of its aspects Arminianism has adopted the tenets of the Socinians and Pelagians.

In the next year after the death of Arminius, that is, in 1610, his followers and partizans presented a remonstrance against certain points of Calvinism, from which they received the name of Remonstrants. Indeed the chief differences were reduced to the famous FIVE POINTS; which are thus stated by Moshem:—

1. "That God has not fixed the future state of mankind by an absolute, unconditional decree; but determined from all eternity to bestow salvation on those who he foresaw would persevere unto the end in their faith in Jesus Christ, and to inflict everlasting punishment on those who should continue in their unbelief, and resist unto the end his Divine succours." See Ezek. xviii. 30–32; Acts xvii. 24–30; Matt. xxiii. 37; Rom. ii. 4, 5, v. 18; 1 Tim. ii. 1–4; 2 Pet. i. 10, iii. 9.

2. "That Christ, by his death and sufferings, made an atonement for the sins of all mankind in general, and of every individual in particular. That, however, none but those who believe in him can be partakers of the Divine benefit." See 1 John ii. 2; John iii. 16, 17; Heb. ii. 9; 1 Cor. viii. 11.

3. "That true faith cannot proceed from the exercise of our natural faculties and powers, nor from the force and operation of free-will; since man, in consequence of his natural corruption, is incapable either of thinking or doing any good; and that, therefore, it is necessary, to his conversion and salvation, that he be regenerated and renewed by the operations of the Holy Ghost, which is the gift of God through Jesus Christ."

4. "That this Divine grace, or energy of the Holy Ghost, which heals the disorders of a corrupt nature, begins, advances, and brings to perfection, every thing that can be called good in man; and that, consequently, all good works, without exception, are to be attributed to God alone, and to the operation of his grace; that, nevertheless, this grace is offered to all, and does not force men to act against their inclinations; but may be resisted, and rendered ineffectual, by the perverse will of the impenitent sinner." Isa. i. 16; Deut. x. 16; Eph. iv. 22.

5. "That they who are united to Christ by faith, are thereby furnished with abundant strength, and with succours sufficient to enable them to triumph over the seduction of Satan, and the allurements of sin and temptation; but that the question, 'Whether such may fall from their faith, and forfeit finally this state of grace,' has not yet been resolved with sufficient perspicuity; and must, therefore, be yet more carefully examined, by an attentive study of what the Holy Scriptures have declared in relation to this important point." Heb. vi. 4–6; 2 Pet. ii. 20, 21; Luke xxi. 35; 2 Pet. iii. 17.

The following remarks on the Five Arminian Points, are from the pen of the Rev. Dr Alexander, of Princeton Theological Seminary, an eminent American divine.

In these five articles the Arminian theory is not fully developed. The object was, to present the new opinions in the most plausible dress, and in that form which would seem to deviate the least from the public standards of the Belgic Church. But it was alleged by their opponents, that the real opinions of the Remonstrants were not fully expressed in these articles; and that, under the cover of orthodox expressions, great and dangerous errors lay concealed. And that they were not mistaken in these views became evident in the conferences which took place between the leading theologians of both parties, at the Hague, and at other places; and more evidently from the APOLOGY for the Arminians, published after the meeting of the Synod of Dort, by Episcopius, the leader of the party. In this document they avow and defend the opinions charged upon them by the Contra-Remonstrants, and which have since been known under the name of Arminianism.

The cardinal point of difference between Calvinists and Arminians is, Whether the reason why one man is saved and another not, is owing to the grace of God or to the free-will of man? All the other points of difference may easily be traced up to this one. For although the Arminians acknowledge the necessity of grace, which they make universal, yet they make the efficacy of that grace to depend on the human will; whereas Calvinists maintain, that the grace of God, without violence to human liberty, is efficacious to subdue the stubborn will, and to render men cordially willing to be saved from their sins in the way of the gospel. If in this they are right, they cannot but be right in their views of the doctrines of election, of redemption, and final perseverance. Whereas, if the Arminian view be correct, the difference in the final destiny of men is not owing to any purpose to save some and pass by others, but to the different improvement of the common grace afforded to all men. And if the final result depends, in the first instance, upon the will of man, so it will afterwards; consequently he who believes and repents to-day, may become an unbeliever and impenitent man to-morrow. However Arminians may differ among themselves in other matters, they all agree in this cardinal doctrine of their system. They, furthermore, all hold that there is no election of grace but what depends on the foresight of faith and holiness in the creature; that Christ died equally for all men, and equally intended the salvation of all men; that in conversion the effect depends upon the right improvement of the grace afforded; and that by the exercise of the same free-will by which the gospel was embraced, the true believer may turn away from God, and become as bad, or worse, than before his conversion. And as, according to the above view, the whole Arminian system depends on the doctrine that the will of man must first act and give consent, before common grace can become efficacious,—so that the first right choice is not produced by the effectual operation of grace, but precedes it,—it necessarily follows, that their views of human depravity are different from those of Calvinists; for while the latter believe that man's death in sin is so complete that he, until renewed, has no ability of will (see INABILITY and WILL) to do any thing spiritually good, the Arminian holds, that, under the suasive influence of truth, he may choose to embrace the gospel, and thus render efficacious that grace which can only operate by his consent.

The chief difficulty in the Arminian theory is, to reconcile it with the language of Scripture, the nature of Christian prayer and thanksgiving, and with apparent facts. For example, if God had equally intended the salvation of the whole human race, would he not have equally furnished all men, in all ages, with the gospel, and other means of grace? Can it be said with truth, that sufficient grace has been granted to all the heathen to bring them to salvation? And the mere possibility of the salvation of some of them, if it should be conceded, is not enough. According to the principles of Arminianism, all men should enjoy equal advantages; or at least salvation should not be so improbable and difficult as it is to a vast majority of the human family. Various plans of evading this difficulty have been resorted to, none of which are sufficient to render the acknowledged fact consistent with the doctrine of universal and sufficient grace. The same difficulty is, in part, found to exist as it relates to the conversion of many who do enjoy the means of grace. If conversion be produced by moral suasion, which the sinner has the ability to comply with or reject, why is it called regeneration, and why is it that often the amiable and moral are not converted, while the profligate, and even the blaspheming infidel, are made the subjects of grace? When we examine particular cases of Christian experience, we cannot easily avoid the conclusion, that grace is sovereign and efficacious, and that the stubborn will of man uniformly resists, until overcome by the sweetly constraining power of God.

Arminianism, although introduced into the Reformed Churches by James Arminius, did not originate with him. The very same views, in substance, were maintained by the Semi-Pelagians, and afterwards by the Molinists and Jesuits in the Romish Church. It is a very remarkable fact, that the reformers seem to have unanimously agreed in their opinions respecting the efficacy of grace, and the impotency of the will in relation to holy acts. This is evident from all their early creeds and confessions, as well as from their writings. It is, doubtless, true, however, that the followers of Arminius, after his death, deviated much further from the common doctrines of the Reformation than he did; but this is what commonly takes place in all similar cases. The man who first calls in question received opinions, does not wish to appear to recede too far from the creed of the Christian community with which he has been connected; and all the necessary consequences of his opinions may not be obvious at first; but by discussion the system in all its bearings becomes manifest; and a man's disciples are found to be more ready to extend his principles to all their legitimate consequences than he was. And in regard to all errors, it has been remarked, that their tendency is downwards; the adoption of one error commonly prepares the way for another still more erroneous. Thus the leaders of the Arminian party in Holland approximated much nearer to Unitarianism after the Synod of Dort than they had done before, and professed, and publicly taught, doctrines which, it is believed, Arminius would have rejected with horror.

The decision of the Synod of Dort, called to consider and find a remedy for the dissensions and disturbances of the Church, was unfavourable to the doctrine of the Arminians on every one of the points of difference; and, in consequence, they were deposed from all ecclesiastical offices, and from the mastership of all schools and colleges in the United Provinces; and by the States-General of Holland severe laws were passed against them, by which all who refused submission were condemned to banishment, fines, or imprisonment. Such persecution on account of religious opinion, is now, by the common consent of all Protestants, condemned as unjust and tyrannical; but we should not judge of the acts of a former age by the liberal sentiments of toleration which now happily prevail. All the reformers, and most of their immediate successors, conscientiously believed that heretics ought to be coerced by the arm of civil power. And it should be remembered, that in many places, while the Arminians were favoured by the civil authorities, they treated the orthodox with insolence, and excited disturbances which the civil magistrate was not always able to suppress.

At present there are multitudes who profess Arminian doctrines, in whole or in part, and some large Christian denominations who maintain and propagate the whole system. These, however, differ from each other in minor points, while they agree in all the leading doctrines taught by Arminius, and strenuously oppose whatever bears the peculiar stamp of Calvinism, which they load with obloquy. For the proceedings of the Synod of Dort, see the article DORT.

ARMOUR-BEARER. This was a person who attended upon a warrior, for the purpose of carrying his arms. Both kings and generals in Eastern countries had attendants of this kind, who were generally selected from the bravest of the soldiers. The Jews suppose that the armour-bearer of Saul was Doeg the Edomite, who had been appointed to that office on account of the readiness with which he obeyed the command of Saul to put to death the priests of Nob.

ARMS. The arms of the Hebrews may be distinguished into two kinds, the defensive and the offensive. In both cases they were generally composed of brass, though in some cases of iron. The head of Goliath's spear is said to have weighed six hundred shekels of iron. 1 Sam. xvii. 7. The utmost attention was paid by the Hebrew soldiers to the cleanliness and good order of their arms. Thus we often read in Scripture of furbishing the spear, and making bright the arrows. Particular care, however, was bestowed upon their shields, which they scoured, polished and anointed with oil, to render them smooth and slippery. Hence the exhortation of the prophet, "Arise, ye princes, and anoint the shield." Isaiah xxi. 5. The equipment of a Roman soldier is thus described by Josephus, when speaking of the siege of Jerusalem, "Their infantry are armed with breast-plates and helmets, and they carry a sword on each side. The sword they wear on the left side is by far the longest, for that on the right is not above a span's length. The select body of infantry which forms part of the general's life-guard, is armed with lances and bucklers, but the rest of the phalanx have a spear and a long shield; besides which they bear a saw, a basket, a spade, and a hatchet; they also carry with them a cord, a sickle, a chain, and provisions for several days." Each weapon will be described particularly and in detail under its own separate head.

ARMY. The enormous amount of soldiers composing an Eastern army is sometimes almost incredible. Thus six hundred thousand men, marched out of Egypt to take possession of the land of Canaan. Our surprise, however, is considerably diminished when we remember that in oriental countries the profession of a soldier is a compulsory employment; and in the Mosaic code, we find every man of twenty years old and upward described as "he that goes forth to war." And that the law in this respect was rigorously put in force, we may learn from the melancholy circumstances attending the military execution of the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead. There are two memorable instances on record where the whole people took the field. Judg. xx. 11; 1 Sam. xi. 7. The army among the Hebrews was usually called the Host, and was commanded by an officer styled the Captain of the Host. It consisted of the infantry, the cavalry, and the chariots. The armies of several of the Hebrew kings were very large. That of David amounted to 288,000 men, that of Solomon included 1400 chariots, and 12,000 horsemen; that of Jehoshaphat amounted to 1,160,000 men, and that of Jeroboam to 800,000.

ARNON, a river frequently mentioned in Scripture (Deut. ii. 24, &c.), and which rises in the mountains of Gilead or Moab, and runs by a north-west course into the eastern part of the Dead Sea. It is now called Wady Mod-jeb, and divides the province of Belka from that of Kerek, as it formerly divided the kingdoms of the Moabites and Amorites. On the banks of this stream, a decisive battle was fought between the Israelites under Moses, and the Amorites under Sihon, the result of which was the total defeat of that heathen prince. This river was the boundary of Moab in early times.

AROER, a city belonging to the tribe of Gad, situated on the brook Arnon. It was originally in the possession of the Moabites, until it was taken from them by Sihon, king of the Amorites. It is represented now by the ruins of Araayr. The city stood not on the immediate banks of the Arnon, but on the edge of the high precipice by which the valley of the Arnon is overhung. This is one of the high places of Arnon, to which allusion is thus made in Numb. xxi. 28:—"For there is a fire gone out of Heshbon, a flame from the city of Sihon: it hath consumed Ar of Moab, and the lords of the high places of Arnon."

ARPAD or ARPHAD, a city and district in Syria, usually combined with Hamath. Both of these places are mentioned as having been subdued by Sennacherib, king of Assyria, Isa. x. 9, Jer. xlix. 23. It was destroyed by the Chaldeans, but soon rebuilt.

ARPHAXAD, son of Shem, and father of Salah; born A.M. 1648, one year after the deluge, died A.M. 2086, aged four hundred and thirty-eight years. Gen. xi. 12. Gesenius speaks of this word as not only the name of an individual, but as denoting at the same time a people, or region of country. This eminent German Orientalist seems inclined to favour the conjecture of Bochart, that it is the province Arrapachitis, in Northern Assyria near Armenia, the primitive country of the Chaldeans.

ARRHABONARII, a sect who held that the eucharist is neither the real flesh and blood of Christ, nor yet the sign of them, but only the pledge or earnest thereof.

ARROW. (See ARMS.) The arrows of the Hebrews were at first made of a sharp reed; afterwards they employed light wood with a head of brass or iron, which was commonly barbed. From Job vi. 4, the arrows would appear to have been sometimes dipped in poison, though in no other passage of Scripture is there any allusion to such a practice. Some commentators, indeed, think that when Paul speaks of the "fiery darts," he is alluding to poisoned arrows; but it is more probable that he refers to another practice, which was sometimes adopted in Eastern countries,—that of arming the arrows with combustible materials, which scattered fire in the ranks of the enemy. Divination with arrows was a method of presaging future events, practised by the ancients. Ezekiel (xxi. 21) informs us, that Nebuchadnezzar, putting himself at the head of his armies, to march against Zedekiah, king of the Jews, and against the king of the Ammonites, stood at the parting of two ways, to mingle his arrows together in a quiver, in order to divine from thence which way he should march. Jerome, Theodoret, and the modern commentators after them, believe that this prince took several arrows, and upon each of them wrote the name of the king, town, or province which he was to attack; for example, upon one, Jerusalem; upon another, Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites; and upon another, Egypt, &c. After having put these into a quiver, he shook them together, and then drew them out; and the arrow which was drawn was thought to declare the will of the gods to attack first that city, province, or kingdom, with whose name it was inscribed.

Della Valle, quoted by Paxton, mentions another mode of divination by arrows:—"He saw at Aleppo a Mohammedan, who caused two persons to sit upon the ground, one opposite to the other, and gave them four arrows into their hands, which both of them held with their points downward, and, as it were, in two right lines, united one to the other. Then a question being put to him about any business, he fell to murmur his enchantments, and thereby caused the said four arrows of their own accord to unite their points together in the midst (though he that held them stirred not his hand), and, according to the future event of the matter, those of the right side were placed over those of the left, or on the contrary." Some think that the arrows were cast into the air, and the inquirer proceeded in the direction to which the arrow inclined in its descent. D'Herbelot, quoted by Jamieson, gives still another mode of divining by arrows, which prevailed among the Arabs:—"The ancient idolatrous Arabs used a sort of lots, which were called lots by arrows. These arrows were without heads or feathers; they were three in number; upon one of them was written, 'Command me, Lord;' upon the second, 'Forbid, or prevent, Lord.' The third arrow was blank. When any one wanted to determine on a course of action, he went with a present to the diviner (who was the chief priest of the temple), who drew one of his arrows from his bag, and if the arrow of 'command' appeared, he immediately set about the affair; if that of prohibition appeared, he deferred the execution of his enterprise for a whole year; when the blank arrow came out, he was to draw again. The Arabs consulted these arrows in all their affairs, particularly their warlike expeditions." The word arrow is often used in Scripture metaphorically, to denote some of the most dreadful of natural evils. Thus, "When I shall send upon them the evil arrows of famine" (Ezek. v. 16); and, "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day." Psal. xci. 5. In Psal. xlv. 5, the gospel is spoken of under the figure of arrows,—"Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies." The words of wicked men are called "arrows" in Scripture; "their teeth" are said to be "spears and arrows;" "their tongue is an arrow shot out;" and the false witness is "a sharp arrow."

ARSENAL. There is no appearance in Scripture of arsenals or armouries having been used by the Hebrews during the earlier period of their history, or, indeed, until the time of David, when "the shields of mighty men" are said to have been hung in the tower of David. Again, in the reign of Solomon, three hundred golden shields were deposited in the house of the forest of Lebanon. The same king seems to have had a naval arsenal at Ezion-Geber on the Red Sea, and established magazines of arms in all the fortified cities of Judah. 2 Chron. xi. 12:—"And in every several city he put shields and spears, and made them exceeding strong, having Judah and Benjamin on his side." Both Uzziah and Hezekiah made stores of arms of all sorts. At a late era of the Jewish history, we find Jonathan and Simon Maccabeus in possession of arsenals or magazines of weapons both offensive and defensive, which they had carefully collected, not only by plundering their enemies on the field of battle, but also by employing their own workmen to forge them. Thus well supplied with ammunition and large stores of arms well kept and ready for use, the Jews contrived to maintain their ground amid the constant jealousies and threatenings and frequent invasions of their numerous and powerful enemies. The whole history of the Jews is one continued narrative of wars and contentions, and to be prepared against all hazards, they appear to have been at all times provided with well-furnished arsenals. Such precautions were rendered necessary at almost every period of the Jewish history, from the annoyance to which that people were constantly subjected by the surrounding nations.

ARTAXERXES, or AHASUERUS, a king of Persia, the husband of Esther, who, in the opinion of the learned Usher and Calmet, was the Darius of profane writers. See AHASUERUS.

ARTAXERXES, a name given by Ezra to the Magus, called, by Justin, Oropastes; by Herodotus, Smerdis; by Æschylus, Mardus; and by Ctesias, Sphendardates. After the death of Cambyses, he usurped the government of Persia, pretending to be Smerdis, son of Cyrus, whom Cambyses had put to death. This is the Artaxerxes who wrote to his governors beyond the Euphrates, signifying, that having received their advices relating to the Jews, he required them to forbid the Jews from rebuilding Jerusalem. Thus, from A.M. 3483, the Jews did not dare to forward the repairs of the city walls, till 3550, when Nehemiah obtained permission to rebuild them from Artaxerxes Longimanus. Neh. i., ii.

ARTAXERXES LONGIMANUS is supposed by Dr Prideaux to be the Ahasuerus of Esther. He was the son of Xerxes, and grandson of Darius Hystaspes, and reigned in Persia from A.M. 3531 to 3579. He permitted Ezra, with all those inclined to follow him, to return into Judea, A.M. 3537. Ezra vii. 8. Afterwards, Nehemiah also obtained leave to return, and to build the walls and gates of Jerusalem, A.M. 3550. Neh. i. 11. From this year chronologers reckon the beginning of Daniel's seventy weeks. Dan. xi. 29. These are weeks of years, and make four hundred and ninety years.

ARTEMAS. Very little is known concerning either the life or death of this individual. He appears to have been a disciple of the Apostle Paul, by whom he was despatched to Crete, in room of Titus (iii. 12.) From the office assigned to him, he must have been held in esteem by the apostle. Some think that he was one of the apostle's scribes.

ARTEMONITES, a denomination in the third century ; so called from Artemon, who taught that, at the birth of the man Christ, a certain Divine energy united itself to him. He was a Unitarian, of the same principles as Theodotus, Paul of Samosata, and the modern Socinians.

ARTICLES, LAMBETH. The Lambeth Articles were so called because drawn up at Lambeth Palace, under the eye, and with the assistance, of Archbishop Whitgift, Bishop Bancroft, Bishop Vaughan, and other eminent dignitaries of the Church. That the reader may judge how Calvinistic the clergy were under the reign of Queen Elizabeth, we shall here insert them :—"1. God hath from eternity predestinated certain persons to life, and hath reprobated certain persons unto death. 2. The moving or efficient cause of predestination unto life is not the foresight of faith, or of perseverance, or of good works, or of any thing that is in the persons predestinated ; but the alone will of God's good pleasure. 3. The predestinati are a pre-determined and certain number, which can neither be lessened nor increased. 4. Such as are not predestinated to salvation shall inevitably be condemned on account of their sins. 5. The true, lively, and justifying faith, and the Spirit of God justifying, is not extinguished, doth not utterly fail, doth not vanish away in the elect, either finally or totally. 6. A true believer, that is, one who is endued with justifying faith, is certified by the full assurance of faith that his sins are forgiven, and that he shall be everlastingly saved by Christ. 7. Saving grace is not allowed, is not imparted, is not granted to all men, by which they may be saved if they will. 8. No man is able to come to Christ, unless it be given him, and unless the Father draw him ; and all men are not drawn by the Father, that they may come to his Son. 9. It is not in the will or power of every man to be saved." What gave occasion to the framing these Articles was this :—Some persons had distinguished themselves at the University of Cambridge by opposing predestination. Alarmed at the opinions that were vented, the above-mentioned archbishop, with others, composed these Articles, to prevent the belief of a contrary doctrine. These, when completed, were sent down to Cambridge, to which the scholars were strictly enjoined to conform.

ARTICLES OF FAITH. Every attentive reader of the Bible cannot fail to be struck with the entire absence from it of any thing approaching to the appearance of a regular systematic treatise. Principles the most important are scattered, in an apparently incidental and irregular manner, throughout the various books of which the Sacred Scriptures consist ; and hence the importance, nay, the absolute necessity, of various Churches gleaning from the Bible those grand truths which form what divines call the credenda, or things to be believed. This, indeed, has been the practice from the earliest ages, as is evident from the "Apostles' Creed," the "Apostolical Constitutions," and other similar writings, down to the modern formularies and confessions of faith. Nor have the articles of faith, as exhibited by different Churches, and at different periods, been always the same. Innumerable circumstances have tended to modify the aspect which creeds and articles have assumed. On this subject Dr Welsh remarks, in his 'Elements of Church History :—"While the essential truths of the gospel, as objects of saving faith, have continued the same in all periods of the Church, their scientific form has constantly varied, being determined by the personal character and views of individuals, as affected by the condition of society at the time when they flourished, and the systems of philosophy which then prevailed. There is nothing which proceeds from the hands of man, in reference to the Scriptures, which is not more or less tinged by one or other of the particulars which have been mentioned. We find the topics, the form, and the expression of creeds and confessions even of the true Church, in successive eras, affected, or in a great measure determined, by the errors against which it was necessary to guard the faithful, and by the controversies which prevailed ; and the influence of the spirit of the different ages, and of the personal characters of individuals, is often, also, perceptible in matters of doctrine, worship, and government. There is nothing in any human system that has not been affected by preceding events and opinions, and what often appears as the calm and unbiassed dictate of all minds, has been nothing more than a compromise between contending opinions." It is wonderful, indeed, that amid the many disturbing elements which the circumstances of different Churches and individuals present, the various articles of faith which have from time to time been selected, should be so similar in their appearance as they actually are. The grand cardinal truths of the Bible are maintained, with few exceptions, by the Churches of Christendom ; and while one Church attaches greater prominence to one truth, or set of truths, and another Church to another, their creeds and formularies are seldom, on a careful inspection, found to differ so widely as at first sight we are apt to imagine. Nor does the exhibition of articles of faith supersede the use of the Sacred Scriptures. On the contrary, it is only by Scripture that the truth of these uninspired compositions can be proved. "To the Church," as Archbishop Whately well observes, "has her all-wise Founder left the office of teaching, to the Scriptures that of proving, the Christian doctrines : to the Scriptures he has left the delineation of Christian principles ; to each Church the application of these principles, in their symbols or articles of religion, in their forms of worship, and in their ecclesiastical regulations." The practical value of creeds and confessions is a matter which has been placed, by the experience of ages, almost beyond the reach of doubt, as affording a compendious, and therefore more impressive and practical view of the leading points of Christian doctrine ; and besides, as preventing Christians themselves from being tossed about with every wind of doctrine. Instead, however, of such a simple, condensed statement being given by the early founders of Christianity, as might naturally have been expected, they have apparently, as with one consent, united in withholding it. The wisdom of adopting such a course, however, may easily be discerned. By laying down grand general principles by which Christians were themselves to regulate the minute details of religious worship and discipline, ample scope has been given to the diversities of opinion and varied modes of feeling existing among men, while the main doctrines and principles of the Christian system were left untouched. Had Christianity been a system of mere local application, there might have been no difficulty in laying down an established arrangement of worship and discipline similar to that of the Jews ; but being intended to be preached to every creature under heaven, it was fitting that the prominent landmarks having been set up, the minor details should be left to accommodate themselves to the circumstances and local peculiarities of every particular Church or nation. Even the few forms which have been appointed of God, have been sadly abused for purposes of superstition, and it were better far to disown all subjection to human creeds and confessions, however valuable in themselves, than to view them, like the Romanists, with extravagant admiration and regard,—as superior in authority even to the Word of the unerring Jehovah. —CONFESSIONS.

ARTICLES OF PERTH. James VI., on his accession to the throne of England, at the death of Elizabeth, set himself gradually to approximate the Church of Scotland to that of England. His attempts were met with the most determined resistance on the part of the true Presbyterians of Scotland. At length he succeeded, by a decisive effort, in introducing Prelacy into his northern dominions, and having succeeded in one part of his project,—the appointment of bishops in the Church of Scotland,—he resolved to take steps for bringing the rites and observances of the Church into closer conformity with that of England. For the accomplishment of this favourite design, and when he conceived that all was ripe for its fulfilment, he summoned a General Assembly to be holden at Perth, on the 25th of August 1618. By the previous arrangements of the crafty monarch, an Assembly was obtained completely subservient to his purposes. As the result of its deliberations, The Five Articles of Perth, as they are usually called, were carried by a majority. These Articles were as follows:—I. That the Lord's supper should be received in a kneeling posture, and not sitting, as had been the practice in the Scottish churches. II. That in extreme cases, the communion might be administered in private. III. That baptism also might be administered in private. IV. That the episcopal rite of confirmation should be observed. V. That Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, and Pentecost, should be observed as holidays. Such were the famous Articles by which James proposed to subvert the Presbyterian Church of Scotland; and as they had been passed by a subservient General Assembly, and had thus received the sanction of the ecclesiastical authorities of the country, the next object of the monarch was, to procure for them the ratification of the civil power. Nor was it difficult to obtain this. In a few weeks they were ratified by the privy council. The Scottish parliament was summoned to meet at Edinburgh, on the 25th of July 1621. In vain did the faithful Presbyterian ministers remonstrate. The Articles were ratified, in obedience to the king; not however, without such violent opposition that the motion for their ratification passed by a very small majority. That was a gloomy day for Scotland, and by a curious coincidence, the aspect of the heavens was in harmony with the melancholy nature of the event by which the day was signalized. But we cannot better describe the circumstances to which we refer than by quoting the eloquent language of Dr Hetherington, in his interesting 'History of the Church of Scotland:'—"The morning had been lowering and gloomy, and as the day advanced the gloom waxed deeper and deeper, as the gathering clouds seemed to concentrate their huge voluminous masses around and over the city. At the very moment when the Marquis of Hamilton, the lord high commissioner, rose to give the formal ratification to the acts, by touching them with the sceptre, a keen blue flash of forked lightning blazed through the murky gloom, followed instantaneously by another, and another, so dazzlingly bright as to blind the startled and terrified parliament, in the act of consummating its guilty deed. Three terrific peals of thunder followed in quick succession, appalling the trembling conclave, as if the thunder-voice of heaven were uttering denunciations of vengeance against the insulters of the dread Majesty on high. Then descended hailstones of prodigious magnitude, and sheeted rains so heavy and continuous as to imprison for an hour and a half the parliament which had perpetrated this act of treason against the King of kings, by subjecting his Church to an earthly monarch. This dark and disastrous day was long known in Scotland by the designation of 'BLACK SATURDAY,'—'black with man's guilt, and with the frowns of heaven.'"

ARTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. These Articles were chiefly founded upon a body of forty-two Articles, compiled under the authority of Archbishop Cranmer, in the reign of Edward VI. On the 12th of January 1563, a convocation was held, in the course of whose sittings King Edward's Articles were carefully considered and revised. As the result of this revision, the whole formulary was reduced to Thirty-Nine Articles, expressed in more perspicuous and scriptural language. These Articles having been adopted by the convocation, were confirmed by royal authority. They were ratified anew in 1571, and again by Charles I. To these the law of England requires the subscriptions of all persons ordained to be deacons or priests; of all clergymen inducted to any ecclesiastical livings, and of licensed lecturers and curates; of the heads of colleges, of chancellors, officials and commissaries, and of schoolmasters. At one time, all Dissenting preachers were compelled by statute to subscribe to the greater number of the Thirty-Nine Articles. That statute, however, is now repealed. Schoolmasters, also, are now exempted from the obligation to subscribe. In originally drawing up the Articles in King Edward's time, John Knox was consulted; and it is probably through his advice that many important changes were effected. Dr Mc'Crie tells us that "He had influence to procure an important change in the communion office, completely excluding the notion of the corporal presence of Christ in the sacrament, and guarding against the adoration of the elements, which was too much countenanced by the practice, still continued, of kneeling at their reception. In his 'Admonition to the Professors of the Truth in England,' Knox speaks of these amendments with great satisfaction. 'Also God gave boldness and knowledge to the court of parliament to take away the round clipped god, wherein standeth all the holiness of the Papists, and to command common bread to be used at the Lord's table; and also to take away the most part of superstitions (kneeling at the Lord's table excepted), which before profaned Christ's true religion.' These alterations gave great offence to the Papists. In a disputation with Latimer, after the accession of Queen Mary, the prolocutor, Dr Weston, complained of our countryman's influence in procuring them. 'A runaway Scot did take away the adoration or worshipping of Christ in the sacrament, by whose procurement that heresy was put into the last communion book; so much prevailed that one man's authority at that time.' In the following year, he was employed in revising the Articles of Religion, previous to their ratification by parliament." From this statement it is plain that the English Church is indebted for much of the purity of her Articles to the great Scottish reformer. He appears to have been summoned to London for the purpose of affording his valuable advice in the matter; and it is impossible to say how far the Calvinistic character,—the scriptural accuracy,—of the Thirty-Nine Articles may have received their impress from the exertions and influence of Knox. To whatever cause it is due, the creed of the Church of England, as contained in her Articles, is diametrically opposed to the whole spirit of the Oxford theology, and to uphold honestly the doctrines of the one, they must needs renounce the doctrines of the other. See CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

ARTICLES, SIX, an act which passed both houses of parliament, and obtained the assent of Henry VIII., by which the whole body of Popery was restored, and which consisted of the following points:—That in the sacrament of the altar, after the consecration, there remaineth no substance of bread and wine, but the natural body and blood of Christ; that communion in both kinds is not necessary; that priests, according to the law of God, may not marry; that vows of chastity ought to be observed; that private masses ought to be continued; and that auricular confession is expedient and necessary, and ought to be retained in the Church. Archbishop Cranmer made a noble stand against this act while it was passing the house of lords, and disputed every inch of ground; but all his efforts were ineffectual.

ARTOTYRITES (bread and cheese eaters), a branch of the Montanists, in the second century, who are charged with eating bread and cheese in the Lord's supper. It is asserted that they did this in imitation of Abel, of whom it is said (Gen. iv. 4), he "brought of the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof;" which, it is possible, they might interpret of the milk, or rather cream, as Grotius has since done. But it is very possible that they might do this in their love-feasts, rather than the eucharist.

The Artotyrites admitted women to the priesthood and episcopacy; and Epiphanius tells us that it was a common thing to see seven girls at once enter into their church robed in white, and holding a torch in their hands; where they wept and bewailed the wretchedness of human nature, and the miseries of this life.

ARTS. Very little is known of the state of the arts among the ancient Hebrews, and the little information we are able to acquire, is only to be gathered from incidental remarks in the Sacred Scriptures. After the fall, when man was doomed to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow, ingenuity was exercised to render his labour available for the supply of his wants. Hence the invention of the arts may be said to originate in necessity. Agriculture seems to have been the only art of man's primeval state; but in the fourth generation after the creation of man we find mention made of artificers in brass and iron, and also of musical instruments. Noah understood the planting of vineyards, and the art of fermenting the juice of the grape. To the architecture of the antediluvian world we have already adverted. (See ARCHITECTURE.) In metallurgy they had made some progress, and the art of constructing musical instruments was also understood. The Antediluvians appear to have been acquainted with writing, either by means of letters or hieroglyphics. After the flood the arts seem to have made very rapid progress. Thus in the time of Moses, we find him describing an eminent artificer in these words: "See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah; and he hath filled him with the Spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship; and to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in the cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of wood, to make any manner of cunning work. And he hath put in his heart that he may teach, both he, and Aholiab, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan. Them hath he filled with wisdom of heart, to work all manner of work, of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer, in blue, and in purple, in scarlet, and in fine linen, and of the weaver, even of them that do any work, and of those that devise cunning work." Exod. xxxv. 30-35. It is probable that, from their long residence in Egypt, the Hebrews would acquire a very extensive and varied knowledge of some of the most useful arts. How far they had profited by the instructions of the Egyptians is quite apparent, from the progress of the arts at a time subsequent to that of Moses. Thus Horne remarks, in his 'Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures':—"Soon after the death of Joshua, a place was assigned by Joab, of the tribe of Judah, to artificers; for in the genealogy of the tribe of Judah, delivered in 1 Chron. iv. 14, we read of a place called the valley of craftsmen, and, verses 21, 23, of a family of workmen of fine linen, and another of potters; and when Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, the enemy carried away all the craftsmen and smiths. 2 Kings xxiv. 14. But as proof that their skill in manufactures and trade therein could not be very extensive, we find that the Prophet Ezekiel (xxvii.), in describing the affluence of the goods which came to Tyre, makes mention of nothing brought thither from Judea except wheat, oil, grapes, and balm, which were all the natural product of their ground. It appears that the mistress of the family usually made the clothing for her household, and also for sale. Exod. xxxv. 25; 1 Sam. ii. 19; Prov. xxxi. 18-24; Acts ix. 39. Employment consequently, as far as the arts were concerned, was limited chiefly to those who are engaged in the more difficult performances; for instance, those who built chariots, hewed stones, sculptured idols, or made them of metal, or who made them of instruments of gold or silver, and brass, and vessels of clay, and the like. Judg. xvii. 4; Isa. xxix. 16, xxx. 14; Jer. xxviii. 13. Artificers among the Hebrews were not, as among the Greeks and Romans, servants and slaves, but men of some rank and worth; and as luxury and riches increased, they became very numerous. Jer. xxiv. 1, xxix. 2; 2 Kings xxiv. 14. Building and architecture, however, did not attain much perfection prior to the reign of Solomon. We read, indeed, before the Israelites came into the land of Canaan, that Bezaleel and Aholiab (who were employed in the construction of the tabernacle) excelled in all manner of workmanship (Exod. xxxv. 30-35); but we are then told, that they had their skill by inspiration from God, and it does not appear that they had any successors; for, in the days of Solomon, when the Hebrews were at rest from all their enemies, and were perfectly at liberty to follow out improvements of any kind, yet they had no professed artists that could undertake the work of the temple; so that Solomon was obliged to send to Hiram, king of Tyre, for a skilful artist (2 Chron. ii. 7, 13, 14), by whose direction the model of the temple, and all the curious furniture of it, was both designed and finished. But after the Jews were under the influence or power of the Romans, there is no doubt that a better taste prevailed among them. Herod, at least, must have employed some architects of distinguished abilities to repair and beautify the temple, and render it the superb structure which the description of Josephus shows that it must have been. From the frequent mention made in Sacred History of numerous instruments and of various operations in metals, we are authorised to infer, as well as from other sources, that a considerable number of the arts was known and practised among them."

After the first captivity, the Hebrews devoted themselves with additional ardour to the improvement of the arts. All the young men, even of the highest and wealthiest families, learned mechanical trades. The arts of common life were sedulously cultivated. Thus, from the frequent allusions in the Sacred Scriptures, it is obvious that pottery was thoroughly understood. The use of the forge and the anvil seems to have been also familiar to the Hebrews. The arts of spinning and weaving seem to have been indisputable accomplishments of the Eastern women; and all the articles of clothing, indeed, even in families of the highest rank, were home-spun. The manufacture of linen, the art of embroidery, the varied styles of needlework, appear to have been carefully cultivated among the Jews.

ARUBOTH, a city and district of the tribe of Judah, mentioned in 1 Kings iv. 10. Its exact site and locality are now unknown.

ARUMAH, a city near Sichem, where Abimelech resided. Judg. ix. 41. Some commentators regard it as the same with Rumah, mentioned in 2 Kings xxiii. 36.

ARVAD, a Phœnician town, on the coast opposite to Tyre. Ezek. xxvii. 8, 11. The Arvadites are mentioned in Gen. x. 18, and seem to have been employed as mariners by the Tyrians. The place, which is quite deserted, is now called Ruad.

ARZA, a steward over the house of Elah, king of Israel. It was while drinking in the house of Arza that Elah was slain by Zimri. 1 Kings xvi. 9.

ASA, king of Judah, who succeeded his father Abijam, B.C. 955. He was distinguished for his zeal in maintaining the purity of divine worship, having deprived his own mother of her office and dignity as queen, because she had erected an idol to Ashtarté. 1 Kings xv. 13. He destroyed also the idols of Judah, Benjamin, and Mount Ephraim, repaired the altar of burnt-offerings, and summoned the people to a solemn festival in the fifteenth year of his reign. In the commencement of his reign, the country being in the enjoyment of a somewhat lengthened peace, extending throughout ten years, he embraced the opportunity of putting his kingdom in the best possible military condition, and could bring into the field an army of 580,000 men. Thus furnished with numerous and well-disciplined forces, and putting his trust in Jehovah, God of Hosts, he encountered and vanquished the Cushite king Zerah. While Asa and his victorious army were returning to Jerusalem, they were met by the prophet Azariah, by whose advice the king with his people renewed their covenant with Jehovah. 2 Chron. xvi. 1-3. Asa is reproached in his later years with having had recourse to the physicians rather than to the Lord. He reigned forty-one years in Jerusalem.

ASAHIEL, the son of Zeruiah and brother of Joab. He was killed by Abner while pursuing him after the battle of Gibeon. 2 Sam. ii. 18, 19. To revenge his death, his brother Joab some years after treacherously killed Abner. 2 Sam. iii. 26, 27.

ASAI AH, a servant of Josiah, who was sent along with others to consult Huldah the prophetess concerning the Book of the Law found in the temple, B.C. 624. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20.

ASAMON, a mountain of Galilee, situated near Sephoris.

ASAPH, the son of Barachiah of the tribe of Levi, was a celebrated musician in the time of David. He is termed a seer, 2 Chron. xxix. 30, a name applied to him rather probably in consequence of his musical genius than his prophetic powers. Several of the psalms, as the fiftieth, and the series of psalms extending from the seventy-third to the eighty-third, have the name of Asaph prefixed to them. He seems to have been a leader of a musical band, and also a composer of music.

ASCENSION DAY. A festival of the Church of England, held on the second Thursday before Pentecost, in commemoration of our Lord's visible elevation to heaven. The first mention of this day occurs in the Apostolical Constitutions, a spurious production of the fourth century. Chrysostom refers to Ascension Day in one of his homilies. Ambrose and Augustine also allude to it. Not the slightest trace of such a festival, however, can be found in the early fathers, nor has the observance of it the remotest countenance from the Word of God.

ASCENSION OF CHRIST. The doctrine that the Lord Jesus Christ really ascended into heaven, is clearly stated in the New Testament. Thus we are plainly informed, that having risen from the dead, and given many infallible proofs of his resurrection, he led his disciples from Jerusalem to Bethany, and thence, while blessing them, "he was parted from them and carried up into heaven." Such is the plain statement of the gospel narrative. And that this mysterious event should actually happen, had been expressly foretold in the Old Testament Scriptures. One of the most important parts of the Jewish ceremonial, indeed, the entrance of the high priest once every year into the holy of holies, was expressly designed to typify, as we are informed in the Epistle to the Hebrews, the entrance of Christ himself into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us. And the same truth which was represented typically, was also declared prophetically. Thus, in Psal. lxxviii. 18, it is expressly stated, "Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive: thou hast received gifts for men." And that which had been predicted of old time really happened; for we find it explicitly stated, that "while they," the disciples, "beheld, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight; and while they looked stedfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel, which said, This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." From this passage, it is evident that the fact of our Lord's ascension is attested by the disciples who saw him ascend, and to this was added the testimony of two angels who declared expressly, that he had been taken up into heaven. The evidence becomes still stronger, when we reflect that Stephen, Paul, and John, afterwards beheld him in his ascended state. Nor was the ascension of the Redeemer, an event of which the disciples had received no previous warning. On the contrary, we find Jesus declaring, "I go my way, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sins : whither I go, ye cannot come." John viii. 21. And in another place, "What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before?" Still more explicitly, when arraigned before the high priest, Jesus says, "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." The object of the ascension was, that Christ must enter into possession of the glory which he had with the Father before the world was. Nor has he entered the heavens as an individual merely, but as the Representative and Head of all his believing people. Hence he is termed their Forerunner, and in view of his ascension, he said to his disciples, "I go to prepare a place for you, and I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." His ascension was also necessary, that, as their High Priest, he might intercede for his people, and that he might commission the Spirit to enlighten, comfort, support, and sanctify his chosen ones. The mission of the Spirit, indeed, is asserted by our Lord himself to be dependent upon his own return to the Father. "If I go not away," says he, "the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." One of the most important ends of the ascension, undoubtedly, was, that Jesus might exercise still more openly his kingly office over the Church; for "he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet." The ascension of Christ is one of the most important articles of our faith, and one which affords much comfort to his faithful followers in every age of the Church; feeling as they do, that besides being "made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus," they have the firm assurance, that, as their elder Brother hath passed into the heavens, they also shall, in due time, be exalted to reign with him as kings and priests for ever.

ASCETICS. This name is given by the ancient ecclesiastical writers to those Christians who adopted a mode of life distinguished from the general mass, by habits of greater devotion, by the practice of more rigid austerity, and by other features of peculiar self-denial. This appellation was not confined to any particular class, but applied indiscriminately to all whose mode of life was peculiarly spiritual. In particular, Bingham informs us, in his 'Christian Antiquities,' that the name was applied to such persons as the following:—"To those who had inured themselves to habits of extreme abstinence; to those who were peculiarly devoted to the exercise of prayer, and the private offices of religion; to those, likewise, who had evinced a more than ordinary spirit of charity, and contempt of the world, especially in the surrender of their wealth to the service of God, or the use of the poor; to the widows and virgins of the Church, and to all such as adopted a life of celibacy and continence; and, finally, to those who had either imposed upon themselves peculiar austerities, for the purpose of realizing a higher standard of piety, or who had been subjected to peculiar personal suffering in defence of religion." In the habits and practices of these primitive ascetics, may be traced the commencement of the monastic system. The difference, however, between the ascetics, and even the most primitive of the monks, is thus accurately described by an intelligent writer:—"1. The ascetics, as their name implied, were men of active habits, who, although professing a life of greater austerity than others, did not, on that account, abandon the stations they held in society, and differed chiefly from other men in their seeking to acquire higher attainments in spirituality and self-denial. The monks, on the contrary, were men withdrawn from the business and conversation of the world, who lived either in solitary and secluded cells, or in monastic societies, remote from the haunts of mankind. 2. Again, the primitive ascetics were indifferently either clergy or laity; the vocations of the clerical and ascetic life being then consistent with each other. But the monks, by their original institution, were to be exclusively laymen, their total seclusion from society rendering the duties of the clerical and monastic vocation totally incompatible. 3. Still further, the ancient ascetics were subject to no peculiar rules of government, bound by no precepts but those of the gospel, adopting no form of discipline but what they themselves imposed, and subject only to the authority of the Church to which they belonged; whereas the monks, at least those who lived in monasteries, were necessarily subject to the arbitrary, and oft-times unscriptural, rules of the peculiar society to which they had attached themselves." From these remarks, it is plain that a very marked difference existed between the ascetics and the monks, so that the latter can scarcely be said to owe their origin to the former. The Church of Rome, in its anxiety to trace the monastic system as near as possible to apostolic times, endeavours to establish the complete identity of the ascetics and the monks; but it must be obvious, from the remarks already offered, that the two differ from each other in the most essential features. And on this subject the learned Bingham, referring to the early ages of the Church, observes:—"Although every monk was an ascetic, yet every ascetic was not a monk. Anciently, every Christian that made profession of a more strict and austere life was dignified with the name of ascetic, which is a name borrowed by the Christians from the ancient philosophers, as Valesius shows, out of Arian, Artemidorus, and Philo; and signifies, as the word imports, any one that exercises himself by the severe rules of abstinence and virtue; of which kind there were always ascetics, without being monks, from the first foundation of the Church by the apostles."

ASCLEPIDOTÆANS, a small sect in the third century; so called from Asclepidotus, who taught, like Artemon and the modern Socinians, that Jesus Christ was a mere man.

ASCODROGITES, or ASCITES, a party of Montanists in the second century, who, it is said, brought into their churches bags, skins, or bottles, filled with new wine, to represent the new wine mentioned by Christ; they danced round these bottles, and intoxicated themselves with the wine. They are likewise called Ascitæ; and both words are derived from the Greek, askos, a bottle. The charge appears improbable and ridiculous. See MONTANISTS.

ASCODRUTES, a branch of Gnostics or Valentinians in the second century, who asserted, that divine mysteries, being the images of invisible things, ought not to be represented by visible things, nor incorporeal things by corporeal and sensible. Therefore they rejected the sacraments, and are said to have confined their religion to theory. See GNOSTICS.

ASENATH, daughter of Potiphar, priest of On, the wife of Joseph (Gen. xli. 45), and mother of Ephraim and Manasseh. (See POTIPHAR.) This marriage of Joseph to the daughter of the priest of On, has appeared to various writers to call for explanation. Thus Sharon Turner, in his 'Sacred History of the World,' attempts to account for what might otherwise appear a most unwarrantable union:—"In ancient days, we learn from Juba, the African prince and historian, that the Arabs peopled a part of Egypt, from Meroe to Syene, and built the city of the Sun. Pliny has preserved this remarkable but little noticed fact: 'Juba says that the city of the Sun, which was not far from Memphis, in Egypt, has had the Arabs for its founders; and that the inhabitants of the Nile, from Syene up to Meroe, are not Ethiopian people, but Arabs.' He says of this Juba, as noting his good authority, 'In this part it pleases us to follow the Roman arms and King Juba, in his volumes written to Caius Cæsar of the same Arabian expedition.' This important passage of Juba bears, I think, upon the history of Joseph, and explains why he married the daughter of a priest at Heliopolis or On. Being an Arabian colony, it would not then have in it the base superstitions of Egypt, but would have, at that period, retained enough of the Abrahamic or patriarchal religion, to make a female there more near to his own faith and feelings than in any other part of Egypt."

ASH. This word occurs only once in the Sacred Writings, in Isa. xlv. 14, where it is said of the fabricator of idols, "He planteth an ash, and the rain doth nourish it." The Septuagint and Vulgate render it the pine or larch. This tree is of the class Monœcia, order Monodelphia. The American larch is chiefly grown in our plantations. The larch of the Bible, however, differs in some respects from that with which we are familiar. The bark of the branches is of an ash-coloured grey; the leaves a little wider, and brighter green; and the cones an inch long. The wood is applied to various uses; and in Italy it is much employed in such household ornaments as are to be painted or gilded. This circumstance points it out as all the more likely to have been used in the construction of idols; for Isaiah expressly mentions (xl. 19), that the goldsmith "spreadeth over" the image with gold; and as a still further proof that wood was gilt in such cases, he speaks of the carpenter as "encouraging the goldsmith." The resinous quality of the larch also fitted it for burning; and accordingly, we find it said of the idol-maker, "He burneth part thereof in the fire; with part thereof he eateth flesh; he roasteth a roast and is satisfied; yea, he warmeth himself and saith, Aha, I am warm, I have seen the fire." These various considerations, viewed in their combined aspect, render it highly probable that the ash of Isaiah was a species of the larch tribe.

ASHAN, a city of Judah (Josh. xv. 42); but, perhaps, afterwards yielded to Simeon. Josh. xix. 7. Eusebius says that, in his time, Beth-ashan was sixteen miles from Jerusalem westward.

ASHDOD, or AZOTUS, a city of the Philistines. Josh. xv. 46; 1 Sam. v. 1. This city, says Herodotus (lib. ii. 157), sustained the longest siege of any city in the world, against Psammeticus, king of Egypt. This was the place where Philip the evangelist was led by the Spirit, after having baptized the Ethiopian eunuch. "It is now," says Pliny Fisk, "an inconsiderable village, called by the Turks Esdood, and consists of one hundred or one hundred and fifty miserable cabins or holes, built of stone, covered with branches of trees and roots, and these, again, with earth, so that vegetation appears everywhere upon the top of them." The city lies near the shore of the Mediterranean, between Gaza and Joppa. It is situated on the summit of a grassy hill, commanding a fine view of the extensive and beautifully undulating country around. To this place the Philistines carried the ark, which they had taken in their wars with Israel; and having brought it into the house of Dagon, their god, the idol was overthrown.

ASHDOTH, a city in the tribe of Reuben, called Ashdodth-pisgah (Josh. xii. 3, xiii. 20); because it was seated in the plains at the foot of Mount Pisgah, or at the springs of Pisgah. Ashdodth may be taken, as Sheduth, for springs, or rather for rills, which, falling from some height, form small cascades in their descent, and shed their waters around.

ASHER, one of the sons of Jacob and Zilpah, Leah's servant. He had four sons and one daughter. Gen. xlix. 20; Deut. xxxiii. 24. The inheritance of his tribe lay in a very fruitful country, with Phœnicia west, Libanus north, Carmel and the tribe of Issachar south, and Zebulon and Naphtali east; but it never possessed the whole range of district assigned to it. See CANAAN.

ASHER, a city between Scythopolis and Shechem, and, consequently, remote from the tribe of Asher. Josh. xvii. 7. In the 'Old Itinerary to Jerusalem,' it is placed between Scythopolis and Neapolis. Eusebius says there was a large town of this name between Ashdod and Askelon.

ASHES. One of the most ordinary Eastern modes of expressing deep grief was to sit on the ground with ashes covering the head. Job is said to have done this (ii. 8):—"And he took himself a potsherd to scrape himself withal; and he sat down among the ashes." To denote his humiliation under God's threatened judgments, we are told of the king of Nineveh (Jonah iii. 6):—"For word came unto the king of Nineveh, and he arose from his throne, and he laid his robe from him, and covered him with sackcloth, and sat in ashes." When Abraham would indicate his feeling of his insignificance before God, he says, (Gen. xviii. 27), "I am but dust and ashes." Jerusalem, as an Eastern mourner, is thus described (Lam. iii. 16):—"He hath also broken my teeth with gravel stones, he hath covered me with ashes." When God would threaten to reduce a land to barrenness, he speaks of raining dust and ashes upon it. Thus, Deut. xxviii. 24, "The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust: from heaven shall it come down upon thee, until thou be destroyed." In Isa. xlv. 20, we find the proverbial expression, "He feedeth on ashes," used to denote the employment of means without the slightest effect; or, in other words, that the labour of the man was fruitless. In the same sense Hosea says (xii. 1), "Ephraim feedeth on wind," or, he is wearying himself for very vanity. Even yet, in Eastern countries, both men and women may be seen, in times of mourning, clothing themselves in sackcloth and ashes. Burckhardt mentions that he saw the female relatives of a deceased chief running up and down with their heads, faces, and breasts covered with ashes.

ASHIMA, a deity adored by the men of Hamath, who were settled in Samaria. 2 Kings xvii. 30. Some of the Rabbins say, that Ashimah had the shape of an ape; others, that of a lamb, a goat, or a satyr. Both the ape and the goat were worshipped in Egypt, and in the East.

ASIA. One of the four great geographical divisions of the earth. It was from it, as the cradle of civilization, that the arts and sciences were diffused over the rest of the earth. To the Christian, in particular, Asia is the most interesting portion of the earth's surface. There the Lord God planted the Garden of Eden, the scene of man's primeval felicity, and the scene also of his temptation and fall. There the descendants of Noah found a home after the Deluge, and thence dispersed their colonies into the other parts of the globe. There Jehovah first revealed to man that wondrous scheme of mercy by which God was to be specially glorified, and multitudes to be finally and eternally saved. There the Almighty planted his favourite people the Jews, among whom "he made bare his arm, and by signs, wonders, and mighty deeds" established the conviction of his righteous providence, leading the people of Israel like a flock by the hands of Moses and Aaron. It was also the great scene of Divine revelation; the theatre on which the prophets uttered their predictions, and where the Son of God illustrated and fulfilled them. Here the work of human redemption was accomplished by the Messiah; and from hence the light of the glorious gospel was diffused over a benighted world. In Asia the Christian faith was propagated by the aid of miracles, and cherished with the blood of martyrs, and there the first Christian Churches were planted, under the direction of inspired apostles.

The character of the Asiatics is uniformly represented by travellers to be of a description the most dissolute and degraded. They are said to be characterised by cruelty, meanness, lying, and the grossest licentiousness. Such a state of society is naturally to be looked for in countries which are subjected to the most tyrannical despotism and the most degrading superstition. In Asiatic Turkey, in Arabia, Persia, and partly also in Hindostan and the Asiatic isles, the Mahomedan faith prevails; in Hindostan, the religion of Brahma; and in Thibet, and further eastward, among the Burmese, in China, and the isles of Japan, the religion of Buddha or Foe is universally established. These various systems of superstition have exercised the most injurious influence upon the manners of the Asiatic people; and by the encouragement of polygamy, and the inculcation of penances and pilgrimages, instead of purity of heart and life, they have reduced the people to a state of the lowest moral degradation. Of late, however, Christianity has been making its way in many parts of Asia, and particularly in Hindostan, with a rapidity the most encouraging. At a very early period Christianity seems to have been introduced into India, as appears from the remnants of the Syrian Churches which have been found in Malabar; and it is earnestly hoped, that as from Asia first sounded forth the word of the Lord, so throughout every one of the vast and populous tribes of the now degraded and superstitious Asiatics the gospel of Christ shall again be proclaimed in its saving and sanctifying power.

ASIA MINOR. Asia was generally divided into Major and Minor. Asia Minor was a large country (Acts xix. 10) lying between the Euxine or Black Sea northward, and the Mediterranean southward. It is now called Anatolia or Natolia. Asia Major denotes all the rest of the Asiatic continent. Asia Minor contained the provinces of Bithynia, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Phrygia, Mysia, Troas,—all of which are mentioned in the New Testament; Lydia, Ionia, and Æolis (which are sometimes included under Lydia), Caria, Doris, and Lycia. Of these, Lydia and Caria (taken in their larger acceptations, the latter including Doris), Mysia and Phrygia, including Troas or Phrygia Minor, formed the Roman PROCONSULAR ASIA, which has been thought by some to be the same as the Scripture Asia. But, as Dr Wells remarks, it is evident that Mysia, Phrygia, and Troas, are reckoned by the sacred writers as distinct provinces from the Asia so called in Scripture. It is therefore more reasonably supposed, that by Asia in the New Testament is sometimes to be understood Lydia in its largest acceptation, so as to include Ionia and Æolis; for in this were comprehended the seven cities, the Churches of which are styled the Churches of Asia. Dr Paley, however, alleges that Asia, throughout the Acts of the Apostles, does not mean the whole of Asia Minor or Anatolia, nor even the whole of the Proconsular Asia; but "a district in the interior part of that country, called Lydian Asia, divided from the rest much as Portugal is from Spain." Ruins of cities, towns, temples, and other interesting memorials of antiquity, everywhere arrest the eye of the traveller, as he passes through Asia Minor. There is no country, however, which it is more difficult to explore. "In European Turkey," remarks Lieutenant-Colonel Leake, "the inhospitality of the Mahomedan system is somewhat tempered by its proximity to civilised Europe, its conscious weakness, and the great excess of the Christian population over the Turkish; but in Asia Minor the Christian must always feel that he is merely tolerated. The Turks are sensible that the country is still their own, and that they are a step further removed from those Christian nations whose increasing power keeps pace with the decline of their own race, obliging them to look forward to their expulsion from those regions which they usurped from the Greeks, when the Christian states were comparatively feeble, as to an event that must some day be fulfilled." Of late years several attempts have been made to explore this interesting country, and various monuments of antiquity have been transferred to England, which throw considerable light on its history. The following description is given of the present state of Asia Minor in the 'Narrative of a Mission of Inquiry to the Jews from the Church of Scotland in 1839:—"Immorality has awfully increased among the Mahomedans, and indeed among all classes of the community throughout Asiatic Turkey; while, at the same time, the depopulation of the empire has been going on rapidly. This decay is proved by the multitude of burying grounds throughout the country, that have now no village existing near them. During the year 1838, the plague, smallpox, and other diseases, carried off most of the children in Asia Minor under two years of age. In one part of the plain of Cayster, where three hundred yoke of oxen used to be employed, the ground is now tilled by only twelve. A village near Smyrna, including the aga's house, and one thousand two hundred acres of land, was lately offered for sale for twenty thousand piastres,—a sum equal to two hundred pounds. In fact, the country is drained of its inhabitants, by the frequent draughts on their young men to serve in the army. The governors complain that they cannot get people for any service. Every thing indicates that the strength of the empire is gone, and that the time is at hand when 'the waters of the great river Euphrates shall be dried up.' Rev. xvi. 12." How far this may be the country intended in 1 Pct. i. 1, it is difficult to determine: certainly Proconsular Asia is too distant from Capadocia and Bithynia to be united with them, or with any other province mentioned in his salutation; not to say, that Proconsular Asia was previously occupied and taught by Paul, and afterwards by John.

ASIARCHS. These men described in Acts xix. 31, as "certain of the chief of Asia," were wealthy citizens selected to preside at the public games, and to take care that all the rules and arrangements be observed. It appears to have been during the celebration of such games at Ephesus, that an uproar was raised by Demetrius the goldsmith, in consequence of the Apostle Paul denouncing the prevailing idolatry, which, as is well known, was the worship of the heathen goddess Diana. So great, indeed, was the fame of the Ephesian Diana, and so great the reverence shown her, that her effigy was worshipped with singular fervency by even the most remote and barbarous nations, and temples were dedicated by them to her. Considerable discussion has taken place among the learned, as to the precise office of these Asiarchs, some representing them as priests of religion, and others as civil magistrates. It is plain, however, that their authority was not limited to one city, but extended to several. It is interesting to notice the manner in which these officers were chosen. The Asiarchs were elected in the following manner:—Each of the cities of Asia, about the beginning of their year, which was at the autumnal equinox, held a council, in which a proper person from among their own cities was proposed; these names being transmitted to the general council of Proconsular Asia, one of them was fixed on. Of those whom each of the cities of Asia had thus recommended, the common council created ten only as Asiarchs; and out of that number the Roman proconsul chose the president of the sacred rites. Commentators, however, are not agreed on one point, viz., whether all who were designated by the public council of Asia performed this function together, or whether only one was elected Asiarch. Strabo mentions many Asiarchs; but in Eusebius, Polycarp is said to have suffered martyrdom when "Philip was Asiarch, and Statius Quadratus Proconsul of Asia." Moreover, the Asiarchs, as we find from the Greek authors, did not, as some have supposed, always reside at Ephesus, but also in other cities to which the sacred rites of Asia were common, as Smyrna, Cyzicus, and other places. It must be observed, too, that even those who had at any time discharged the office of Asiarch, used to have the title still bestowed upon them by courtesy; so that the Asiarchs mentioned in the Acts may either have been those then in office, or those who had been so. Dr Bloomfield thinks that one elected by the Proconsuls was styled the Asiarch, and the rest were his assessors, and themselves also styled Asiarchs. The dignity was great; but the expense also was great: so that only men of wealth could undertake it. Hence we find Aristides exerting himself strenuously to be discharged from this costly office, to which he had been three or four times nominated. This notion of the Asiarchs is confirmed by a medal of Rhodes, struck under Hadrian, on the reverse of which we read, "A coin struck in common by thirteen cities, in honour of the magistrate of Rhodes, Claudio Fronto, ASIARCH and high priest of the thirteen cities."

ASIA, SEVEN CHURCHES OF. These were, as recorded in the Apocalypse, EPHESUS, SMYRNA, PERGAMOS, THYATIRA, SARDIS, PHILADELPHIA, and LAODICEA (which see), all of them situated in Proconsular Asia, which is said to have contained five hundred cities. Bishop Newton observes, that they "lie in a circular form, so that the natural progress was from Ephesus to Smyrna, and then successively to Pergamos, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea; so round to Ephesus again; which is the order that John has observed in addressing them, and which probably was the circuit which he took in his visitation." These were, in the primitive ages, most flourishing Christian communities, some of them enjoying the inspired ministry of the apostles themselves. The epistles addressed to them by the Apostle John were written in Patmos, an island now called Palmosa, in the Archipelago. The date at which they were penned, is alleged by Sir Isaac Newton to have been in the reign of Nero, while Grotius declares it to have been in that of Claudius. The generally received opinion is that which assigns the date to A.D. 95 or 96, towards the end of Domitian's reign.

ASKELON, or ASHKELON, one of the five lordships of the Philistines, situated on the shore of the Mediterranean Sea. It was defended on one side by the sea, while a natural wall of rock ran round it in the form of a semicircle, enclosing a deep hollow, in which the town was placed. The fortifications of Askelon were erected on the enclosing line of rock, and their foundations may still be traced all the way round. It was esteemed the strongest city on the Philistine coast, and was taken possession of by the tribe of Judah after the death of Joshua. Judg. i. 18. The Philistines, however, regained possession of the place. Various predictions have been uttered concerning it, which have been literally fulfilled. Thus, "The king shall perish from Gaza, and Ashkelon shall not be inhabited." Zech. ix. 5. Gaza has long been deprived of her king; and travellers tell us that not a single inhabitant is to be found among the ruins of Askelon. This city was famed in antiquity for a temple dedicated to Decreta, the mother of Semiramis, who was worshipped here under the form of a mermaid; and also for a temple dedicated to Apollo, at which Herod, the father of Antipater, and grandfather of Herod the Great, officiated as a priest.

ASMONEANS, a name given to the Maccabees, descendants of Mattathias, who was, according to Josephus (Antiq., lib. xii. cap. 8), the great-grandson of Asmonæus. The family of the Asmonæans became very illustrious in the later times of the Hebrew commonwealth; it was the support of the religion and liberty of the Jews, and possessed the supreme authority, from Mattathias to Herod the Great. (See MACCABEES.) It is nowhere said whether the Asmonæans were of the race of Josedech, in whose family the office of high priest continued in a lineal descent till Alcimus was promoted to that dignity. This is certain of the Asmonæans, that they were of the course of Joarib, which was the first class of the sons of Aaron; and, therefore, on the failure of the former pontifical family (which had now happened by the flight of Onias, son of Onias, into Egypt), they had the best right to succeed to that station. Under this right, Jonathan took the office, when nominated to it by the reigning king in Syria; being also elected thereto by the general suffrage of the people. The dynasty of the Asmonæans lasted one hundred and twenty-six years, from the time of the treaty between Antiochus Eupator and Judas Maccabæus, B.C. 162, to the death of Antigonus, B.C. 37.

ASNAPPER, the name of a king or governor of Assyria, who sent the Cutheans into Palestine. He is mentioned in Ezra iv. 10. It has been disputed what precise king is meant by the name, some supposing it to be Shalmaneser, and others, with perhaps more probability, Esarhaddon.

ASP, a kind of serpent frequently referred to in the Sacred Writings. It belongs to the genus Coluber of Linnæus, and by Forskal it is regarded as the Coluber baetœn, about a foot in length and two inches in circumference, spotted with black and white, oviparous, and its bite is deadly. Its poison is more deadly than that of any other venomous creature inhabiting the East. The only remedy in this case is immediate amputation or excision of the part affected, or searing the wound with a red-hot iron, which extinguishes the virus, or prevents it from entering the blood, and thus taking effect upon the constitution. The mode in which the poison diffuses itself through the system is gradual. Its bite induces slumber, which, by degrees, is converted into profound sleep. Death ensues within twenty-four hours, unaccompanied by pain or violent symptoms; the only perceptible change being the gradual diminution of pulsation. The whole body immediately becomes of a blackish colour; and mortification, as if from a gangrene, follows in the space of a day. The bite of the asp is said by Aristotle to admit of no remedy; and Pliny allows of no other cure but to extirpate the wounded part.

The Hebrew pethen is variously translated in our version; but interpreters generally consider it as referring to the asp. Zophar alludes to it more than once, in his description of a wicked man: "Yet his meat in his bowels is turned, it is the gall of asps within him. He shall suck the poison of asps: the viper's tongue shall slay him." Job xx. 14, 16. The venom of asps is the most subtle of all; it is incurable; and, if the wounded part be not instantly amputated, it speedily terminates the existence of the sufferer. To these circumstances Moses evidently alludes, in his character of the heathen: "Their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps." Deut. xxxii. 33; see also Rom. iii. 13. To tread upon the asp is attended with extreme danger; and to express in the strongest manner the safety which the godly man enjoys under the protection of his heavenly Father, it is promised, that he shall tread with impunity upon the adder and the dragon. Psal. xci. 13. No person of his own accord approaches the hole of these deadly reptiles; for he who gives them the smallest disturbance, is in extreme danger of paying the forfeit of his rashness with his life. Hence the Prophet Isaiah, predicting the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ, and the glorious reign of peace and truth in those regions which, prior to that period, were full of horrid cruelty, declares, "The sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Isa. xi. 8, 9. In the glowing descriptions of the golden age, with which the Oriental writers and the rapturous bards of Greece and Rome entertained their contemporaries, the wild beasts grow tame, serpents resign their poison, and noxious herbs their deleterious qualities; all is peace and harmony, plenty and happiness.

The soaring genius of these heathen writers, however, could reach no higher than a negative felicity; but the inspired bard, far surpassing them in the beauty and elegance, as well as in the variety of imagery, with which he clothes the same ideas, exhibits a glowing picture of positive and lasting happiness. The wolf and the leopard not only forbear to destroy the lamb and kid, but even take their abode with them, and lie down together. The calf, and the young lion, and the fatling, not only come together, but also repose under the same covert, and are led quietly in the same band, and that by a little child. The cow and the she-bear not only feed together, but even lodge their young ones, for whom they used to be most jealously fearful, in the same place. All the serpent kind is so perfectly harmless, that the sucking infant, or the newly-weaned child, puts his hand on the basilisk's den, and plays upon the hole of the asp. The lion not only abstains from preying on the weaker animals, but also becomes tame and domestic, and feeds on straw like the ox. These are all beautiful circumstances, and admirably descriptive of an improved moral condition of the whole creation.

ASPASTICUM, the name given among ecclesiastical writers to an apartment adjoining the ancient churches, in which the presbyters sat to receive the salutations of the persons who came to visit them, to desire their blessing, or to consult them on business.

ASS. There are three different Hebrew words which are referred by the translators of our authorised version of the Bible to the ass. 1. The hamor, or the ordinary ass, used for domestic purposes; 2. The para, rendered onagar, or wild ass; and, 3. The athon, or she-ass. The ass is an animal which bears a considerable resemblance to the horse in form. It differs from that animal, however, in having long ears, a short mane, and long hairs covering only the end of the tail. Its general colour in this country is dun or dirty brown; but in the East it was generally reddish-brown, and in some cases, as we find from the Song of Deborah, asses were white. In its wild state, the ass is much handsomer and more elegant in figure than the common ass. Aristotle mentions the wild ass as exceeding the horse in swiftness; and Herodotus speaks of them as drawing chariots of war. The nobles in Palestine were wont to ride upon asses. Judg. v. 10, x. 4, xii. 14. The ass was unclean by the law; because it did not chew the cud. To draw with an ox and an ass in the same yoke was prohibited (Deut. xxii. 10); a law which Le Clerc, we think without the slightest foundation, regards as merely symbolical, importing that they must not form improper alliances in civil and religious life. The onagar or wild ass is found in Persia, and is characterised by singular beauty of form and swiftness of foot. To this latter quality there is an evident allusion in Job xxxix. 5-7: "Who hath sent out the wild ass free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass? whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings. He scorneth the multitude of the city, neither regardeth he the crying of the driver." The untameableness of this animal is adduced in Scripture as an emblem of the depravity of man: "Vain man would be wise, though man be born like a wild ass's colt" (Job xi. 12); and it was predicted of Ishmael, that "he will be a wild man,"—literally, "a wild ass man." Gen. xvi. 12.

Asses were much valued in Oriental countries for various purposes. The strength of the animal, and its capability of bearing a heavy load, are alluded to by Jacob,—“Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between two burdens.” From an early period asses formed no small portion of the wealth of Oriental shepherds, and it was accounted no undignified employment to feed asses. When the Israelites conquered the Midianites, they carried away “three score and one thousand asses.” Saul was in search of his father’s asses when he was met by Samuel, and anointed king over Israel. In the days of the judges, it was accounted a mark of distinction to ride upon an ass; and even yet, Morier tells us that the mollahs in Persia ride on white asses. As the breed of horses, however, increased in Judea, and more especially after the days of Solomon, the ass seems to have fallen in the estimation of the Jews; and at length, after the seventy years’ captivity in Babylon, it was regarded as a mark of poverty and meanness to appear in public riding upon an ass. This explains the reason of the prediction of Zechariah in reference to the entrance of Christ into Jerusalem: “Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold, thy King cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass.” Zech. ix. 9. This animal was employed in preparing rice ground which had been flooded for the seed, by treading upon the soil, and working it with his feet. The Prophet Isaiah is supposed to refer to this practice when he says, “Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters, that send forth thither the feet of the ox and the ass.” That the ass was much employed in useful labour is evident from the rest of the Sabbath being claimed for him: “That thine ox and thine ass may rest.” Exod. xxiii. 12. The extensive advantage, however, which was taken of this valuable animal did not prevent it from being beaten and oppressed. When living, it was despised; and when dead, its carcase was thrown into a ditch, or cast out into the open field. Hence the Prophet Jeremiah, describing the fate of Jehoiachin, says, “He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.” The she-ass was more highly valued in Eastern countries than the male, more especially for the saddle. This was the kind of animal which Balaam rode; and we find, in a description of the wealth of Job (i. 3), mention made of “five hundred she-asses.” In ancient times the ass was very generally used as a beast of burden; and although in course of ages camels were more frequently employed in the East for carrying goods, yet the ass is stated so late as the days of Isaiah to have been joined with the camel in bearing heavy loads. Thus: “They will carry their riches upon the shoulders of young asses, and their treasures upon the hunches of camels, to a people that shall not profit them.” Isa. xxx. 6. This useful animal was often sent, in early times, to drive the millstone. Hence the allusion of our Lord in his solemn declaration, Luke xvii. 1, 2. In this passage the Greek word translated “millstone,” implies a large millstone turned by asses,—heavier than that turned by women or by slaves. Among the Jews the ass could neither be used as food nor offered in sacrifice. The firstling of an ass was to be redeemed with the sacrifice of a lamb, or deprived of life. In extreme cases, however, the law was disregarded; for in 2 Kings vi. 25, it is stated, that when the Syrian armies besieged Samaria, such was the scarcity of provisions, that “an ass’s head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver,”—a sum equivalent to about ten pounds of our money. It has been contended, however, by Mr Taylor, in his ‘Scripture Illustrated,’ that the word hamor is not to be understood in this passage as signifying an ass but is the same as homer, a certain measure of wheat. The rendering of our authorised translation is thus conclusively defended by Professor Paxton:—“We know what is meant by the head of an ass; but the head of a homer, or measure of wheat or barley, is quite unintelligible. Nor could the sacred writer say with propriety that the city was suffering by a ‘great famine,’ while a homer of grain was sold for eighty pieces of silver; for in the next chapter he informs us, that, after the flight of the Syrians, and provisions of every kind, by the sudden return of plenty, were reduced to the lowest price, ‘a measure of fine flour (which is the thirtieth part of a homer) was sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria.’ Besides, had the historian intended a measure of corn, he would not have said indefinitely, a homer was sold for eighty pieces of silver; but a homer of wheat, or of barley, or of oats, which are not of the same value. The prophet accordingly says, in the beginning of the next chapter, ‘A measure of fine flour shall be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel.’ And John, in the Book of Revelation: ‘A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny.’ Rev. vi. 6. Our translators, therefore, have taken a just view of this text, and given a correct version.”

ASSARON. See OMER.

ASSASSINS, a tribe or clan in Syria, called also Ismaelians, probably from Ishmael, whose hand was against every man. Gen. xvi. 12. Also, Batenists, or Batenians. They are supposed to owe their origin to the Karmatian people, an heretical sect among the Mahomedans, who settled in Persia about the year 1090; whence in process of time they sent a colony into Syria, which took possession of a considerable tract of land among the mountains of Lebanon, extending nearly from Antioch to Damascus. Their religion was compounded of the various superstitions of the Persians, Jews, and Mahomedans; but the distinguishing article of it was, that the Spirit of the Supreme resided in their sheikh, or chief; and that all his injunctions were the commands of God; and they were trained to that degree of submission, that they would instantly kill themselves at his command, being assured of immediate entrance into paradise. Their chief was known in Europe by the name of the “Old Man of the Mountain;” and his followers were called Assassins;—according to some, from the family of one of their leaders, named Arsacidæ; or, according to Mr Mills, by corruption, from Hussanees, the followers of Hussan; or, according to Volney, from the Turkish word, Hassassin (to kill silently and by surprise), a night robber. Their office was to murder any person whom their sheikh commanded. “This chief, from his exalted residence on the summit of Mount Lebanon, like a vindictive deity, with the thunderbolt in his hand, sent inevitable death to all quarters of the world:” so that the chiefs of all nations dreaded this sanguinary tyrant; and many were weak enough to pay him a secret pension, by way of security. In 1272, however, they were subdued by the forces of the Sultan Bibaris; but it is supposed that the Druses, who now inhabit those mountains, sprang from some remains of these barbarians. See DRUSES.

ASSEMBLY, GENERAL, OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. This important convocation of the Church of Scotland is composed of ministers and elders commissioned from different parts of the country at stated periods, generally once a year, to deliberate upon the interests of the National Church. The first meeting of this body was held at Edinburgh, on the 20th of December 1560. It consisted of forty members, only six of whom were ministers, the rest being leading Protestants, who were desirous of promoting the cause of the reformed Church. It is a singular circumstance, that there were seven different meetings of Assembly without a moderator or president. But as the number of members increased, and there was greater necessity for maintaining order, a moderator was appointed to be chosen at each meeting, whose business it was to preside over the deliberations. The first person who occupied this honourable office was John Willock, superintendent of Glasgow, who filled the chair of the Assembly at their meeting in December 1563. In July 1568, it was arranged that the constitution of the Assembly should be on the representative system. It has the countenance of a representative of majesty, styled the Lord High Commissioner, who is always a nobleman; and holding its meeting annually, and, according to present practice, in the month of May, it usually continues to sit for twelve days. In its judicial capacity, as a court of review, and as the court of last resort, the General Assembly has a right to determine finally every question brought from the inferior courts by reference, complaint, or appeal: and it possesses such a general superintendence of the discipline of the Church, of the management of the inferior courts, of the conduct of the ministers, and of the spiritual interests of the people, that it has authority to go beyond the record in any particular case, to redress a wrong which appears to have been done, or to apply the discipline of the Church where it may have been neglected by the inferior courts, or as the circumstances of the case may require. But to do this regularly, the parties interested must be legally cited, if they were not before at the bar. The legislative authority of the General Assembly has as extensive effects as its judicial functions. It has the power of enacting statutes with regard to every subject of ecclesiastical cognizance; which are equally binding as permanent laws, on the Assembly itself, on the inferior courts, and on the individual members of the Church. The Assembly is composed of ministers and ruling elders chosen by each presbytery to represent them; and also of ruling elders chosen by the universities, and by the town-councils of certain burghs. The great design of the Assembly is thus laid down in the Second Book of Discipline:—"This Assemblie is institute that all things either omitted or done amisse in the provinciale assemblies may be redressit and handlit; and things generally serving for the weill of the haill bodie of the Kirk within the realme may be forsein, intreatit, and set furth to God's glorie." At a very early period a wise limitation was assigned to the power of legislation possessed by the Assembly. By the Barrier Act, which was passed in 1697, every proposition for a new law must first be proposed in the form of an overture, either originating in the Assembly itself, or suggested by the inferior judicatories.

Though it should be approved of by the Assembly, it cannot be enacted into a statute till it has been first transmitted to the several presbyteries of the Church for their consideration, and has received the sanction of at least a majority of the presbyteries. The laws which are enacted by the Assembly after receiving this sanction, are the established and permanent statutes of the Church. This ecclesiastical court or parliament of Scotland continued to be convened with regularity until it was suppressed by King James, for the purpose of more effectually accomplishing his favourite design,—the introduction of Prelacy into the Church of Scotland. From 1618, accordingly, no Assembly sat until the famous Assembly which met at Glasgow in 1638, and which abolished Prelacy and established the Second Reformation. The General Assembly was again suppressed in 1653 by Cromwell; but after a violent interruption of nearly forty years, it was convened on the 16th October 1690. Two years after this, King William made an attempt to prevent this court from holding its regular sittings; but although he succeeded in procuring a postponement of the meeting which was appointed for 1693, he found himself quite unable to do away with the court altogether, as he desired. The General Assembly met, in the full enjoyment of its spiritual independence, on the 29th March 1694. After the accession of Queen Anne, an attempt was once more made to interfere with the liberties of the supreme ecclesiastical court of Scotland. The attempt, however, was met by a spirit of calm and dignified resistance, which prevented any further encroachment for a long period on the part of the State. The General Assembly continued regularly to hold its sittings every year during the whole of last century, undisturbed and unfettered in its actings by the civil power. At length, however, in the year 1834, a line of acting was entered upon by the ecclesiastical judicatories, which some considered as calling for the prompt and decided interference of the civil courts. The Church proceeded in her onward movements in what she considered quite a competent and legal course. At last, however, a collision ensued between the civil and ecclesiastical courts which terminated in the Disruption of 1843. The circumstances which more immediately led to this were as follows:—The Act on Calls, generally known by the name of the Veto Act, which was passed by the Assembly with the view of preventing the intrusion of unacceptable ministers on reclaiming congregations, was hailed by the friends of evangelical religion as likely to obviate, in all time coming, the universally acknowledged evils of unrestricted patronage. A case, however, arose under the operation of this Act,—the celebrated Auchterarder case,—which led, at length, to the most disastrous consequences. Mr Robert Young, preacher of the gospel, had been presented by Lord Kinnoul to the parish of Auchterarder. The presbytery proceeded so far as to moderate in a call, and it was found that the call was signed by his lordship's factor, not a resident in the parish, and by two heads of families. On the other hand, two hundred and eighty-seven heads of families, communicants, entered their dissent before the prebytery, and as there were only three hundred and thirty on the roll, this amounted to an overwhelming majority of dissentients. The presbytery refused to sustain the call; and their decision was confirmed by the synod and Assembly. Mr Young was accordingly rejected, and due intimation of this decision given to all the parties interested. An action was forthwith raised against the presbytery in the Court of Session, at the instance of Lord Kiinnoul and the presentee. The conclusion of the summons was, that the rejection of the presentee solely in respect of a vote of the parishioners was illegal, and injurious to the patrimonial rights of the pursuer, and contrary to the provisions of the statutes and laws regarding the collation or settlement of ministers; and that, in consequence of the presentation, the presbytery were still bound to make trial of the qualifications of the presentee, and if found duly qualified, to receive and admit him. In entering into this action, the Church was careful to maintain her own spiritual jurisdiction, deuying altogether the jurisdiction of the civil courts in matters which concern the conferring of the pastoral office. "The Court of Session might determine whether a presentation were valid or not, and consequently, whether the presentee possessed any legal claim to the fruits of the benefice in consequence of such a presentation; but when the presentation was sustained, every other step in the process of admission was exclusively within the sole jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, and not subject to the review of any civil court." The matter was ably pleaded in Court, and by a majority of three it was decided that the presbytery, in rejecting the presentee on the sole ground of the dissent of the people, had acted illegally. This decision excited the greatest alarm throughout the Church of Scotland. At their next meeting, the General Assembly passed a declaratory act, asserting the independence of the Church upon any civil power in regard to her spiritual jurisdiction, and her determination to maintain and enforce it. The Auchterarder case was appealed to the House of Lords; but after a long and able pleading, the decision of the Court of Session was affirmed on the 3d of May 1839. It was now evident that a collision had taken place between the ecclesiastical and civil courts of the country, and attempts were made, by negotiations with the Government, to procure an adjustment of conflicting jurisdictions. Meanwhile other cases arose, founded on the exercise of the Veto Act, and the encroachments of the civil courts upon the spiritual independence of the Church were multiplied. Negotiations failed, and after many fruitless attempts to prevail upon the Government to make an effort towards a reconciliation of differences, a solemn appeal was made to the Legislature on the subject. Their decision was also adverse. The 'Claim of Rights' was laid upon the table, and, although a majority of Scottish members voted for sustaining the petition, nevertheless the Parliament of Great Britain, by a large majority, refused to entertain the question which the Church was anxious to press on their attention. Thus was the course which the inferior civil courts had followed, plainly, though indirectly, sanctioned by the supreme civil judicature of the country. The Church was thus pronounced to have been acting illegally, or, at least, contrary to what the State now pronounced to be the law of the land. The crisis had now come. In consequence of this alleged change in the constitution of the Church, four hundred and seventy-four ministers left her pale, with a large number of elders, members, and adherents, who formed themselves into the Free Church of Scotland.

ASSEMBLY, WESTMINSTER, the name by which is usually designated that celebrated synod of divines which was summoned by Parliament in the reign of Charles I., and to whose deliberations we owe the invaluable Confession of Faith, and Larger and Shorter Catechisms. This Assembly met on the 1st July 1643, in King Henry the Seventh's chapel, in Westminster Abbey. The avowed object of this convention of divines was, as declared in the ordinance of Parliament, "to confer and treat among themselves of such matters and things touching and concerning the liturgy, discipline, and government of the Church of England." About nine months before the hierarchical form of Church government had been abolished, and there being at that time, therefore, no body of men possessing ecclesiastical authority in England, the Parliament summoned the Assembly, nominated all the members, and even appointed the prolocutor or moderator, who was to preside over their deliberations. The king issued a proclamation, forbidding the meeting of the Assembly, but without producing the desired effect. The Assembly convened on the appointed day. By the arrangements of Parliament, the list of members consisted of one hundred and forty-two divines, and thirty-two lay assessors. Before commencing proceedings, Dr Twisse, as prolocutor, preached from John xiv. 18, "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you." Both the members of Assembly and the Parliament were present. The true theory of the Assembly is thus satisfactorily explained by Dr Hetherington, in his 'History of the Westminster Assembly':—"There was a Christian Church in England, but not organized; and the civil power, avowing Christianity, had called an Assembly of Divines, for the purpose of consulting together respecting those points of government and discipline which require the sanction of civil authority for their full efficiency. Such an Assembly could have been called only by a Christian civil magistrate; and only in a transition state of the Church, when disorganized, or not yet duly constituted. In such a state of matters, the problem to be solved was this,—On what terms could a National Church be constituted, so as neither to encroach upon civil liberty, as the papal and prelatie Churches had done, nor to yield up those inherent spiritual rights, privileges, and liberties, which are essential to a Church of Christ? And, for that purpose, it was almost indifferent whether the State should first mention the terms on which it would establish a National Church, or the Church specify the terms on which it would consent to be established; only, that the latter would have been the simpler and the purer method of making the arrangement. The former, however, was the plan adopted; and, for that reason, the statement of the propositions came from Parliament." To carry forward the business the more regularly and expeditiously, the Assembly resolved itself into three equal committees. The first subject proposed for consideration by Parliament was, the revision of the Thirty-Nine Articles. The discussion, however, upon this subject, though nearly three months were spent upon it, came to no satisfactory termination, being interrupted by the arrival of the Scottish commissioners. The attention of the Assembly was now turned to the SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT, which had been drawn up by the celebrated Alexander Henderson, and was designed to be a bond of union between England and Scotland, in defence of the religious liberties of both countries. This important document received the sanction of the Assembly, and was solemnly sworn to, and signed by them.

By order of Parliament, the Assembly was next called to deliberate upon the important subjects of discipline, and a directory of worship and government. From the composition of the Assembly, consisting of three parties, Presbyterian, Independent, and Erastian, it may be easily conceived that questions touching the government of the Church were likely to give rise to lengthened and keen discussion. It was decided, however, as the result of their deliberations, that Christ is the Head of the Church; that from him all the authority of church-officers is derived; that of these officers, some are extraordinary and have ceased, such as prophets, apostles, and teachers, while others are ordinary and permanent; that pastors, and doctors, or teachers, are essentially the same, and are the highest order of officers in the Church; that ruling elders are of Divine appointment, and distinct from pastors; and deacons are also of Divine appointment, not, however, to preach or to rule, but attend to the pecuniary and secular concerns of the Church. On these points, the Assembly were tolerably harmonious; but not so on those which immediately followed,—ordination and discipline. A contention on these topics was carried on between the Presbyterians and the Independents. The main heads of the controversy are thus clearly stated by Dr Hetherington:—"There was no disagreement between the two parties in matters of doctrine; they both admitted the same orders of office-bearers in the Church, though the Independents would have recognised more than the Presbyterians thought either necessary or commanded in the Scriptures; and they differed little in their opinions respecting the powers properly inherent in congregations. But the Independents refused to recognise the Presbyterian system of successive Church courts,—as presbyteries, synods, and assemblies,—possessing authoritative jurisdiction over those immediately beneath them, though they were willing to admit the advantage of synods in cases of difficulty, to the opinions of which great respect would be due, but not subjection and necessary obedience. The point, however, on which the greatest disagreement existed, was that relating to the ideas which they attached to the term Church. In their view, each company of believers, though not more than seven in number, forms a Church, complete in itself, and in no respect subordinate to, or requiring the aid of, any other Church. Such a Church might, at its first formation, be entirely without pastors, elders, or church-officers of any kind; but having met together, and made a solemn declaration of faith, and entered into a mutual Church covenant, they immediately became possessed of such inherent powers as to entitle them to choose and ordain all necessary church-officers, without the presence or the intervention of any pastor previously ordained. Other pastors might, indeed, be present; but their presence was not necessary to the validity of the ordination conferred. In the same manner, the congregation of ordinary members might censure or depose their office-bearers, and choose and ordain new ones whenever they thought proper; and if the office-bearers did not readily submit and become private members again, the congregation were entitled to withdraw from communion with them altogether, and to reconstitute their system as at first. Against such proceedings no appeal could be taken to any other authority, each congregation possessing all power in itself, and being free to have recourse to the principle of non-communication in any case, though against the whole Christian Church.

Even when thus stated, the difference between the Independent and the Presbyterian systems may be brought within a very narrow compass. The Presbyterians never denied that a company of true believers might be a true church, though destitute of pastors; nor that they might select the most grave and pious of their number, and set him solemnly apart to the office of the ministry, without the presence of any ordained pastor, if in circumstances where that could not be obtained. They admitted that the Church must possess in itself the power of all that is necessary to the continuation of its own existence. But they held, also, that Christ himself at first chose and appointed office-bearers, and gave to them authority to ordain others; that this was matter of precept, and to be regularly obeyed in every instance when that was possible, because it had been so commanded; while they regarded the Congregational mode as a matter of necessity, justifiable only in cases where without it the enjoyment of Christian ordinances could not be obtained. The error of the Independents consisted in adopting as the ordinary rule the case of necessity, instead of the method of precept; and in adhering so pertinaciously to this view as to condemn and refuse to admit into their communion all who could not agree with them."

Besides the Independent controversy, the Assembly were also occupied for some time in opposing the unscriptural opinions of the few Erastians who belonged to the body; the ablest of whom, undoubtedly, was the learned Selden. The distinct province of the church-officers, from that of the civil magistrate, was most conclusively maintained against the Erastian party, and the views which the great majority of the Assembly held are comprehensively expressed in the proposition which they embodied in the Confession of Faith: "THE LORD JESUS, AS KING AND HEAD OF HIS CHURCH, HATH THEREIN APPOINTED A GOVERNMENT IN THE HAND OF CHURCH-OFFICERS, DISTINCT FROM THE CIVIL MAGISTRATE." Several statements had been modified for the purpose of pleasing the Independent party, but not the slightest attempt was made to compromise matters with the Erastians. The utmost anxiety, on the contrary, was manifested to preserve the Confession free from the slightest taint of Erastianism. This valuable compendium of Scripture doctrine was drawn up by the Assembly with the greatest deliberation and care, and completed in the end of 1646. The Erastians, though weak in the Assembly, were sufficiently powerful in Parliament to prevent the entire and unqualified ratification of the Confession by the Legislature. The doctrinal part met with the full approbation of both Houses of Parliament; but they agreed that the particulars in discipline should be recommitted. Neal, in his 'History of the Puritans,' informs us, that the particulars which the Legislature thus declined, in the meantime, to ratify, were, the 30th chapter, "Of Church Censures;" the 31st chapter, "Of Synods and Councils;" and the 4th section of the 20th chapter, "Of Christian Liberty, and Liberty of Conscience."

In the first part of its sittings, the Assembly was occupied almost entirely by the discussions respecting the Directories of Ordination and Worship, which they completed towards the end of 1644. The Confession of Faith involved so many points of anxious debate, that it was not laid finally before Parliament in its complete state, with the Scripture proofs annexed to its propositions, until the 29th of April 1647. The Shorter Catechism was presented to the House of Commons on the 5th of November 1647, and the Larger on the 14th of April 1648. This completed the regular business of the Westminster Assembly. The valuable documents had been prepared, the drawing up of which had been the main object for which the Assembly had been convened, and it remained for the Legislature of the country to approve or reject them on their own responsibility. But the Parliament neither sanctioned nor refused to sanction the productions of the Assembly; nor yet would they dissolve the Assembly for some time, hoping that a pacific arrangement with the king might yet be effected. On this account the Assembly continued to hold its sittings till the 22d of February 1649, about three weeks after the king had been beheaded, having sat five years, six months, and twenty-two days; in which time they had held one thousand one hundred and sixty-three sessions. Thus closed one of the most memorable assemblies which has ever sat in the history of the Christian Church.

ASSENT, that act of mind by which it acknowledges any proposition to be either true or false. There are three degrees of assent — conjecture, opinion, and belief. Conjecture is but a slight and weak inclination to assent to the thing proposed, by reason of the weighty objections that lie against it. Opinion is a more steady and fixed assent, when a man is almost certain, though yet some fear of the contrary remains with him. Belief is a more full and assured assent to the truth. See BELIEF.

ASSHUR, a son of Shem, who gave name to Assyria. It is believed that he dwelt originally in the land of Shinar, and about Babylonia; but was compelled by Nimrod to remove thence, towards the springs of the Tigris, in the province of Assyria, where he built Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen. This is the sense generally given to Gen. x. 11, 12: "Out of that land (Shinar) went forth Asshur, and builded Nineveh," &c. But others understood it to speak of Nimrod, who left his own country and attacked Assyria, which he overcame, built Nineveh, and here established the seat of his empire. The Prophet Micah (v. 6) calls Assyria the land of Nimrod. See ASSYRIA.

ASSHURIM, the sons of Dedan, (Gen. xxv. 3), a people of Arabia.

ASSIDEANS, sometimes called CHASIDIM, from a Hebrew word signifying merciful, pious. It was from this sect the Pharisees sprung. They seem to have been a numerous and powerful sect in the time of the Maccabees. They usually swore by the temple, as in their eyes an oath of the strictest kind. They observed strictly the traditions of the elders. A company of them resorted to Mattathias, to fight for the law of God, and the liberties of their country. This sect arose either during the captivity, or soon after the restoration, of the Jews; and were probably in the commencement, and long afterward, a truly pious part of the nation; but they at length became superstitious. The following is the account given by Dr Prideaux of the origin of this ancient sect of the Jews:—"After the return of the Jews from Babylon, and the full settling of the Jewish Church again in Judea by Ezra and Nehemiah, there arose two parties of men among them; the one, who, adhering to the written Word, held, that in the observance of that alone they fulfilled all righteousness, and, therefore, thought this alone sufficient to entitle them to the name of Zadikim,—that is, the righteous: the other, who, over and above the written Law, superadded the traditional constitutions of the elders, and other rigorous observances, which, by way of supererogation, they voluntarily devoted themselves to, and, therefore, from hence being reckoned of a superior degree of holiness above the others, they were called Chasidim,—that is, the pious, who are the same that are mentioned in the Maccabees by the name of Assideans. From the former of these proceeded the Samaritans, the Sadducees, and the Karaites; and from the latter, the Pharisees and the Essenes."

ASSOCIATION OF IDEAS. This expression is usually employed by writers on the science of mind to designate the principle of connection which exists among our thoughts. For this term Dr Brown substituted that of suggestion, with the view of avoiding all tendency to the assertion of any particular opinion as to the mode of connection. Whatever name is employed, nothing more is meant than that one thought is followed by another, according to regularly operating principles. What, then, are the principles which explain this connection? The laws which have been most commonly admitted by the most distinguished writers on the science of mind are, resemblance, contrast, and contiguity in time and place; and to illustrate each of them, numerous instances are adduced tending to show that there are many successive thoughts which may be reduced under these general heads.

It is a striking proof of the tendency which error has to perpetuate itself, that Reid, and Stewart, and even Brown, have thought fit to illustrate these laws of association at great length, as if they had been the fixed and established principles, according to which, in all cases, without a single exception, thought recurs. The mere fact of the occasional presence of such relations as resemblance and contiguity among our trains of thought, is sufficient to show, that such relations are cognizable by the human mind; but the circumstance that they are only occasionally present, ought to have been regarded as a satisfactory proof that these, at all events, were not the causes of the recurrence of our thoughts. The fact is, the principle of causation is the same in the world of mind as in the world of matter,—that of invariable antecedence and consequence. The great difficulty, however, in tracing the principle which regulates the recurrence of thought, is to discover the particular mental antecedent, which, in every case, corresponds to a particular consequent. Sometimes it is of an emotional, and sometimes of a strictly intellectual character; and the analysis of any train of thought is nothing more than the discovery of the corresponding antecedents and consequents; or, in other words, the discovery of those thoughts which, from their former co-existence, have a tendency again to recur.

On this single principle of co-existence, it is easy to explain the varied appearances which present themselves in the operation of the laws of mind. Thus contiguity is only another expression for co-existence, and therefore is nothing more than an admission of the principle which we have been illustrating; and as it is a well-known mode of expressing the law of causation, that in similar circumstances similar causes produce similar effects, it is not difficult to perceive, that in many cases similarity should be observed to be so strikingly characteristic of the thoughts immediately succeeding each other, as to be mistaken for a law by which thoughts are connected.

This tendency to substitute an occasional circumstance for a real cause, has given rise to many fallacious speculations in science; and it is an error against which Bacon warns philosophic inquirers, in his Novum Organon. It is possible by habit, as Locke has well remarked, to convert a mere casual association into one of permanence; and what is this but to establish the co-existence in its invariable and most inveterate form? And as to what are termed accidental associations, they may be viewed as holding a place in the mental world corresponding to events which are accidental in the physical world, being such as are so imperfectly known by us, that we are incapable of tracing the corresponding antecedent to which they owe their origin.

Co-existence, then, is the single principle according to which thoughts recur, just as invariable sequence is the single principle according to which material phenomena recur. Causation is in both cases the law of succession, and the introduction of other principles under the name of primary laws of association, has not merely tended to confuse, but to falsify the science of mind; and as to the secondary laws, as they are called, of Dr Brown, they are to be regarded as nothing more than circumstances which tend to modify, in its operation, the law of succession.

No principle of our nature is more important as an object of inquiry both to the minister of Christ and to the instructor of youth, than that which we have now been considering. It is a melancholy fact in heathen nations, so perverted have the minds of the people become, that even moral crimes have ceased to be connected in their minds with even the slightest degree of turpitude. Thus we find malice and revenge exalted into virtues among savage tribes, and the patient forbearance of the Christian stamped as the basest cowardice. Among the Romans suicide was a virtue; among Christians it is a crime of the deepest dye. The South Sea Islanders and the ancient Lacedæmonians practised theft without scruple; while, by the laws of Europe, it is punished with death. Such facts point out to us the extensive influence of association, and the necessity of the thoughts being directed from childhood into a true scriptural channel.

ASSOS, a sea-port town of Asia Minor, situated to the south of Troas, and over against the island of Lesbos or Mitylene. The neighbourhood of Troas was famed for quarries of sarcophagus stone, where, according to Pliny, dead bodies were consumed in forty days. The evangelist Luke, and others of Paul's companions, went by sea from Troas to Assos, but Paul went thither by land, and meeting them in Assos, they proceeded to Mitylene. We have no account in history of any Christian church in that town till a considerably advanced period. It is in the eighth century that John, bishop of Assos, is said to have been in the Nicene council; although, no doubt, its inhabitants had embraced the gospel long before that period. Troas was a city of the territory of Tarsus. Commentators have been at a loss to explain why Paul should have preferred travelling by land to Assos. Dr Doddridge thinks that it was that he might enjoy a little longer the company of his friends at Troas. It is now supposed to be a poor village called Beiram. Calmet mentions several cities named Assos. 1. A maritime city in Lycia. 2. Another in the territory of Eolis. 3. Another in Mysia. 4. Another in Lydia. 5. Another in Epirus.

ASSUMPTION, a festival in the Romish Church, in honour of the pretended miraculous ascent of the Virgin, body and soul, into heaven. It was established in the seventh century, and fixed to the 15th of August. The assumption of Mary was not always a point of faith; the ancient martyrologies speak of it with very great reserve, as a thing not fully ascertained; yet is it at present universally believed in the Roman Church, and a divine who should deny it would be obliged to retract. The Greek Church also celebrate the festival of the Assumption on the 15th of August. The most ridiculous fables are believed on this subject. There were two apocryphal books, entitled 'The Assumption of Moses,' and 'The Assumption of the Virgin.'

ASSURANCE, the firm persuasion or undoubting impression of the certainty of any thing. In theological language, the term is used in a threefold sense, assurance of the understanding, assurance of faith, and assurance of hope.

1. The first of these different kinds of assurance is thus mentioned by the Apostle Paul: "That their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ." Col. ii. 2. This "full assurance" is obviously a firm belief of the truth of what is believed, founded on a clear perception of its truth, by the illuminating influence of the Spirit upon the understanding. The truth is seen by the mental eye, and therefore it is believed. Now this is evidently a high Christian attainment belonging to an advanced period in the history of the Divine life in the soul. It supposes the Christian not only firmly to believe the truth, but also clearly to see that it is the truth of God. Thus, "That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him." Eph. i. 17.

2. The second species of assurance, or that which is termed assurance of faith, may be defined to be a firm belief of the record which God hath given us of his Son, and an entire dependence on him. To this the Apostle Paul refers in Heb. x. 22: "Let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water." In this case the object of which we are assured is the truth of the Word of God, not as in the assurance of understanding from an intellectual perception of its truth, but from an implicit surrender of the soul to the force of the Divine testimony. In the former case, we are in the situation of the apostle when he says, "That which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life; that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you;" and in the latter case we are in the position of the apostle, when he declares, "We have believed, therefore have we spoken." The ground on which the assurance of faith rests, is the perfect credibility of the Divine testimony. It is therefore simply faith in a higher and more intense degree of energy, and such as only manifests itself in advanced believers.

3. The last species of assurance, or that which receives the name of assurance of hope, is a firm belief that we are savingly interested in the Lord Jesus Christ, and are really the children of God. This is spoken of in Heb. vi. 11: "And we desire that every one of you do show the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end." The assurance in this case has reference not to the object of Christian belief, but to the personal condition of the believer. It is on a reflex examination of the nature, and reality, and practical efficacy of his faith, that he arrives at the conclusion that he is a true believer, and consequently will experience the truth of the Divine declaration, "He that believeth shall be saved." In this instance, the man is supposed to be assured of eternal salvation, and on this point assurance can only be obtained by a careful examination whether or not he be a true believer. He must be looking, not outwards, towards the object of faith; but inwards, towards the subject of faith. He is exercising a reflex, in opposition to a direct act of faith.

Such, then, being the three different senses in which the term assurance is used in Scripture, when the question is proposed, Whether assurance is of the essence of faith?—a question which has been often and keenly discussed by theological writers,—it is necessary to bear in mind the important distinctions to which we have adverted. If by assurance be meant a firm persuasion of the truth of the Divine testimony, then we hesitate not to declare that it is essential to faith; but if by the use of the term, we mean to indicate the believer's persuasion of his own personal salvation, however desirable such an attainment is, and however anxiously it ought to be aimed at, still we cannot admit that it is, in any sense, of the essence of saving faith. It is not, properly speaking, an act of faith, but a process of reasoning, founded upon faith. It may, therefore, be more properly termed an assurance of sense than of faith, being founded on a reflex examination of our own feelings and dispositions.

ASSYRIA, an ancient kingdom or empire of Asia, deriving its name from Asshur, the second son of Shem. Considerable difference of opinion exists among commentators as to the real meaning of Gen. x. 11, and hence it is doubtful whether Nineveh the capital of Assyria was founded by Asshur or Nimrod. Sir Isaac Newton assigns an origin to the empire so modern as to date it only from the days of Pul. This monarch, at all events, who is supposed by Dr Prideaux to have been the father of Sardanapalus, greatly enlarged the boundaries of the kingdom. Pul was succeeded by Tiglath-Pileser under whose government the Assyrian empire became the ruling power in the East. He also conquered the kingdom of Israel and carried away part of the ten tribes beyond the Euphrates, the remainder, along with Hoshea, king of Israel, being carried into Media by his son and successor, Shalmaneser. Israel now became tributary to Assyria, until Hezekiah threw off the yoke and brought Sennacherib to the gates of Jerusalem, where the divine vengeance overtook him, and his whole army were slain in a night. 2 Kings xix. 35. In process of time, the kingdom of Assyria was subverted according to the predictions of Isaiah, Nahum, and Zephaniah, and partitioned among the Babylonians and Medes. According to the chronology of Sir Isaac Newton, the fall of the Assyrian empire happened about the third year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, B.C. 607. The province of Assyria is now called Kurdistan, and forms a part of the Persian empire. It is remarkable for little except the robberies of the Kurds.

ASTARTE, or ASHTORETH, or ASTORETH. A female divinity worshipped by the Sidonians and by the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi. 10), and after their example, by the Hebrews, in the days of the Judges and Solomon, with great observance, and in connection with Baal. The extent of this worship among the Phœnicians and Carthaginians, is shown by the frequent occurrence of this name in the proper names both of men and women. Greek and Roman writers compare this name, partly with Juno, more commonly with Venus and the Moon. From this latter circumstance, the figure of the idol Astarte was generally horned. It is called by Jeremiah "The queen of heaven" (vii. 18, xlv. 17-25.) A temple was erected to this idol, at the city of Hierapolis in Syria, where three hundred priests attended at her altar, and were constantly employed in offering sacrifices. Solomon, seduced from his allegiance to the God of his fathers through the influence of his foreign wives, introduced the worship of Ashtoreth in Israel, and built a temple to her on the Mount of Olives. The worship of this deity was finally abolished by Josiah. 2 Kings xxiii. 13, 14. We learn from profane writers that Astarte was worshipped under different names in many countries as the productive power of nature or the principle of conception and parturition. It was the chief female deity, or the moon, while Baal was the chief male deity, or the sun. Hence the two idols are combined in Judges ii. 13.

ASTROLOGY, predicting by the stars. That astrology was sedulously cultivated in the East, especially in Chaldea, appears from various passages, as Isa. xlvii. 13; Jer. l. 35; Dan. i. 20. Moses tells us, that there were in his time magicians or enchanters in Egypt (Exod. vii. 11), who are denominated mekashphim, "because," says Professor Jahn, "they computed eclipses of the sun and moon, and pretended to the people that they produced them by the efficacy of their own enchantments." Astrology was prohibited to the Hebrews, as we learn from Deut. xviii. 10; Lev. xx. 27. Daniel studied the art of astrology at Babylon, but he did not practise it. So famed were the Chaldeans in this art, that at length a Chaldean came to be synonymous with an astrologer. They appear to have formed the learned caste, occupying the same station as the priests did in Egypt. From their long and continued observation of the stars, they pretended to foretell future events. The sun, moon, and planets, they called interpreters, as making known the will of the gods; their rising, setting, colour, and other particulars connected with them, were held to presage hurricanes, droughts, earthquakes, and other public calamities, as well as private disasters. The planets they alleged to exercise an influence for good or evil upon the destinies of men. Such were the pretensions of astrology, and it is not at all surprising, that with the advance of true scientific knowledge, the claims of this absurd system of divination should have entirely passed away.

ASTRONOMY, the study of the heavenly bodies, which is undoubtedly the most sublime of all the sciences, and the first which was carefully studied by man. The most ancient records of the history of the sciences, as far as profane authors are concerned, are those which Josephus the Hebrew gives of the Antediluvians, and these regard astronomy. But his remarks are few, and these are placed not altogether beyond the reach of doubt. We can say little more of the astronomy of the Asiatic nations, from whom we have received the principles of this science. Bailly wishes to give, particularly to the Indian astronomy, a very remote antiquity, asserting that astronomy must have been cultivated 3102 years before the Christian era. But these eras are very seldom to be much trusted; and we know that the ancients, while they speak of the studies of the Indians, say nothing in particular of their astronomy. We do not doubt, however, that astronomy was cultivated among the Indians, even from the most ancient times. But they have not left monuments sufficient to enable us to speak of them with any degree of certainty.

From the ancients we have received the first principles of astronomy, which are the foundation of the whole science. The division of time into days, months, and years, the constitution of the zodiac, the formation of signs and constellations, the distinction of planets and of fixed stars, the establishment of the poles, and of the solstitial and equinoctial points, and other similar things, which are now looked upon as astronomical, required then many observations, and attentive and repeated speculations; nor did they deserve less praise than the discoveries of the aberration of the fixed stars, and of the rotation of the terrestrial axis in the astronomy of modern times. Whatever nation first studied astronomy, we only recognise the Greeks as our masters. But they, by their own confession, received instruction from foreign nations. The Chaldeans and Egyptians may be regarded as the masters of the Greeks. Callisthenes, if we may credit Porphyry, cited by Simplicius, brought from the Chaldeans astronomical observations of one thousand nine hundred and three years; that is, from 2227 B.C. Epigenes found others very ancient. Hipparchus and Ptolemy, in their theories of the eclipses, made use of some observations by the same. Apollonius, who was very well skilled in natural observations, as Seneca says, learned in the schools of the Chaldeans that comets are not exhalations and transitory fires, but constant bodies, and lasting like the planets, and that their courses were known. Geminius and Suidas described the lunisolar period as derived from the astronomy of the Chaldeans. Herodotus traces to them the invention of the sun dial. The Egyptians had still greater share in the astronomical instruction of the Greeks. Thales, Pythagoras, Eudoxus, Plato, the first astronomers of Greece, derived the elements of that science from the Egyptians; nor did the Greek astronomy ever make any remarkable advance till it was established in Egypt in the school of Alexandria. The observations of the Chaldeans on eclipses which yet remain, are upon lunar eclipses; but the Egyptians observed both lunar and solar; and from the time of Vulean, son of Nilus, down to Alexander, they observed, according to Laertius, three hundred and seventy-three eclipses of the sun, and eight hundred and thirty-two of the moon; which agrees justly enough with the periods of both. The various divisions of their years,—the observation of the heliacal rising, as astronomers say, of Sirius or Canicula,—the period of fourteen hundred and sixty-one years, or the Canicular year, which they instituted upon the withdrawal of a day every four years from the appearance of that star,—the situation of the pyramids exactly towards the four cardinal points of the compass,—the methods of calculating the eclipses, and various other monuments of astronomical knowledge,—prove that the Egyptians observed the stars with attention, that they formed ingenious results, and that they had some right to the title which they arrogated, of fathers and masters of astronomy. Very scanty information is afforded in the Scriptures relative to the solar system. The ancient Hebrews believed that there were three heavens,—the atmosphere, or that between the surface of the earth and the clouds; the expanse above the clouds; and the heaven of heavens, or peculiar dwelling-place of Jehovah. An evidence that an attempt was made, at a very early period, to regulate the year by the annual revolution of the sun, may be found in the fact, that the Jewish months were divided into thirty days each. Gen. vii. 11, viii. 4. Mention is made in the Book of Job of particular stars, and also of constellations; but whatever may have been the extent of the observation of the ancient Hebrews and Chaldeans, they were completely ignorant of the principles and laws which form the science of physical astronomy.

ASTYAGES, a king of Media, who also bore the name of Cyaxares. He is not mentioned in Scripture, but his son Astyages or Darius is mentioned in the book of Daniel. This last had two daughters, one of whom was married to Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar king of Chaldea, and the other was married to Cambyses the Persian, and was mother of Cyrus, by whose decree the Jews were delivered from the Babylonish captivity. Astyages, the son, seems to bear different names in Scripture. In Dan. ix. 1, he is called Ahasuerus; in Dan. vi. 1, Artaxerxes; and in Dan. v. 31, Darius the Mede. He received from his father the government of Media. He was along with Cyrus at the conquest of Babylon, and succeeded Belshazzar when that king was slain, as is expressly mentioned in Dan. v. 30, 31:—"In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain. And Darius the Median took the kingdom, being about threescore and two years old."

ASUPPIM, HOUSE OF. This word occurs, 1 Chron. xxvi. 15. Asuppim signifies gatherings. Hence the phrase is used evidently for a store-house; probably of precious things connected with the temple.

ASYLUM. See REFUGE, CITIES OF.

ASYNCRITUS a person mentioned by the Apostle Paul in Rom. xvi. 14. The Greeks say that he was Bishop of Hyrcania, and observe a festival in his honour.

ATAD. At Atad's threshing-floor (Gen. 1. 11) the sons of Jacob, and the Egyptians who accompanied them, mourned for Jacob; whence it was afterwards called Abel-mizraim, "the mourning of the Egyptians." (See ABEL-MIZRAIM.) Jerome says that this place was situated between Jordan and Jericho, two miles from the river, and three from the city. Dr Wells places it on the west of the Jordan, and not far from Hebron, and says that it is uncertain whether Atad is the name of a place or of a man.

ATAROTH. There are several cities of this name:—1. One in the tribe of Gad, beyond Jordan. Numb. xxxii. 3, 34. 2. Another on the frontiers of Ephraim, probably Ataroth-addar. Josh. xvi. 5, 7, xviii. 13. 3. ATAROTH BETH-JOAB, in Judah. 1 Chron. ii. 54.

ATHACH, a city of Judah, one of the cities to which David sent a portion of the spoil taken from the Amalekites, 1 Sam. xxx. 30.

ATHALIAH, the daughter of Ahab, king of Israel, the granddaughter of Omri, king of Samaria, and the wife of Jehoram, king of Judah. Jehu having slain her son, Ahaziah, she seized the kingdom, and destroyed all the sons of Jehoram by other wives, except Jehoash, who was providentially saved by his father's sister, Jehosheba. After six years' usurpation, Athaliah was slain, and Jehoash succeeded to the throne.

ATHANASIAN CREED. This creed declares, "The catholic faith is this: that we worship one God in trinity, and trinity in unity—neither confounding the persons nor dividing the substance. For there is one person of the Father, another of the Son, and another of the Holy Ghost. But the Godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is all one; the glory equal, the majesty co-eternal." "The Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God; and yet there are not three Gods, but one God. So likewise the Father is Lord, the Son Lord, and the Holy Ghost Lord; and yet not three Lords, but one Lord." "The Father is made of none, neither created nor begotten. The Son is of the Father alone; neither made nor created, but begotten. The Holy Ghost is of the Father and the Son; neither made, nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding." This creed was formed in opposition to the Sabellians and the Arians.

The eternal generation of the Son of God forms an essential part of this creed, as well as of the Nicene; it is on this principle that the Son is called "God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made;" which certainly does not apply to the human nature of Christ, which was "made of a woman,—made under the law." Most certain it is, that many of the Christian fathers maintain this mysterious doctrine of eternal generation; and it has had able defenders, down to Dr J. Owen, Dr Waterland, Dr Edward Williams, and Andrew Fuller. On the other hand, some Trinitarians, equally zealous, have considered the opinion as both inconsistent in itself, and derogatory to the Son of God,—“as implying derivation and inferiority,” though certainly not so intended by the Athanasians. Dr Watts, and other advocates for the pre-existence of Christ's human soul, have considered the production of this first of creatures as the highest sense in which our Saviour is in Scripture called "the Son of God." The Supreme Being is, in all respects, so infinitely above the conception of men, and perhaps of angels, that it becomes us to conduct all speculations relative to the Deity with reverence, and even awe; to veil our faith under the wings of devotion, as the seraphim cover their faces while they worship.

But the exceptionable part of this creed lies in what are commonly called "the damnatory clauses,"—"Whosoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the catholic faith; which faith, except every one do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly. And the catholic faith is this,"—proceeding to the statements of the doctrine of the Trinity above given. Now, it is most certain that we cannot use too much caution on this subject. The Scripture, indeed, speaks of faith in Christ as necessary to salvation, but refers rather, perhaps, to the vital principle itself, than to any form of confession; and it seems, above all things, improper to mingle anathemas with our devotions.

ATHEISM, in the strict and proper sense of the word, is a denial of the existence of a God. It is compounded of the two terms, a, negative, and Theos, God, signifying without God. Atheists have been also known by the name Infidels; but the word Infidel is now commonly used to distinguish a more numerous party, and is become almost synonymous with Deist. He who disbelieves the existence of a God, is a speculative Atheist; he who professes to believe in God, and yet lives and acts as if he entertained no such belief, is a practical Atheist. So completely opposed to the first principles of our nature is speculative Atheism, that many have doubted whether an Atheist from conviction has ever existed. That Atheism, absurd and irrational, however, as it is, has had its votaries, both in ancient and in modern times, cannot be denied. In the early history of the human mind, the transition was rapid, from the unintelligible wonders of nature, to the workings of a Superior Intelligence. All nature was spiritualized. Not only was there believed to be a soul in man, but in the plants, the animals, the very elements, nay, the world itself; so that even the abstract idealism of Fichté and Schelling arrives, with all its laborious and transcendental speculations, at nearly the same conclusions with the earliest exertions of human reason. From final causes, man seems in his speculations almost to have taken his departure at first as from a point the most obvious to his mind. It was the natural outgoings of man towards a Being, in the knowledge of whom all his future knowledge could only find its consummation and its end.

Among the ancient philosophers, both of Greece and Rome, were found several open and avowed Atheists. Some asserted the eternity of the world, and others that it had its origin in a fortuitous concourse of atoms. From the Christian era, till the days of Spinoza, Atheism as a creed was unknown. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, advocates of this system arose in Italy, France, and England. Of all the systems of opinion that have ever been broached, Atheism is the most absurd and contradictory. Archbishop Tillotson rightly considers it as unreasonable, for five reasons:—1. Because it gives no tolerable account of the existence of the world. 2. Because it does not give any reasonable account of the universal consent of mankind in this apprehension, that there is a God. 3. Because it requires more evidence for things than they are capable of giving. 4. Because the Atheist pretends to know that which no man can know. 5. Because Atheism contradicts itself. The absurdity of Atheism is thus strikingly noticed by John Foster:—"The wonder turns on the great process by which a man could grow to the immense intelligence that can know there is no God. What ages and what lights are requisite for this attainment! This intelligence involves the very attributes of Divinity, while a God is denied. For unless this man is omnipresent, unless he is at this moment in every place in the universe, he cannot know but there may be in some place manifestations of a Deity by which even he would be overpowered. If he does not absolutely know every agent in the universe, the one that he does not know may be God. If he is not himself the chief agent in the universe, and does not know what is so, that which is so may be God. If he is not in absolute possession of all the propositions that constitute universal truth, the one which he wants may be that there is a God. If he cannot with certainty assign the cause of all that he perceives to exist, that cause may be a God. If he does not know every thing that has been done in the immeasurable ages that are past, some things may have been done by a God. Thus, unless he knows all things, that is, precludes another Deity by being one himself, he cannot know that the Being whose existence he rejects does not exist." Atheism is sometimes divided into two heads, explicit and constructive. These two species are thus explained by Dr Dick in his Lectures on Theology:—"Explicit Atheism consists in the formal denial of the existence of God. He is an Atheist who excludes from the universe any other intelligence than that of the human mind; says that it is eternal; that there is nothing in it but matter and motion, and talks of nature, and chance, and fate,—words which have no meaning, but serve as a substitute in discourse for the name of a living, designing Agent, by whom all things were created and are governed. Atheism is so contrary, not only to the general sentiments of mankind, but to the clearest deductions of reason, that some have supposed it to be impossible that any man could be an Atheist, and have thought that those who were reputed Atheists in ancient times were falsely charged with this crime, because they treated the gods who were commonly worshipped with contempt. It is not necessary to examine whether this opinion is true or false, because, whatever judgment may be pronounced upon certain old philosophers, some of the moderns have put the matter out of doubt by an undisguised avowal of their unbelief. Atheists have appeared in our own age, and in our own country.—By constructive Atheism, I mean sentiments which amount to the denial of God, or lead to this conclusion, although they do not formally express it. Such Atheism was charged upon Epicurus and his followers, who represented them as removed to a distance from mortals, and taking no interest in their affairs. The charge may be brought, with justice, against those who deny the providence of God; who consider him as limited in essence and knowledge, as did the elder Socinians; or divest him of any of his attributes, and substitute in the room of the transcendently just and all-perfect Being of the Scriptures, a God fashioned according to their own likeness, an idol of their own brain. Under this head we may include what is called practical Atheism, by which is meant such conduct as virtually contradicts the profession of the lips; and accordingly, an apostle speaks of some, 'who profess to know God, but in works deny him, being abominable and disobedient, and to every good work reprobate.' And certainly the man, whose profane and lawless conduct indicates that he has renounced the authority of God, or calls in question his omnipotence and his justice, is guilty of violating the precept—which requires a practical, and not merely a verbal, acknowledgment of him,—as well as the man who ventures to impugn his existence." Dr Sprague judiciously points out the debasing influence of Atheism upon the understanding and conscience. "Any system of error," he remarks, "and especially any which deeply involves man's relations to his Creator, must have a tendency to pervert the moral discernment; but if this is true, even of those systems which still recognise the existence of a God, what must not be true of Atheism, which begins by blotting out the doctrine of the Divine existence? Is not the soul that believes there is no God, no rule of duty, no future retribution, in a moral midnight? And if conscience really forms any enlightened decisions where such a creed is professedly held, does it not prove that it has within itself some beams of natural light which even the blackness of Atheism cannot quench; that it practically, however feebly, holds on upon some great truths, while the language of the lips would seem to imply that it had cut loose from all of them?"

On the moral responsibility even of the Atheist, the following striking remarks occur in the Rev. Dr Chalmers' work 'On Natural Theology':—"Man is not to blame, if an Atheist, because of the want of proof; but he is to blame, if an Atheist, because he has shut his eyes. He is not to blame that the evidence for a God has not been seen by him, if no such evidence there were within the field of his observation; but he is to blame, if the evidence have not been seen, because he turned away his attention from it. That the question of a God may lie unresolved in his mind, all he has to do, is to refuse a hearing to the question. He may abide without the conviction of a God, if he so choose; but this his choice is matter of condemnation. To resist God after that he is known, is criminality towards him; but to be satisfied that he should remain unknown, is like criminality towards him. There is a moral perversity of spirit with him who is willing, in the midst of many objects of gratification, that there should not be one object of gratitude. It is thus that, even in the ignorance of God, there may be a responsibility towards God. The Discerner of the heart sees whether, for the blessings innumerable wherewith he has strewed the path of every man, he be treated like the unknown benefactor who was diligently sought, or like the unknown benefactor who was never cared for. In respect at least of desire after God, the same distinction of character may be observed between one man and another,—whether God be wrapt in mystery, or stand forth in full development to our world. Even though a mantle of deepest obscurity lay over the question of his existence, this would not efface the distinction between the piety, on the one hand, which laboured and aspired after him, and the impiety, upon the other, which never missed the evidence that it did not care for, and so grovelled in the midst of its own sensuality and selfishness. The eye of a heavenly Witness is upon all these varieties; and thus, whether it be darkness or whether it be dislike which hath caused a people to be ignorant of God, there is with him a clear principle of judgment, that he can extend even to the outfields of Atheism." That man may well be termed "a fool" who says there is no God.

ATHENS, a city of ancient Greece, distinguished not merely for political greatness and military power, but rendered still more illustrious by the glory it acquired from the learning, eloquence, and politeness of its inhabitants, and from the arts and sciences which were indebted to it either for their origin or their perfection.

The visit of Paul to this famous city, is one of the most striking events in his history. At that period, especially, when the light of the gospel began to dawn upon the world, the people of Athens had reached a high degree of cultivation. There philosophy and polite literature were alike enthroned. The emporium of commerce, and the eye of Greece, Athens appears to have been the school of the world, the focus in which were concentrated the brightest rays of Grecian science and of Grecian art. When, therefore, an individual such as Paul, who relished the truly noble pleasures of intellectual cultivation, entered Athens, what must have been his feelings? While all the fond emotions and inexpressible delights of scientific pursuit recurred to his mind, we might imagine that his feelings would harmonize with the beauty, the grandeur, the magnificence of the scene. But far different were the thoughts and the feelings with which Paul viewed the proud monuments of human genius, which on every side met his eye. We are told by the sacred historian, that "his spirit was stirred within him when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry." The architectural grandeur, and the costly ornaments of their temples, presented to his mind only the most striking proofs of the lowest moral degradation. He felt the deepest moral indignation at the insult offered to the true God, in the worship of a people the most enlightened in the world. To what line of conduct, then, did his feelings lead? "He disputed in the synagogues with the Jews, and with the devout persons, and in the markets daily, with them that met with him." With that zeal and boldness which uniformly characterized the apostle, he gave instructions daily in the market, or place of public resort, to all with whom he had an opportunity of conversing. Pointing, no doubt, to the various temples with which he was surrounded, he would endeavour to convince them of the folly and impiety with which they were chargeable; and he would probably take occasion to instruct them in these first and fundamental truths of the Christian religion,—that "there is one God, and one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus."

The novelty of such tenets appears to have engaged the fancy of the Athenians, so that, ere long, the apostle met with opposition from the schools of philosophy. "Then certain philosophers of the Epicureans and of the Stoics encountered him." In all the pride of learning, these two sects, whose opinions were, of all the Grecian sects, the most opposed to each other, united in encountering this innovator, whose doctrines had already attracted so much attention. Did we attempt to compare, or rather to contrast the opinions of these philosophers, with the awful and imposing doctrines which Christianity proclaims, we would discover a full and satisfactory reason for that jealousy and alarm which seized these boasted masters of science, and determined them to check the progress of the new opinions. "And some of them said, What will this babbler say?" These, we may suppose, had either received no distinct statement of the apostle's doctrines, or their judgment was so blinded by passion and prejudice, that they failed to perceive their real weight and importance. The word here translated "babbling," might be more literally rendered, "one who sows his words like seed;" thereby indicating, that the Athenians considered Paul as one who spoke inconsiderately, and who gave utterance at random to sentiments which he himself did not understand. The reason of such an epithet is obvious. The truths to which the apostle invited the attention of the Athenians, were in complete discordance with those modes of speech and habits of thought to which they had been accustomed; and, therefore, the beautiful and connected system of Christian truth appeared to them a mass of incoherent and unconnected statements.

Others, again, who had listened more attentively to the apostle's instructions, but who were still lamentably ignorant of their real nature, asserted that Paul seemed to be "a setter forth of strange gods," because he "preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection." From these words it would appear that the apostle had declared unto his auditors the equality which subsists between the Father and the Son, and the ascension of Jesus to the right hand of the Majesty on high. On what grounds the Athenians classed the resurrection in the number of the gods, is not so apparent. The greater part of the commentators have imagined that they might regard the resurrection as a goddess, with equal propriety as concord, hope, &c., to whom they reared temples. It is difficult, however, to accede to this opinion, when we reflect that the doctrine of the resurrection must have been familiar to the Athenians, having been taught in one shape or other by several of their own philosophers. This doctrine, although disbelieved by many, was publicly taught by more than one of the Grecian sects, as well as by the Chaldeans, to whom the origin of their philosophy might be ultimately traced. Their mistake, therefore, most probably arose, not from the doctrine itself, but from the manner in which it was illustrated. Perhaps, dazzled with the description of the heavenly world, they imagined that the apostle was investing the saints with all the honours of deity, and thus adding to the number of the gods. The Athenians, however, not contented with the vague accounts of the Christian doctrines spread by report, were anxious to hear a full statement of them from the mouth of Paul himself. They led him, therefore, to the Areopagus. This was a court of great authority, held, as the name imports, on a hill sacred to Mars. It was composed of a considerable number of upright and experienced men, appointed to take cognizance of offences committed either in civil or religious matters. From the whole course of the narration, it would appear that Paul was considered rather as a deluded fanatic, than as a criminal. They were anxious to know what opinions he would dare to promulgate in their learned city. They asked him, therefore, apparently with a contemptuous sneer, "May we know what this new doctrine is whereof thou speakest? For thou bringest certain strange things to our ears: we would know, therefore, what these things mean." As an explanation of the narrative, the historian adds, in a parenthesis, "For the Athenians and strangers which were there, spent their time in nothing else than to tell or to hear some new thing."

There is nothing which, in perusing the history of a people, a reflecting mind regards with more suspicion, than any general remark on the disposition of their minds; for there is such a diversity in the general, much more the minute, appearance of individual minds, that it appears nothing less than absurdity to assert, that the same disposition exists in the minds of all the inhabitants in such a large and populous city as Athens. And, no doubt, the remark of the sacred writer would have met with that distrust, and even disbelief, which all such expressions commonly receive; but fortunately the same remark has been made, in nearly the same terms, by their most celebrated orator, Demosthenes. There were many peculiar circumstances, besides, in the intellectual and political condition of this singular people, which might combine in the formation of this general habit. By the reproachful and contemptuous manner in which the apostle was called upon to state his doctrines, we might suppose that he would have been depressed and discouraged. But, as little depressed by their scorn as he would have been awed by their frowns, we are told that Paul stood forth in the midst of Mars' Hill, and cried, "Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious." The word here translated "superstitious," might have, perhaps, been more accurately rendered, "a worshipper of demons." As a belief in the existence and influence of such beings was almost universal among the Greeks, the original word was commonly employed in a favourable sense, as indicating a devout person. The apostle most probably uses it in this meaning, to express his opinion, that the Athenians had more temples, and were more uniformly attentive to religious duties, than the other places of Greece which he had visited. As a proof of this general remark, he proceeds to bring forward a fact which had come under his own observation: "For as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, To the unknown God."

Amidst the almost incredible number of their deities, the Greeks had, perhaps, few which had not been derived from the various nations with whom they had intercourse. Numerous instances, were it necessary, might be adduced, to prove that they borrowed the greater part of their mythology, as well as their philosophy, from the Egyptians and Chaldeans; and, as if they had been determined to omit none, they had reared an altar "to the unknown God." (See ALTAR AT ATHENS.) Divines are almost uniformly of opinion, that by this expression is meant the God of the Jews. This opinion is rendered almost certain, when we consider that the Jews, although so numerous in Athens as to have synagogues for their worship, yet in religious matters despised the Gentile world. They held intercourse with all around them in a civil and commercial, but never in a religious capacity. It is highly probable, therefore, that the attributes of the true God, whom the Jews worshipped, would be altogether unknown to the Athenians.

ATONEMENT, expiation or satisfaction for sin. The term usually employed under the Law to express this idea was Kaphar, which literally means "to cover," Ps. xxxii. 1; Lev. xvi. 30. The corresponding word employed by the Septuagint is ilasmos, a propitiation. The true atonement or propitiation, and that which all the sacrifices under the Law typified, was the atonement of Jesus Christ, or that propitiatory offering which he made by his death on Calvary, covering, expiating, making a propitiation for the sins of his people. He was the substitute of sinners, and in their room he voluntarily rendered to Jehovah the Father that satisfaction for sin which the character, the government, and the law of God demanded. From the earliest ages the idea of propitiation or atonement for sin had been familiar to man, but the substitution of Emmanuel, God with us, God in our nature, was a conception which could never have occurred to man without a divine revelation. The prevalence of sacrifice, from the earliest ages, merely showed that there existed in the mind of man a deep consciousness of guilt in the sight of a holy God, and a heartfelt sense that an expiation or atonement was necessary. But the actual atonement provided by our offended Creator, the grand truth conveyed in that sublime passage of Holy Writ, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John iii. 16), far exceeds the power of human reason to discover. Man's boasted intellect must bow with profound humility before that simple but sublime statement of the Word of God—a statement which embodies the fact of an atonement having actually been made by which sin was expiated, and all the demands of law and justice fully and for ever satisfied. Let us then try to unfold the principles of the atonement.

The atonement, properly speaking, is a moral, and not a commercial transaction. Crimes may be atoned for, but debts cannot be. Debts are transferable, crimes are not; the former may be mere accidents, but the latter enter into the essence of moral character. If debts are assumed and paid by a third person, the first is of right acquitted from further obligation. But if atonement is offered by a third person for crimes, and the atonement is accepted, the acquittal of the first from punishment is still an act of grace; since the criminal is no less personally deserving of punishment than before. Hence our justification before God, "through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus," is said to be "freely, by his grace," and "according to the riches of his grace." Rom. iii. 24; Eph. i. 7. In cases where the party offending is unable to render adequate atonement in his own person, and where the punishment could not be endured by him without ruining him—as is the case in all capital offences—if the suffering of another be accepted in his stead, the atonement thus made by a substitute is technically termed a vicarious atonement. This is a case that rarely happens in human governments; yet this is the case in relation to the atonement made by Christ. "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed." Isa. liii. See SUBSTITUTION.

It may be well here to state clearly the Scripture sense of the terms wrath and propitiation, as applied to God, in treating this great subject. Rom. i. 18, v. 9, iii. 25; 1 John iv. 10. By the wrath of God, then, is meant, not a turbulent passion, much less a settled implacability; but that moral sentiment of justice, which exists in perfection in the Infinite Mind, and which dictates the punishment of sin. By propitiation is meant, that which, in a given case, makes it proper and just for God to exercise his mercy in forgiving sin. God is infinitely merciful, but let it never be forgotten that he is also infinitely just. A poet has well remarked, "A God all mercy were a God unjust." God, with reverence be it spoken, must necessarily, from his own nature and the rectitude of his government, punish sin. He must punish it either in the sinner himself, or in the sinner's surety. Jehovah the Father hath punished sin in his own Son. "On him he hath caused to meet the iniquities of us all." To all believers, therefore, their iniquities have been forgiven, because the substitutionary atonement hath been accepted.

Some writers (as Taylor, in Calmet) confound atonement with reconciliation. But the appeal to etymology in defence of this confusion of ideas is but egregious trifling, unworthy of a subject so vast and solemn. And as to Rom. v. 11, it is well known that the original word there used, should have been rendered reconciliation. It is God, and not man, who receives the atonement; but believers, as the whole context shows, receive reconciliation through Christ. The former provides the way, and secures the existence of the latter, in harmony with all the Divine perfections. They differ, therefore, as cause and effect differ; and it is from confounding this distinction that the most fundamental errors have been palmed upon the world with a show of plausibility. In the New Testament, as well as in the Old, the atonement is represented as the ground and basis of reconciliation to God. 2 Cor. v. 18–21; Heb. ix. 15; Rom. iii. 24–26, v. 1–21.

Neither is the term atonement to be confounded, as is frequently done, with the term redemption. Between these two terms there are plain differences; and no one, without a perception of these differences, can treat this great subject with lucidness or accuracy.

They differ in object and design, and of course are of a different nature; so that things may be truly affirmed of one which cannot be truly affirmed of the other. First, They differ in object. Atonement is offered to God as its object; redemption is purchased or procured for men as its object. Atonement is a sacrifice offered; redemption is a benefit conferred. Secondly, They differ in design. The design of the atonement is to render God propitious, as the sovereign ruler; the design of redemption, to make man everlastingly blessed. Hence, thirdly, They differ in nature. Atonement being made to God, and made by a sacrifice of inestimable value, is in its own nature infinite; nor is it possible for us to conceive how its intrinsic worth and glory, or its efficacy and adaptation to its end, could be increased. Its sufficiency is infinite; for who can overrate "the precious blood of Christ," or take exact account of his "unsearchable riches?" Its end was, "that God might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." This end was infinitely desirable; for it involves an infinite good,—"glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, and good-will to men." But this end the atonement has accomplished. GOD IS JUST, AND THE JUSTIFIER OF HIM THAT BELIEVETH IN JESUS. Its efficacy, therefore, is complete. It could not be more so. "By one offering" of himself, says the apostle, "he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." Heb. x. 14. "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." Rom. x. 4. "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." Rom. viii. 33, 34. Is not that atonement, then, in its nature infinite, which is sufficient to satisfy God, the infinite lawgiver and judge, in the remission of sin to every one who cordially confides in it; and which so effectually repairs the injury done by sin as to justify Him in the sight of the whole universe for so doing? Can we talk of limits to the value of such a sacrifice? Can we assign bounds to the efficacy of such an expiation? Can we apply terms of measurement to the nature of such an atonement for sin? Is not the covering ample enough to protect a universe from the punishment of sin, were they all in need of its protection, and to resort to it for shelter?

Redemption, on the contrary, is in its very nature definite. It has an inseparable relation to men, as its object; and, therefore, in its very nature is limited to the number for whom its price is paid, in whose behalf it is accepted, and on whom the blessing is actually bestowed. Redemption is not expiation for sin, but the deliverance of men from sin, by means of such an expiation. Hence Christ is said "by his own blood" to have obtained eternal redemption for us. Heb. ix. 12. Hence the word redemption is used for pardon, which is our actual deliverance from punishment (Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14); for sanctification, which is our actual deliverance from the dominion of sin (1 Pet. i. 18; Isa. lix. 20); and for the resurrection, which is the actual deliverance of our body from the grave at the last day. Rom. viii. 23; Eph. i. 14, iv. 30. Hence it is clear, that in Scripture usage atonement and redemption differ in their nature; and that the one is the cause, and the other the effect. Atonement is the ground of redemption (Isa. liii. 4-9); redemption is the result of the atonement. Isa. liii. 10-12. The atonement takes effect by changing the relations of God towards the guilty (Rom. iii. 21); redemption takes effect by changing the relations of the guilty towards God. Rev. xiv. 4. The former was completely finished on the cross. Dan. ix. 24; John xix. 30. The latter is now in daily progressive operation, and will not be finished till the final consummation of all things. Eph. iv. 30. The latter is a proper subject of prayer; but not the former. Psal. xxvi. 11, cxxx. 8. The atonement is definite only in design; but in nature, value, and sufficiency, is infinite; and in adaptation to the wants of sinners, universal. John iii. 16. Redemption, on the other hand, is personal in its nature, particular in its purpose and application, and, of course, limited in its extent to the number of those who are actually made partakers of its inestimable blessings, by faith in the Redeemer's blood. Acts xx. 28; Eph. v. 25-27; Tit. ii. 14; Gal. iii. 10-14. In a word, atonement is the price paid for the redemption of the Church: "By the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water." Zech. ix. 11. Redemption is the freedom of the Church, which was itself purchased by the atonement: "For thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation." Rev. v. 9.

This doctrine of atonement, as thus stated, is the leading truth of Christianity (1 Cor. xv. 3), and is styled by Paul, from its distinguishing fact, the doctrine of the "cross," and the doctrine of "CHRIST CRUCIFIED." 1 Cor. i. 17-24; Gal. v. 11, vi. 12-14. This is that grand peculiarity of the gospel, which was then a stumbling-block to the Jew, and foolishness to the Greek; and which in every age since has had to encounter the strongest opposition from the various prejudices of the human heart. It was, indeed, imbibed in its humbling and holy simplicity by the primitive believers, and was held fast in its purity and glory by the persecuted Waldenses,—that is, by the true Church,—while the mother of harlots was revelling in the midnight darkness of a professed but corrupted gospel. Its ascendancy was in a measure restored at the Reformation, but only to encounter afresh similar opposition, as at first, and from similar causes; for now, as ever, "the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God."

"Errors on this subject," it has been well observed, "sap the whole structure of religion. All the great outlines of theology become vague and incoherent notions, when deprived of their connection with this central truth. By necessary consequence, erroneous systems of religion originate chiefly in wrong views of the atonement." Papists add human merit to Christ's; and then, as if this were not sufficient, superadd penance and purgatory; thus falsifying the words of Him who said on the cross, It is finished. Arminians, regarding redemption as universal, have made it in every sense conditional; and thus denied the doctrine of gratuitous election. Socinians, denying the necessity of an atonement in order to the forgiveness of sin, reduce Christ to a mere man, and his death to that of a martyr, sealing his doctrine with his blood. Swedenborgians consider Christ's sufferings to have been on his own account, not ours; and hence discard the imputation of his righteousness. Restorationists contend that Christ died for all mankind absolutely, and therefore all shall be ultimately saved. Universalists (at least modern ones) affirm that atonement simply means reconciliation.

and that Christ died merely to convince mankind of the immutability of God's universal saving love. While infidels, regarding circumstances as the sole causes of virtue, and the doctrine, miracles, life, and death of Christ, as altogether unnecessary, reject the Bible altogether, as an imposition on human credulity. Thus, in some form, and to some degree, error on this subject is radical in every erroneous system of religion.

It is painful to trace the progress of lax opinions on this vital truth for a century past. Spencer, Sykes, and Warburton, led the way by their mode of treating the Mosaic sacrifices. The immortal Butler, in his 'Analogy,' while asserting the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice to secure the pardon of sin, had said, with his usual modesty, "How, and in what particular way, it had this efficacy, there are not wanting persons who have endeavoured to explain; but I do not find that the Scripture has explained it." Dr Taylor of Norwich, in his 'Scripture Doctrine of the Atonement Examined,' and in his 'Key to the Apostolic Writings,' undertook this explanation, and gives the following as his view:—"By the blood of Christ God discharges us from guilt, because the blood of Christ is the most powerful mean of freeing us from the pollution and power of sin."—"We have no sufficient ground to consider its virtue and efficacy in any other light." He then goes on to say, that by the blood of Christ is meant, not the corporeal substance,—not the sufferings and death of our Lord,—but "the blood of Christ," says Dr Taylor, "is his perfect obedience and goodness." Thus, by that species of sophistry which substitutes an effect for the cause,—which tells one half of the truth, and overlooks or denies the other half,—together with an artful accommodation of Scripture language to notions of his own, he has succeeded in shutting out from his scheme of atonement all reference to the vindication of the Divine rectitude, and the satisfaction of the Divine law, in which, according to the apostle, the whole nature and value of the atonement, as such, consists. On Dr Taylor's hypothesis the name of atonement is retained, though the thing itself is excluded; and his theory may be regarded as that of the better sort of modern Socinians. Yet there have arisen among them bolder spirits, who discard the very name. Dr Priestley, in his Answer to Paine, had the temerity to affirm, "that the doctrines of atonement, incarnation, and the Trinity, have no more foundation in the Scriptures, than the doctrines of transubstantiation and transmigration." This statement needs no comment. It must certainly have been designed for those whose knowledge of the Scriptures was, like Mr Paine's, somewhat superficial. See CHRIST CRUCIFIED.

A second hypothesis respecting the doctrine of atonement, and which has even been embraced by some professed Calvinists, differs in many important particulars from that which has been already noticed. It consists in admitting that the death of Christ was a sacrifice, propitiation, or atonement for sin; but then it denies that there was any real, intrinsic value in it, abstractedly considered, any thing that was calculated in its own nature to effect the expiation of it, while it also resolves the whole of its saving or atoning influence into Divine appointment. This is Butler's grand defect; and he has been followed in it by Drs Whitby, Price, Macknight, and others.

Now, although among these various writers there may possibly exist some shades of difference, there are, nevertheless, certain leading points in which they all manifestly agree; such as, that the death of Christ was not absolutely necessary to the salvation of sinful men; that God, had it pleased him, might have saved sinners without the intervention of his Son; that other ways of saving the elect were possible, and that there is no necessary connection between the death of Christ and the pardon of sin, except that which results from Divine appointment; for that the efficacy of the atonement does not arise from the dignity of the sufferer, but from its being the will of God that it should be so; consequently, that the proper divinity of the Son of God is not essentially connected with the value of his sacrifice.

This hypothesis, though at first sight it may appear far more plausible than that of the Socinians, is liable to many and insurmountable objections; of which, in particular, two may be here mentioned. It impeaches the wisdom of God, as it appears in the economy of man's redemption; and it has an equal tendency to depreciate in our estimation the atonement which the Saviour made. It involves in it a bold reflection on the Divine wisdom, inasmuch as it supposes God to have effected that by great means, which might have been equally well accomplished, as to every important result, by such as were inferior. It is a maxim equally applicable to physics, to morals, and to theology, that it is needless to effect that by more instruments which may be done by fewer. This axiom has been formed from contemplating the works and dispensations of God; in which, whilst there is nothing defective, we never discover any thing that is superfluous or redundant. Admitting, therefore, the divinity of the Son of God, it is not easy to perceive how any can deny the efficacy of his atonement; for, if a Divine person have suffered, by Divine appointment, we may rest satisfied, that it was not only proper it should be so, but that nothing less could have sufficed.

The question as to the extent of the atonement, has, in various periods of the history of the Christian Church, been a subject of keen and exciting controversy. The Arminians maintain that, in the design and intention of the Father, the blood of Christ was shed for all mankind, so that he so far satisfied the Divine justice as to render it consistent with the honour of God to enter into lower terms with them than before; and that the salvation of all is now possible, upon the condition of their faith, repentance, and sincere obedience. This view of the atonement has been often revived since it was publicly repudiated in 1618 by the Synod of Dort; and even in our own day the controversy has been awakened in quarters where better things might have been expected. The form, however, which the heretical doctrine has assumed is no longer that of gross Arminianism, but rather the more modified form of Hopkinsianism, as it is termed in America,—a form which maintains that Christ died for all men, while it asserts also the doctrine of particular election. Such views have, probably, obtained more extensive currency in this country from the favourable reception and wide circulation of the theological writings of President Dwight. Though privately held by many, it is only very recently that these opinions, in reference to the atonement, have been openly avowed, and boldly advocated both from the press and the pulpit. One of the ablest of the recent supporters of them is Dr Wardlaw of Glasgow, whose work on the subject has been published, with the design of maintaining a universal atonement. "According to this scheme," he remarks, "the atonement was designed as a vindication, manifestation, or, rather, display of the righteousness of God, such as to render forgiveness and salvation consistent with the honour of that perfection of the Divine character; leaving the Supreme Ruler and Judge, in the free and sovereign exercise of the mercy in which he delights, to dispense those blessings more or less extensively, according to the good pleasure of his will." This statement obviously shows, that, in Dr Wardlaw's opinion, the atonement had no particular, but only a general design; that it removed obstructions to the free exercise of Divine mercy; and that on the removal of the legal obstructions, the sovereign electing mercy of God was displayed. Thus election is made posterior in point of time to the atonement, and the purchase of Christ, instead of being an actual purchase of lost sinners to salvation, is merely a purchase to a possible election. In this view the link is severed which connects Christ and his people. He is no longer, in the accomplishment of his great work, their surety, their representative, and head. He makes no arrangement with the Father in their name, and on their behalf. The federal character of Christ's mediation is completely lost sight of, and the whole transactions of the covenant are rendered nugatory. In carrying forward his mediatory work, Christ could have no special love to his people, as they were not yet chosen by the electing love of the Father. The whole tendency of the scheme, indeed, as set forth by Dr Wardlaw, is to reverse the process of redemption as set forth in the Scripture, and to deprive it of that natural order and beauty which the orthodox doctrine exhibits. On this subject the words of the Westminster Confession of Faith are such as commend themselves by the natural and scriptural order in which the doctrine is stated. "It pleased God, in his eternal purpose, to choose and ordain the Lord Jesus, his only begotten Son, to be the mediator between God and man; unto whom he did from all eternity give a people to be his seed, and to be by him in time redeemed, called, justified, sanctified, and glorified."

In order to understand the manner wherein Christ becomes an atonement, "we should," says Dr Watts, "consider the following propositions:—1. The great God having made man, appointed to govern him by a wise and righteous law, wherein glory and honour, life and immortality, are the designed rewards for perfect obedience; but tribulation and wrath, pain and death, are the appointed recompense to those who violate this law. Gen. iii.; Rom. ii. 6, 16, i. 32. 2. All mankind have broken this law. Rom. iii. 23, v. 12. 3. God, in his infinite wisdom, did not think fit to pardon sinful man without some compensation for his broken law; for, 1. If the great Ruler of the world had pardoned the sins of men without any satisfaction, then his laws might have seemed not worth the vindicating. 2. Men would have been tempted to persist in rebellion, and to repeat their old offences. 3. His moral government over his creatures might have appeared as a matter of small importance. 4. God had a mind to make a very illustrious display both of his justice and of his grace among mankind; on these accounts he would not pardon sin without a satisfaction. 5. Man, sinful man, is not able to make any satisfaction to God for his own sins, neither by his labours nor by his sufferings. Eph. ii. 1, 8, 9. 6. Though man be incapable to satisfy for his own violation of the law, yet

God would not suffer all mankind to perish. 7. Because God intended to make a full display of the terrors of his justice, and his divine resentment for the violation of his law, therefore he appointed his own Son to satisfy for the breach of it, by becoming a proper sacrifice of expiation or atonement. Gal. iii. 10, 13. 8. The Son of God being immortal, could not sustain all these penalties of the law which man had broken, without taking the mortal nature of man upon him,—without assuming flesh and blood. Heb. ii. 13, 14. 9. The Divine Being having received such ample satisfaction for sin by the sufferings of his own Son, can honourably forgive his creature man, who was the transgressor. Rom. iii. 25, 26. *Now, that this doctrine is true will appear, if we consider,—*1. That an atonement for sin, or an effectual method to answer the demands of an offended God, is the first great blessing guilty man stood in need of. Mic. vi. 6, 7. 2. The very first discoveries of grace which were made to man after his fall, implied in them something of an atonement for sin, and pointed to the propitiation Christ has now made. Gen. iii. 15. 3. The train of ceremonies which were appointed by God in the Jewish Church are plain significations of such an atonement. 2 Cor. iii.; Col. ii.; Heb. x. 4. Some of the prophecies confirm and explain the first promise, and show that Christ was to die as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of men. Dan. ix. 24–26; Isa. liii. 5. Our Saviour himself taught us the doctrine of the atonement for sins by his death. Matt. xx. 28; John vi. 51; Luke xxii. 19. 6. The terrors of soul, the consternation and inward agonies which our blessed Lord sustained a little before his death, were a sufficient proof that he endured punishments in his soul which were due to sin. Mark xiv. 33; Heb. v. 7. 7. This doctrine is declared, and confirmed, and explained at large, by the apostles in their writings. 1 Cor. xv. 3; Eph. i. 7; 1 John ii. 2, &c., &c. 8. This was the doctrine that was witnessed to the world by the amazing gifts of the Holy Ghost, which attended the gospel. See the Acts of the Apostles.

*"The inferences and uses to be derived from this doctrine are these:—*1. How vain are all the labours and pretences of mankind to seek or hope for any better religion than that which is contained in the gospel of Christ! It is here alone that we can find the solid and rational principle of reconciliation to an offended God. Heb. iv. 14. 2. How strange and unreasonable is the doctrine of the Popish Church, who, while they profess to believe the religion of Christ, yet introduce many other methods of atonement for sin besides the sufferings of the Son of God. 3. Here is a solid foundation, on which the greatest of sinners may hope for acceptance with God. 1 Tim. i. 15. 4. This doctrine should be used as a powerful motive to excite repentance. Acts v. 31. 5. We should use this atonement of Christ as our constant way of access to God in all our prayers. Heb. x. 19, 22. 6. Also as a divine guard against sin. Rom. vi. 1, 2; 1 Pet. i. 15, 19. 7. As an argument of prevailing force to be used in prayer. Rom. viii. 32. 8. As a spring of love to God, and to his Son Jesus Christ. 1 John iv. 10. 9. As a strong persuasive to that love and pity which we should show on all occasions to our fellow-creatures. 1 John iv. 11. 10. It should excite patience and holy joy under afflictions and earthly sorrows. Rom. v. 1–3. 11. We should consider it as a most effectual defence against the terrors of dying, and as our joyful hope of a blessed resurrection. 1 Cor. xv. 50. 12. Lastly, as a divine allurements to the upper world.'

ATONEMENT, DAY OF, a day of solemn expiation among the Jews, on which the sins of the whole year were publicly atoned for. The warrant for its observance is to be found in Lev. xvi. 29 :—"And this shall be a statute for ever unto you, that in the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month, ye shall afflict your souls, and do no work at all, whether it be one of your own country, or a stranger that sojourneth among you." The sacrifice on this day was more solemn than on any other. It was offered by the high priest alone, and, according to the later Jews, this was the only occasion on which the high priest was permitted to pronounce the word Jehovah, the peculiar name of God. The manner in which the high priest discharged the duties of this solemn day, are well worthy of being specially noticed. "Early in the morning he bathed, and for the first time arrayed himself in the rich garments of his office; then, proceeding to the court, he washed his hands and feet at the laver. During this day, he bathed his whole body five times, and washed his hands and feet ten times. He then killed the morning sacrifice, laid the pieces on the fire, trimmed the lamps in the holy place, and offered the incense, and blessed the people from the steps of the porch. The usual morning service thus being concluded, he proceeded to offer the sacrifices peculiar to the day—a bullock, a ram, and seven lambs for a burnt-offering, with meat-offerings, and a kid for a sin-offering. He then washed his hands and feet at the laver.

"As it was a fast day, the people did not return home, but the public services were continued without intermission. The high priest again bathed his whole body, and put on the white linen dress usually worn by priests, thus showing that when he appeared as a sinner, to expiate his own sins and the sins of the people, he was to be arrayed in a humble dress, and that there is no distinction of persons before God; also that he then acted, not in his peculiar character of high priest, but as the representative of the congregation. Having again washed at the laver, he proceeded to the north side of the altar, where he found more animals ready to be sacrificed. The first were the sin-offerings: the bullock for his own sins and those of the priests, and the two kids of the goats for the congregation. Placing his hand upon the head of the bullock, he turned towards the holy place, and solemnly prayed, as follows: 'O Lord, I have sinned, done perversely, and transgressed before thee, I and my house. I beseech thee, O Lord, expiate the sins, perversities, and transgressions whereby I have sinned, done perversely, and transgressed, I and my house, as it is written in the law of Moses thy servant, saying, For on this day he will expiate for you, to purge you from all your sins before the Lord, that ye may be clean.' The attending ministers added, 'Blessed be the glorious name of his kingdom for ever and ever.' He then went to the north-east corner, and the kids were placed one on his right and the other on his left hand. Two pieces of gold, one inscribed 'for the Lord,' the other 'for Azazel,' were put into a box, and the high priest drew forth one with each hand, and the goat on the hand in which was the lot for Azazel became the scape-goat, and a scarlet list was tied on its forehead. The Jewish tradition is, that this cloth frequently became white when tied on the goat, but that it never changed during the last forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem; it is noticed by some with a reference to the manner in which the Jews, about that period, imprecated the blood of Christ to be on themselves and on their children, Matt. xxvii. 25. The other goat was then taken to the rings, the high priest having repeated his confession, killed the bullock, and gave a vessel with some of the blood to a priest, who carried it to the top of the steps of the porch, stirring the blood to prevent its congealing. The high priest next took from the altar a censer of coals, and ascended the steps of the porch, carrying also a plate with incense, while the people anxiously prayed for him. He crossed the porch and the holy place, and opening the veils, entered the holy of holies. The reader will remember that this day was the only time during the year when that sacred place was entered by any one. Standing before the ark, the high priest placed the censer on the floor, and with his hands put the incense upon the fire. When the place was filled with smoke, he retired backwards till he was without the veil, uttering a short, but lifeless, formula for national prosperity. He then fetched the blood, and sprinkled it eight times before the ark, and leaving the burning censer, retired to the holy place, where he set down the rest of the blood, and proceeded to the court of the priests. He then sacrificed the goat, and sprinkled the blood in the same manner. During this time no person was allowed to come beyond the altar.

"The next process was to make atonement for the holy place, by sprinkling the blood of the bullock and the goat, first separately and then mixed together, before the veil and upon the altar of incense. Then, crossing the court of the priests, he made atonement for that place, by pouring out the rest of the blood at the south-west corner. The great altar was not sprinkled as that of incense; perhaps from being considered to be so holy as to sanctify every offering laid upon it (see Exod. xxix. 37; Matt. xxiii. 19), it was not thought to need any purification.

"The time now came for sending away the scape-goat, as a type of Him who bare away our infirmities and carried off our diseases. The high priest proceeded to the part of the place where the goat stood, and, with the stationary men, confessed over it the sins of the people, placing their hands upon its head. It was then given to a person, who, accompanied by others, led it forth to a high and steep rock, about twelve miles from Jerusalem. Ten booths were erected on the road thither, at equal distances, and in each of them some persons were placed. The man in charge of the goat was delivered over to each of these companies in succession, meat and drink being offered to him at each station. The company from the last booth stopped at a distance from the rock, while the man who led the goat unbound the scarlet cloth, and tore it in two; replacing one half between the horns of the animal, and fixing the other piece to the rock; then pushing the goat backwards to prevent it leaping, he tumbled the animal over the rock, and it was dashed to pieces by the fall. The person appointed to discharge this duty then returned to the nearest booth and remained there till the evening, when he bathed, and washed his clothes, and went back to the city. Maimonides thus speaks of this ceremonial:—"The scape-goat expiates all the sins mentioned in the law, whether light or heavy, whether committed through contumacy or error, whether done ignorantly or knowingly. Every one who repents is thus atoned for by the scape-goat; but if any one do not repent, then only his lighter transgressions are expiated by the scape-goat.' Let us learn to look to Him who was typified by the scape-goat.

"Meanwhile the priest disposed of the carcasses of the sin-offerings; only the fat was burned upon the altar, the rest being burned without the city, as directed, Lev. ii. 12, by some of the priests, who also bathed and washed their clothes before their return.

"At the time when they supposed that the man with the scape-goat had gone three miles from Jerusalem, the high priest entered a pulpit in the court of the women, and read Lev. xvi. and xxiii. 27-32, the passages in the law concerning this solemnity. He also repeated eight short prayers. Then, returning to the inner court, he washed his hands and feet at the laver, went again to a chamber on the north side, where he bathed and put on his rich garments, and again washed his hands and feet at the laver; this being required of every priest each time he quitted the court and re-entered it. He then offered two rams for a burnt-offering.

"By this time the hour for the evening service had arrived, and when it was offered, the high priest again washed and bathed, and putting on his plain garments, washed and went into the holy of holies a fourth time, to bring away the censer and incense plate. His being said to enter once, has reference to his entering only one day in the year. He then again washed, bathed, put on his rich garments, washed, and went into the holy place to offer the evening incense and trim the lamps. Then washing for the last time, the high priest laid aside his rich apparel and retired to his own house, accompanied by the multitude, rejoicing that God had not mingled his blood with that of the sacrifices."

Dr Hales thus explains the emblematic meaning of these ceremonial observances:—"The whole of this process seems to be typical or prefigurative of the grand atonement to be made for the sins of the whole world by Jesus Christ, 'the high priest of our profession.' (Heb. iii. 1), and a remarkable analogy thereto may be traced in the course of our Lord's ministry. He began it with personal purification at his baptism, to fulfil all legal righteousness. Matt. iii. 13-15. Immediately after his baptism he was led, by the impulse of the HOLY SPIRIT, into the wilderness, as the true scape-goat, who bore away our infirmities, and carried off our diseases. Isa. liii. 4-6; Matt. viii. 17. Immediately before his crucifixion, he was afflicted, and his soul was exceeding sorrowful unto death, when he was to be made a sin-offering like the allotted goat (Psal. xl. 12; Isa. liii. 7; Matt. xxvi. 38; 2 Cor. v. 21; Heb. i. 3); and his sweat, as great drops of blood falling to the ground, corresponded to the sprinkling of the meroy-seat (Luke xxii. 44); and when, to prepare for the sacrifice of himself, he consecrated himself in prayer to God (John xvii. 1-5; Matt. xxvi. 39-46); and then prayed for his household, his apostles, and disciples (John xvii. 6-9), and for all future believers on him by their preaching. John xvii. 20-26. He put off his garments at his crucifixion, when he became the sin-offering (Psal. xxii. 18; John xix. 23, 24); and, as our spiritual high priest, entered once for all into the most holy place, heaven, to make intercession with God for all his faithful followers. Heb. vii. 24-28, ix. 7-15. Who died for our sins, and rose again for our justification. Rom. iv. 25." The day was a great solemnity of the Hebrews,—a day of rest, and of strict fasting. Leo of Modena, Buxtorf, and others, have collected many particulars relative to the solemnities of this day from the Rabbin, as may be seen in the larger edition of Calmet.

ATTALIA, a city of Pamphylia, which Paul and Barnabas visited, A.D. 45. Acts xiv. 25. It still subsists under the name of Satalia, or Adalia. It was built or refounded by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamos, who gave to it his own name.

ATTITUDE. See ACCUBATION—MEALS.

ATTRIBUTES OF GOD are the several qualities or perfections of the Divine nature. Some distinguish them into the negative and positive or affirmative. The negative are such as remove from God whatever is a mark of imperfection in creatures; such are infinity, immutability, immortality, &c. The positive are such as assert some perfection in God, which is in and of himself, and which, when found in the creatures in any measure, is from him. This distinction is now mostly discarded. Some distinguish them into absolute and relative. Absolute attributes are such as agree with the essence of God, as Jehovah, Jah, &c.; relative attributes are such as agree with him in time, with some respect to his creatures, as Creator, Governor, Preserver, Redeemer, &c. But the more commonly received distinction of the attributes of God, is into communicable and incommunicable attributes. The communicable attributes are those of which there is some resemblance in men, as goodness, holiness, wisdom, &c.; the incommunicable attributes are such as there is no appearance or shadow of in men, as independence, immutability, immensity, and eternity. A later distribution still, for the sake of clearness, is into the natural and moral attributes of God. The natural attributes of God are, UNITY, SELF-EXISTENCE, SPIRITUALITY, ALMIGHTY POWER, IMMUTABILITY, ETERNITY; the moral attributes are, WISDOM, JUSTICE, GOODNESS, MERCY, and FAITHFULNESS. See those different articles in this work.

ATTRITION. The casuists of the Church of Rome have made a distinction between a perfect and imperfect contrition. The latter they call attrition, which is the lowest degree of repentance, or a sorrow for sin arising from a sense of shame, or any temporal inconvenience attending the commission of it, or merely from fear of the punishment due to it, without any resolution to sin no more; in consequence of which doctrine, they teach that, after a wicked and flagitious course of life, a man may be reconciled to God, and his sins forgiven on his death-bed, by confessing them to the priest with this imperfect degree of sorrow and repentance. This distinction was settled by the Council of Trent. It requires little or no reflection, however, to perceive that the mere sorrow for sin because of its consequences, and not on account of its evil nature, is no more acceptable to God than hypocrisy itself can be.

AUDÆANS, or AUDIANI, the followers of Audæus (called by Mosheim, Ardæus), by all accounts a man of severe manners in the fourth century, who, having been "excommunicated in Syria, on account of the freedom and importunity with which he censured the corrupt and licentious manners of the clergy," and banished into Scythia, formed a religious society, of which he was appointed bishop, or pastor, on something like the primitive plan,—himself and flock labouring with their own hands. He is charged with being an Anthropomorphite (which see), and explaining the Scriptures too literally; which, perhaps, originated in his rejecting the mystical interpretations of some of the orthodox; but his chief heresy was in keeping Easter at the time of the Jews' pass-over, contrary to the decree of the Council of Nice, which is alleged to have been made to flatter Constantine, by making the festival of Easter coincident with his birthday.

AUDITORS, a name given in ecclesiastical history to a branch of the Manichean sect, which was divided into the Elect and Auditors. The former is said by Beausobre to have been clerical persons, and they are termed by Theodoret, the Perfect; but the latter is represented as corresponding to the laity, and called Auditors, because they listened in the church while others taught.

AUGSBURG, or AUGUSTAN CONFESSION. This Confession was drawn up by Melancthon, the German Reformer, and presented, in 1530, to a diet of the German princes, which had been convened to meet at Augsburg. It consisted of twenty-one articles, in which the Reformers embodied their views of the grand leading doctrines of Divine truth. This Confession forms one of the symbolical books of the Lutheran Church, and, as D'Aubigné remarks, "will ever remain one of the masterpieces of the human mind enlightened by the Spirit of God."

AUGUSTINE, or, as he is sometimes called, St Austin, was one of the most celebrated fathers of the church. He was born A.D. 354, at Tagasta, a city of Numidia, in Africa. The spiritual history of his early life is thus detailed by Neander:—"The incipient germs of his spiritual life were unfolded in the unconscious piety of childhood. Whatever treasures of virtue and worth the life of faith, even of a soul not trained by scientific culture, can bestow, was set before him in the example of his pious mother. The period of childlike, unconscious piety was followed, in his case, by the period of self-disunion, inward strife and conflict. For at the age of nineteen, while living at Carthage, he was turned from the course which a pious education had given him, by the dissipations and corruptions of that great city. The fire of his impetuous nature needed to be purified and ennobled by the power of religion: his great but wild and ungoverned energies, after having involved him in many a stormy conflict, must first be tamed and regulated by a higher, heavenly might, must be sanctified by a higher spirit, before he could find peace. As it often happens that a human word, of the present or the past, becomes invested with important meaning for the life of an individual, by its coincidence with slumbering feelings or ideas, which are thus called forth at once into clear consciousness, so it is with Augustine. A passage which he suddenly came across in the Hortensius of Cicero, treating of the worth and dignity of philosophy, made a strong impression on his mind. The higher wants of his spiritual and moral nature were in this way at once brought clearly before him. The true and the good at once filled his heart with an indescribable longing; he had presented to the inmost centre of his soul a supreme good, which appeared to him the only worthy object of human pursuit; while, on the other hand, whatever had, until now, occupied and pleased him, appeared but as vanity. But the ungodly impulses were still too strong in his fiery nature, to allow him to surrender himself wholly to the longing which from this moment took possession of his heart, and to withstand the charm of the vain objects which he would fain despise and shun. The conflict now began in his soul, which lasted through eleven years of his life." In this frame of mind he became a member of the sect of the Manicheans, and entered first into the class of auditors. "It was the sum of his wishes to be received into the class of the elect, so as to become acquainted with the mysteries of the sect,—which were the more alluring to his eager thirst for knowledge, by reason of their enigmatical character,—and thus finally attain to the clear light he was so earnestly in pursuit of. But his interviews with Faustus, one of the most eminent teachers of this sect, so entirely baulked his expectations, that, after having spent ten years as a member of the sect, he was thrown into complete bewilderment. At length he was fully convinced that Manicheism was a delusion; but from this he was in danger of falling into absolute scepticism, from which nothing saved him but that faith in God and truth which remained planted in the deepest recesses of his soul." The philosophy of Plato now became his all, and he sought nothing further. At length his attention was particularly directed to the Epistles of Paul, and partly through the blessing of God upon his study of the Word of God, and partly through the instructions and impulse which he received from the public discourses of Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, the prayers of his godly mother were answered, in his conversion to God. The passage of Scripture which he himself acknowledges to have been, under God, instrumental in his conversion, was Rom. xiii. 13, 14—"Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof." This, he seemed to feel, was an exhibition of his past life; and humbled that he should so long have lived to the lusts of the flesh, he longed and prayed that henceforth he might be enabled to live to the Spirit. His anxiety at first was to retire from the world—a resolution which he carried into effect for a time; but after having in his retreat composed various religious treatises, he was ordained a priest, and after a short time became bishop of Hippo, in Africa. He was remarkably distinguished as a polemic divine, at first against the errors of the Manichees, but afterwards, and still more powerfully, against the baneful heresy of Pelagius. His writings, which are varied in their character, amount to no fewer than two hundred and seventy-two treatises. After a long and laborious life, while engaged in a work connected with the Pelagian controversy, this eminent divine and godly man died, at the age of seventy-six, A.D. 429. It is impossible to estimate too highly the influence of the writings of Father Augustine. In the beginning of the seventeenth century the publication of a commentary on the writings of Augustine, which Jansenius had been preparing for twenty years, gave origin to the sect of the Jansenists, which, as the opponents of the Jesuits, and approaching most nearly in their sentiments to the orthodox faith, have been at different periods the objects of violent persecution in the Papal Church. Nay, it may with truth be affirmed, that however Romanists may talk of the infallibility of the church, this very controversy between the Jansenists and the Jesuits almost rent the church asunder. The doctrines of Augustine, indeed, to which Jansenists adhere, are essentially opposed to the unscriptural Arminianism which pervades the whole system of Popery. All the works of the Fathers, but more especially Augustine, have been mutilated by the Expurgatorial Index. In the preface to the Venice edition this is openly acknowledged.

AUGUSTUS, the second Emperor of Rome, who succeeded Julius Cæsar in the government, B.C. 19, and A.M. 3955. It was in his reign that the enrolment took place referred to in Luke ii. 1, which led Joseph and Mary to take up their abode for a time at Bethlehem, where, as had been predicted by the ancient prophets, the Messiah was born. By Augustus also was the temple of Janus shut, in token of universal peace, at the very time when the Prince of Peace was born. Augustus died A.D. 14.

AURICULAR, what is spoken into the ear or privately; a term commonly applied to the private confession made to a priest, as among the Papists. See CONFESSION.

AUTHENTICITY OF THE SCRIPTURES.

Among writers on the Christian evidences considerable confusion may often be perceived in their views of the precise meaning of authenticity, when applied to writings, as contradistinguished from genuineness. The two words are frequently interchanged even by authors of intelligence and ability; and thus their argument in favour of the credibility of the Sacred Writings is deprived of that perspicuity and force by which it would otherwise have been characterized. The difference between the authenticity and the genuineness of a book is simply this: A book is genuine when it has been written by the person whose name it bears as the author of it; a book is authentic when it relates matters of fact as they really happened. The proof of the authenticity may often derive considerable weight from the established genuineness of the work. Thus, in reference to the Bible, when it has been satisfactorily shown that the narratives therein recorded were written by the persons and at the time attributed to them, we have gone far to show that the narratives are themselves matters of fact; for it is plain that events of such importance, bearing upon the interests not of individuals merely, but of nations, could not have been published to the world, amid so many means of disproving the truth of the statements, without being instantly met, on the part of multitudes, by a flat and a full denial. The incidents were given to the world with all simplicity and minuteness of detail, among the very people, and in the very places, where they are said to have happened; and what stronger proof, then, could be adduced for their authenticity than the fact that they were received as accurate and faithful narratives of what actually occurred? And this argument bears both upon the Old and the New Testaments. In neither case were the alleged revelations such as were likely to be received without an implicit conviction of their truth. There could be no predisposition in favour of a religion so opposed to the prejudices of mankind. In such circumstances evidence would be demanded,—the clearest and the most convincing; and such evidence was furnished by the miracles with which the statements were supported. "It would be the greatest miracle of all," remarked Chrysostom, "if the world believed without miracles." On the connection between miracles and the nature of the truths which they were wrought to attest, the following judicious observations are made by Professor Dick:—"Admit the miracles, and all is intelligible; deny the miracles, and all is mystery. Deny the miracles, and you must say that there were two epochs, namely, the age of Moses and the age of Christ, when the human mind underwent a sudden revolution, and acted in opposition to the laws by which, at all other times, it is governed. Men believed without evidence. Without evidence they adopted opinions contrary to their deep-rooted prejudices; engaged in practices repugnant to their strongest inclinations; sacrificed the good opinion of those whose favour they once highly prized; and exposed property, liberty, and life to hazard, for a dream. But as human nature is the same in all ages, those who lived at the periods referred to must have had good reason for their conduct. Now, the only reason which could justify their conduct, was such evidence as left no room for doubt: and in this case the evidence must have been miraculous, for in no other way could a revelation from heaven be proved."

An attempt is often made to weaken the force of the evidence drawn from the testimony of primitive times, by alleging that, as being Christians, their testimony is to be received with suspicion. To this the reply of Addison is conclusive:—"We must consider that, in the case before us, the persons to whom we appeal were of an opposite party till they were persuaded of the truth of those very facts which they report. They bear evidence to a history in defence of Christianity, the truth of which history was their motive to embrace Christianity. They attest facts which they had heard while they were yet heathens; and had they not found reason to believe them, they would still have continued heathens, and have made no mention of them in their writings."

From the genuineness of the Sacred Writings, then, we infer their authenticity. They would not have been believed if they had not been true. The whole feelings, and inclinations, and prejudices of the people were opposed to the reception of the truth; and it is only on the supposition that they saw and believed the miracles which were wrought, that we can conceive them becoming converts to the Christian system. See GENUINENESS—CREDIBILITY—INSPIRATION—AUTHORITY.

AUTHORITY. In matters which are strictly connected with the exercise and operation of individual conscience,—in other words, in matters that are purely religious,—human authority is obviously excluded. In all such cases the appeal must be made exclusively to the Bible. It has ever been the policy of the Church of Rome, however, to interpose the authority of the Church as superior to that of the Inspired Volume. Human teaching is thus made to usurp the place of Divine, and the statements of the fathers, or the decrees of councils, are regarded as a sufficient foundation for our faith. On the respect due to the fathers, the following judicious remarks may be quoted from the late Rev. Thomas Scott's reply to Bishop Tomline:—"The ancient fathers of the Christian Church may be read with benefit in various ways; their persons ought in general to be venerated,—even their supposed mistakes are entitled to our candour; but they have no authority over our creed, any more than we have over the creed of our remote posterity. So little agreement in sentiment is found among the fathers, that it would be a very easy task to bring together a long catalogue of their mutual discordances; and so inaccurate were they, as to historical facts, that it would be equally easy to make a long list of their undeniable mistakes. Their comments upon the Scripture were often such as would be almost universally rejected, nay, despised, in these days. They were uninspired men, and fallible as others are." These strictures on the opinions of the fathers are amply borne out by the researches of Mr Taylor, in his 'Ancient Christianity.' If the authority of the ancient Church is to be appealed to in matters of faith, it will be difficult to obtain a unanimous verdict in favour of any one theological point. Emerging from the darkness of heathenism, many of them had very vague and imperfect views of gospel truth. But it is a consolation to reflect that we have an unerring standard to which to appeal, even the Word of the living God. The complete sufficiency of Scripture as a rule of faith and practice, is the grand doctrine of Protestantism. This was of itself a tenet maintained with the utmost unanimity in the primitive Church; and it was not until Christianity became corrupted by the traditions and commandments of men, that the authority of antiquity was held forth as equal, if not superior, to the authority of Scripture. At the Reformation, Luther and his followers revived the long-forgotten principle of the sufficiency of Scripture; and, in opposition to the usurping influence of authority, asserted the right of private judgment. "Believe not every spirit," says the apostle, "but try the spirits whether they be of God." With such a command laid upon us by God himself, we cannot yield our judgments and our consciences to the authority of men, however just their claims to be listened to with attention and respect. To all the pretensions of authority we ought ever to reply, The witness of men may be great, but the witness of God is greater, and that witness we have in the Bible.

AUTO DA FE. See INQUISITION.

AVA, a city or district of Assyria, from which Shalmaneser brought a colony, called Avites, to inhabit Samaria, after he had carried the Ten Tribes into captivity. 2 Kings xvii. 24-31. Josephus says that the names Ava, Cuthah, Hamath, and Sepharvaim, are those of tribes, not of countries. The precise locality of Ava is not known. Grotius places it in Bactriana. Some writers suppose it to be the same as Ahwaz, the only probable place of similar name in Khnsistan. This town is situated upon the river Karoon, which discharges its waters into the head of the Persian Gulf. Its extensive ruins still attest its ancient importance.

AVE MARIA, or HAIL, MARY! A form of devotion constantly used in the Church of Rome, including the salutation addressed by the angel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary—"Hail, Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, Jesus." It concludes with a prayer to the Virgin in these words, which plainly savour of idolatry:—"Holy Mary, mother of God, pray for us, sinners, now, and in the hour of our death. Amen." This absurd part of the Romish ritual can lay no claim to a more remote antiquity than the beginning of the fifteenth century, and yet it has come into universal use among Papists, and on the same footing with the Lord's Prayer. Their chaplets and rosaries are divided into so many Ave-Maries, and so many Paternosters. The Papists ascribe a wonderful efficacy to their Ave-Maries.

AVEN, a plain in Syria; the same, probably, as the Plain of Balbec, or Valley of Baal, where there was a magnificent temple dedicated to the sun. Hence, probably, its name of Aven, or vanity. The valley is called Bocat, and seems to be the same with the Aven mentioned in Amos i. 5: "I will break also the bar of Damascus, and cut off the inhabitant from the Plain of Aven, and him that holdeth the sceptre from the house of Eden: and the people of Syria shall go into captivity unto Kir, saith the Lord." It is situated between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and hence called the valley of Lebanon. Josh. xi. 17. This is also the name of a city of Egypt situated on the Nile, south-east of the Delta, and east of Memphis, celebrated for its Temple of the Sun. It is called On, Bethshemesh, and, according to the Septuagint and Vulgate, Heliopolis, or City of the Sun. It was a famous seat of learning, and its inhabitants were accounted, if we may credit Herodotus, the most learned of the Egyptians. Moses is said to have spent his youth in this city, and to have received that knowledge for which he was so distinguished. In Ezek. xxx. 17, we find a prophecy in regard to Aven, which seems to have been fulfilled by Nebuchadnezzar: "The young men of Aven and of Pi-beseth shall fall by the sword: and these cities shall go into captivity."

AVENARIAN, the name of a school of Hebrew philology, which proceeds upon the principle, that the Hebrew, being the primitive language from which all others are derived, may be explained by the aid of the Greek, German, Latin, and other languages. Its founder was John Avenarius, professor at Wittenberg. He has had but few followers.

AVENGE, to vindicate the rights, or redress the wrongs, of those who have been injured. Gen. iv. 24; Lev. xix. 18; Luke xviii. 3, 7, 8; Acts vii. 24; Rom. xii. 19. God has a sovereign, and magistrates a subordinate power, to avenge injuries. Private individuals are forbidden to exercise this power. See RETRIBUTION—REVENGE.

AVENGER OF BLOOD. In Gen. ix. 6, it is declared, in reference to manslaughter, that "whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." The execution of this sentence, in primitive times, devolved upon the brother or nearest male relation of the person who had been slain. The right also of purchasing back property or persons belonged also to the nearest of kin. Hence the term Goël or Redeemer, was applied to the blood-avenger, or nearest male relation. In the law of Moses the right of the goël was distinctly recognised; but to prevent any abuse of this office from the sudden out-breakings of violent resentment, cities of refuge (six in number) were appointed at convenient distances throughout Palestine, to which the man-slayer might flee, until steps could be taken for bringing him to justice. The origin and nature of the practice of goëlism is thus explained by Dr Jamieson, in his additions to 'Paxton's Illustrations of Scripture:—' "The custom of goëlism, that is, of the nearest kinsman avenging the blood of a murdered relative, was, like many other traditional observances in the early history of the world, partly the dictate of nature, and partly the result of necessity. Wherever men congregated, even in small numbers, it was obviously essential to the existence of society, that measures should be adopted for the safety and protection of every individual belonging to it; and in primitive times, when there was no fixed government, nor written law,—when no authority was recognised but the will of the father of a family or chief of a tribe, and men were held together by the bonds of a common family alliance,—the strong impulse of natural affection was sufficient to serve for the redress of injuries and the infliction of suitable revenge. The eldest on whom devolved the honours and privileges of the family, or the heir-at-law, became the natural protector of all connected with it, and the enemy of those who shed their blood. In the event of his absence, or inability, from age and sickness, the nearest of kin partook of the same natural feelings; and thus a train of sentiment and a course of conduct which nature inspired, became, in the absence of written or established law, the rule by which the relatives were guided in regard to those whose hands were imbrued in the blood of a dear and valued friend. To avenge his death was not only the natural desire,—it became the imperative duty, of the person who stood in the nearest relationship to the unfortunate deceased; and from being a duty, it came to be reckoned a debt of honour,—to fail in discharging which, stamped indelible infamy on the name of the unworthy and cold-hearted kinsman. Among people where goëlsism prevails, no labour is avoided, no sacrifices grudged, yea, the heaviest expenses are willingly incurred, and long toilsome journeys performed, in order to discover the hiding-place, or surprise the person of the assassin; and some have been known, amid many disappointments, to persevere for years, till they at length succeeded in fulfilling the painful obligation of obtaining satisfaction for the blood that had been shed. Niebuhr relates the story of an Arabian he met with, who had carried about with him for several years a dagger, which he meant to plunge into the heart of a person who had killed his friend, and who had always contrived to elude him; and Michaelis speaks of another Arabian, whose mother studiously concealed from him the fact of his father's murder, to prevent his leaving her to seek the assassin; but his neighbours upbraiding him with undutifulness, and he coming at last to the knowledge of his parent's fatal end, he set out and travelled over the whole of that extensive country, till at length he got a clue to the murderer, who was working in a sand pit, and, stealing upon him unawares, despatched the object of his long and anxious search. It is only a few years ago, says Sir John Malcolm, that three persons at Abushehr were delivered into the hands of the relatives of those whom they had murdered. The nearest of kin, the children of the deceased, were mere infants, but in their little hands the weapons were put, and with the aid of their relatives, thrust into the fast-bound bodies of the assassins."

If the goël should neglect to discharge the duty which devolved upon him, the next of kin to him was expected to become the blood-avenger, and in this case he received the name of Megoël, or the nearest relation but one. The custom of goëlsism prevails at this day among the Arabs; and travellers inform us that punishment is often commuted in such cases into a fine, which is paid to the family of the deceased. No such compensation for blood was permitted under the Mosaic law.

AVIGNONISTS, certain fanatics of Avignon in the last century, who adopted the errors of the Collyridians, a sect who, in the fourth century, distinguished themselves by an extraordinary devotion to the holy Virgin. The Avignonists were founded by Grabianca, a Polish nobleman, and Pernety, a Benedictine (abbé of Bural), a learned but most eccentric writer. A work published in 1790, entitled, 'The Virtues, Power, Clemency, and Glory of Mary, Mother of God,' is attributed to his pen.

AVIM or AVITES. This people seem to have been descended from Hevaeus, son of Canaan, and they are said in Deut. ii. 23 to have been expelled by the Capthorim. The scattered relics of this nation remained mixed up with the five Philistine lordships. They are supposed by Calmet to be the same with the Hivites, some of whom dwelt at Gibeon, and others at the foot of Mount Hermon. The territory of the Avim extended from Gaza to "the river of Egypt," about forty-four miles. This district corresponds to the kingdom of Gerar in the time of Abraham. The original country of the Avim is called Hazerim in Deut. ii. 23, already quoted. This tract was in the portion of Simeon. Seventeen cities with their villages are recorded as having belonged to it. But where are they now? The answer is to be found in the words of Jeremiah, (xlvii. 6, 7):—"O thou sword of the Lord, how long will it be ere thou be quiet? put up thyself into thy scabbard, rest, and be still. How can it be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge against Ashkelon, and against the sea-shore? there hath he appointed it." From these striking words of ancient prophecy, it is plain that the destruction wrought by the sword of the Lord among the Philistines was the effect of God's irreversible purpose and decree. The "sea-shore," included in this commission, would take in Tyre and Sidon.

AVITH, a city of the ancient kings of Edom, in Idumea. Gen. xxxvi. 35.

AWE, a strong sentiment of respect, mingled with emotions of fear; a reverence so deep as almost to amount to dread. Psal. xxxiii. 8. Sublime, sacred, and solemn objects, awaken awe,—they fill at once the senses, the understanding, and the imagination,—they make the beholder pause to consider whether he is worthy to approach them any nearer,—they rivet his mind and body to the spot, and render him cautious, lest by his presence he should contaminate that which is hallowed. So Jacob felt at Bethel (Gen. xxviii. 16, 17); and Peter, when prostrate at the feet of Jesus, uttered that striking exclamation (Luke v. 8), "Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord." When the creature places himself in the presence of the Creator; when he contemplates the immeasurable distance which separates himself, a frail, finite, and guilty mortal, from his infinitely perfect Maker, he stands in awe before him; his pride is humbled, his self-conceit is abashed, his petulance hushed, and his whole soul is subdued and softened by the very contemplations which most expand and ennoble it. Psal. iv. 4.

AWL, an instrument said, in Exod. xxi. 6, to have been used in perforating the ear as a sign of perpetual servitude. This custom seems to have prevailed in other Oriental countries.

AXE. This weapon seems to have been very frequently used in battle in ancient times, and from the description which is given of its effects, it must have been one of the most deadly weapons which the combatant wielded. The very words of the prophet (Jer. li. 20, 21), already referred to (See ARMS), are sufficient to show the destructive consequences of its employment. From Rev. xx. 4, this instrument appears to have been used in beheading: "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded (literally, beheaded with an axe) for the witness of Jesus." The word axe is frequently used in Scripture symbolically. Thus, "And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees." Matt. iii. 10. "It was customary with the Jewish prophets," says Adam Clarke, "to represent the kingdoms, nations, and individuals, whose ruin they predicted, under the figure of forests and trees doomed to be cut down. See Jer. xlv. 22, 23; Ezek. xxxi. 3, 11, 12. It has been well observed, that there is an allusion here to a woodman, who, having marked a tree for excision, lays his axe at its root, and strips off his outer garment, that he may wield his blows more powerfully, and that his work may be quickly performed." Long had there been a controversy between Jehovah and his vineyard, but that controversy is now about to come to an end. Only forty years more, and Jerusalem must be trodden down of the Gentiles, and the haughty descendants of Abraham be scattered to all the ends of the earth, a proverb and a byeword among all nations. Well might the Baptist declare, "The axe is now laid to the root of the tree." A rich, luxuriant foliage, a profusion of lovely blossom, is of no avail now. The axe is at the root, and if there be no fruits of holiness, no evidence of a change of heart, its doom must be pronounced by the Lord of the vineyard, "Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground?" The warning of the Baptist may be considered as addressed to every sinner.

AZAL. In Zech. xiv. 5, we find mention made of a place bearing this name; but where it was situated is not known. The signification of the word is supposed to be "at the foot of the hill."

AZARIAH, the name of several high priests among the Jews. 1 Chron. vi. 9, 10. It was also a name given to Uzziah, king of Judah. 2 Kings xv. (See UZZIAH.) Also the Hebrew name of one of the three youths mentioned in Daniel's prophecy, which was exchanged for the Chaldean Abcdnego. Dan. i. 7, iii. 19. See ABEDNEGO.

AZAZEL, the Hebrew name of the scape-goat led to the wilderness on the great day, or FAST, of EXPIATION. Lev. xvi. 10. See SCAPE-GOAT.

AZEKAH, the name of a city in the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 35. It lay to the south of Jerusalem, and east of Bethlehem, distant about four leagues from the former, and five from the latter. It was here that the five kings of the Amorites, with their confederate army, were overthrown by Joshua. Josh. x. 10. On that occasion their army was destroyed by an extraordinary shower of hailstones, so that, we are informed, "more died of the hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew." The army of the Philistines, in which was the giant Goliath, encamped at Shochoh and Azekah. 1 Sam. xvii. 1. Eusebius and Jerome state, that in their time there was a town in this quarter called Ezeca, which was probably the same as that mentioned in the Scriptures.

AZEM, a town belonging to the tribe of Simcon. Josh. xix. 3.

AZMAVETH, or AZMOTH, or BETHERMOTH, a town supposed to have been situated in the tribe of Judah, between Jerusalem and Anathoth. It is the city mentioned in Ezra ii. 24; Neh. vii. 28.

AZNOTH-TABOR, one of the boundaries of the tribe of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 34. Eusebius places it not far from Cæsarea Philippi.

AZOTUS, the New Testament name of Ashdod. See ASHDOD.

B.

BAAL, signifying Lord, was the name of a chief domestic and tutelary god of the Phœnicians, and particularly of the Tyrians; worshipped also by the Hebrews, especially at Samaria, with great pomp, along with Astarte (which see). Of the currency and extent of this worship among the Phœnicians and Carthaginians, we have a striking proof in the frequency with which the name of Baal occurs in compound proper names,—as Ethbaal, Jerubbaal, and others. Among the Babylonians the same god was worshipped under the name of Bel or Belus. Many writers have supposed, that under the name of Baal the sun was worshipped; but Gesenius has endeavoured to show, by various ingenious arguments, that not the sun, but the planet Jupiter, as the guardian and giver of good fortune, was the object of this worship. That the worship of the sun, moon, and stars, prevailed in early times, is evident from the allusion which Moses makes to the practice in Deut. iv. 19: "And lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, and the moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven, shouldst be driven to worship them, and serve them, which the Lord thy God hath divided unto all nations under the whole heaven." It is likely, indeed, that this was the earliest form in which idolatry manifested itself, and that the worship of Baal and Astarte is the most ancient form of heathenism. We find among the Egyptians a place called Heliopolis, or the city of the sun, in consequence, as tradition informs us, of a large temple being reared in it, which was dedicated to the worship of Baal, or the sun. Particular notice of the worship of the sun occurs in 2 Kings xxiii. 11: "And he took away the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun, at the entering in of the house of the Lord, by the chamber of Nathan-melech the chamberlain, which was in the suburbs, and burned the chariots of the sun with fire." As more convenient for the adoration of the hosts of heaven, the altars of Baal were generally built on high places. This is evident, among other passages, from Jeremiah xix. 5: "They have built also the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire for burnt-offerings unto Baal, which I commanded not, nor spake it, neither came it into my mind;"—a passage which also shows that it was customary to offer human sacrifices in the worship of Baal. The Druids in our own country seem to have been accustomed to adore a god of the name of Bel or Baal; and General Vallancey, to prove that the Irish are descended from the Phœnicians, tells us that this was the name of the principal deity worshipped by the ancient Irish. The priests of this idolatrous worship appear to have been very numerous. Thus Jezebel, the queen of Israel, is said in Scripture to have entertained no fewer than four hundred and fifty priests of Baal at her own table

The mode in which their worship was conducted is represented to have been of a peculiar description. While the sacrifice was smoking upon the altar, the priests danced round it with furious gesticulations and cries, cutting themselves with knives and lancets. The same practices seem to have prevailed in the worship of the Syrian goddess Astarte.

BAALAH, the name of two cities; the one was in the northern part of the tribe of Judah, called also Kirjath-jearim (Josh. xv. 9), which appears to have had a mountain of the same name in its neighbourhood (Josh. xv. 11); the other city was situated in the southern part of the same tribe. Josh. xv. 29.

BAALATH, a city of the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 44); rebuilt or fortified by Solomon (1 Kings ix. 18),—probably the same which is called (Josh. xix. 8) Baalath-beer, from its possessing a well.

BAAL-BERITH (the lord or guardian of covenants), a deity worshipped by the Shechemites. Judg. viii. 33, ix. 4. Bochart supposes that Berith is the same with Beroe, the daughter of Venus and Adonis, who was given in marriage to Bacchus, and that she gave her name to the city of Berith in Phœnicia.

BAAL-GAD, so called from the worship of Gad (that is, Fortune), at the foot of Mount Hermon, near the sources of the Jordan. Some suppose it to have been the same with the celebrated Baalbec or Helio-polis.

BAAL-HAMON, a place near which Solomon had a vineyard. Cant. viii. 11.

BAAL-HAZOR, a town or village near the territory of Ephraim (2 Sam. xiii. 23); perhaps the same as Hazor mentioned in Neh. xi. 33.

BAAL-HERMON, a town and an adjacent mountain near Mount Hermon. 1 Chron. v. 23; Judg. iii. 3.

BAAL-MEON, a city of Reuben (Numb. xxxii. 38; 1 Chron. v. 8); sometimes called Beth-baal-meon, the house or temple, of Baal-meon. The Moabites took it from the Reubenites, and were masters of it in the time of Ezekiel. Ezek. xxv. 9. Eusebius and Jerome place it nine miles from Esbus, or Esebon, at the foot of Mount Baaru, or Abarim.

BAAL-PEOR, a god of the Moabites, whose licentious rites are alluded to in Numb. xxiv. 1-9. To this idolatrous worship, mingled with the most revolting impurities, the Israelites were seduced, when encamped in the Wilderness of Sin; and the Psalmist alluding to it says (cvi. 28): "They joined themselves unto Baal-peor, and ate the offerings of the dead." From the latter clause of this verse the learned Selden has supposed that Baal-peor is the same with Pluto.

BAAL-PERAZIM, a place in the Valley of Re-phaim, not very far distant from Jerusalem. 2 Sam. v. 23. The reason of this appellation is given in 1 Chron. xiv. 11.

BAAL-SHALISHA, a place situated near the mountains of Ephraim. 2 Kings iv. 42; 1 Sam. ix. 4.

BAAL-TAMAR, a place in Benjamin, probably so called because it abounded in palm trees. Judg. xx. 33.

BAALTIS, the same as Astarte, or the moon; next to Baal, the deity most honoured by the Phœnicians. See ASTARTE—ASTAROTH.

BAAL-ZEBUB. See BEEL-ZEBUB.

BAAL-ZEPHON, a place in Egypt, near the head of the Red Sea. Exod. xiv. 2, 9; Numb. xxxiii. 7.

It is said to have derived its name from its being situated in the desert tracts between the Nile and the Red Sea, which were held to be the abode of Typhou, the evil genius of the Egyptians.

BAASHA, son of Ahijah. He was general of the armies of Nadab, king of Israel, whom he treacherously murdered at the siege of Gibbethon, taking possession of the government, which he retained for twenty-four years. He put to death the whole race of Jeroboam, who had been doomed by God to destruction. God was angry with Baasha because of idolatry, and commissioned a prophet to warn him; but, enraged at the tidings, he killed the man of God.

BABEL, TOWER OF. The Hebrew word translated Babel, signifies confusion, a name which was probably given to the tower, because of the confusion of languages which miraculously took place in the course of its erection. The land of Shinar, in which the posterity of Noah settled, lay along the river Tigris, extending from the mountains of Armenia, to the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates; and the plain of Shinar, where the tower was built, appears to have been the site of the city of Babylon afterwards. The tower was built about A.M. 2247. The shape or figure of the tower, whether round or square, has been disputed by writers on the subject. The opinion of Strabo is that it was a square pyramid.

To understand the striking history of the tower of Babel, as it is recorded in the Sacred Scriptures, we may quote the words in which it is narrated: "And the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech. And it came to pass, as they journeyed from the east, that they found a plain in the land of Shinar; and they dwelt there. And they said one to another, Go to, let us make brick, and burn them throughly. And they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar. And they said, Go to, let us build us a city and a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth. And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower, which the children of men builded. And the Lord said, Behold, the people is one, and they have all one language; and this they begin to do: and now nothing will be restrained from them, which they have imagined to do. Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech. So the Lord scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth: and they left off to build the city. Therefore is the name of it called Babel; because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth: and from thence did the Lord scatter them abroad upon the face of all the earth." Gen. xi. 1-9. From this passage we learn, that only one language was spoken, previous to the event here recorded, by the whole human family. But whether the emigration "from the east," or, perhaps, "eastward," for the original expression will bear both meanings, took place on the part of a number, or of the whole of mankind, is not certain, though the plain reading of the passage, as well as the universality of the effects which followed, would incline us to believe that mankind in a body had come to the resolution of changing their residence. At length they settled in the Plain of Shinar, where the celebrated city of Babylon afterwards stood. Here they resolved to build a city and a tower, whose top might reach unto heaven; and the object which they had in view is stated in these words: "Let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth." The precise meaning of this statement is not at first apparent. Some have supposed that the human race were afraid of a second deluge, and resorted to the building of Babel with a view to preserve themselves in the event of such a catastrophe. This, however, is far from being a probable supposition. Dr Candlish, in his 'Contributions towards the Exposition of the Book of Genesis,' gives a much more plausible explanation of the building of Babel:—"It was an act of daring rebellion against the Most High; and in particular, against his prerogative of dividing to the nations their inheritance; being avowedly intended for the very purpose of preventing the orderly dispersion which God had manifestly appointed. Comp. x. 25, xi. 4. It was, moreover, an act of apostasy from the patriarchal faith, and worship;—being probably the first open avowal and establishment of heathenism, or idolatry. For the building of the tower towards heaven,—according to their declared design, "Let us make us a name,"—had certainly a religious meaning. They meant the tower to be a religious edifice, a sacred monument, a temple. What name they were making to themselves,—what gods they intended, by means of the tower, to worship,—whether the heavenly bodies, or dead saints, or living heroes, such as Nimrod himself,—or all the three combined,—it may be difficult to say. But that their daring scheme was the flagrant consummation of their departure from the living God, is too plain, from the spirit in which it was undertaken, and the object it was meant to serve."

The judgment which followed this act of daring impiety was the confusion of tongues, and the consequent dispersion of mankind, and the population of the earth. This is one of those remarkable instances in which the wicked purposes of men have been overruled for the accomplishment of the wisest designs on the part of God. Considerable difference of opinion has existed among the learned as to the nature of the confusion. Some, as Le Clerc, have asserted, that the variety of languages which exists, has been of gradual formation, and the confusion at Babel amounted to nothing more than such a complete misunderstanding among the builders, that they were under the necessity of bringing their common work to a close, and settling in different and separate localities. Scaliger and others, again, imagine that they still continued to speak the same language, but were visited by God with such a confusion in their views and apprehensions, that they attached different meanings to the same words. Others, again, suppose that they were suddenly deprived of all language, and thus compelled to separate and to devise languages, by which each community might hold intercourse among themselves. Casaubon, followed by Bishop Patrick in his Commentary, accounts for the confusion, by alleging that the people were made so completely to forget the original language, as to speak it in a different manner one from another. Shuckford thinks that the confusion and consequent dispersion were gradual, not sudden. How many languages were at first formed by the dispersion, it is, of course, impossible to say. The Hebrews affirm that they were seventy, because the descendants of the sons of Noah, enumerated in Genesis, amounted to that number. Josephus and the fathers of the Church reckon them seventy-two. But whatever may have been the extent of the changes produced by the confusion at Babel, the languages of those who settled near the centre of population seem to have been very slightly affected by its influence. And besides, although, as we have already said, the language of the historian would seem to involve the whole human family in the sin of building the tower, and the punishment which followed, the opinion has been very generally entertained, that a considerable portion of mankind were not engaged in building the tower, and therefore were exempt from the subsequent calamities. The learned author of the article "Philology," in the last edition of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' adduces various arguments to prove that none but the progeny of Ham and their associates were present at the building of the tower, and that they alone suffered by the judgment consequent upon that event.

The earliest authentic information concerning the tower of Babel is derived from Herodotus, who describes it as a sacred enclosure dedicated to Jupiter Belus, consisting of a regular square of two stadia, or a thousand feet, on each side, and adorned with gates of brass. In the midst of this area rose a massive tower, whose length and breadth was one stadium; upon this tower arose seven others. Strabo tells us that the whole was a stadium, or five hundred feet in height. The following particulars of the tower of Belus are from Dr Prideaux:—"Till the time of Nebuchadnezzar, the temple of Belus contained no more than the [central] tower only, and the rooms in it served all the occasions of that idolatrous worship. But he enlarged it by vast buildings erected round it, in a square of two furlongs on every side, and a mile in circumference, which was one thousand eight hundred feet more than the square at the temple of Jerusalem, for that was but three thousand feet round; whereas this was, according to this account, four thousand eight hundred; and on the outside of all these buildings was a wall enclosing the whole, which may be supposed to have been of equal extent with the square in which it stood,—that is, two miles and a half in compass,—in which were several gates leading into the temple, all of solid brass; and the brazen sea, the brazen pillars, and the other brazen vessels which were carried to Babylon from the temple of Jerusalem, seem to have been employed in the making of them; for it is said that Nebuchadnezzar did put all the sacred vessels which he carried from Jerusalem into the house of his god at Babylon; that is, into this house or temple of Bel. This temple stood till the time of Xerxes; but on his return from the Grecian expedition, he demolished the whole of it, and laid it all in rubbish, having first plundered it of its immense riches, among which were several images or statues of massy gold, and one of them is said by Diodorus Siculus to have been forty feet high, which might perchance have been that which Nebuchadnezzar consecrated in the Plains of Dura."

Modern travellers mention a large artificial mound on the western side of the Euphrates, called the Birs Nimrod. We cannot describe its present appearance better than in the language of Mr Rich:—"Leaving out of the question any conjecture relative to the original destination of this ruin, the first impression made by the sight of it is, that it was a solid pile, composed in the interior of sun-burnt bricks, and perhaps earth or rubbish; that it was constructed in stages, and faced with fine bricks, having inscriptions on them, laid in a very thin layer of cement; and that it was reduced by violence to its present ruinous condition. The upper storeys have been forcibly broken down, and fire has been employed as an instrument of destruction, though it is not easy to say how. The facing of fine bricks has been partly removed, and partly covered by the falling down of the mass, which is supported and kept together. The Birs Nimrod is, in all likelihood, at present pretty nearly in the same state in which Alexander saw it, if we give any credit to the report, that ten thousand men could only remove the rubbish, preparatory to repairing it, in two months. If, indeed, it required one half of that number to disencumber it, the state of dilapidation must have been complete. The immense masses of vitrified brick which are seen on the top of the mound, appear to have marked its summit since its destruction. The rubbish about its base was probably in much greater quantities, the weather having dissipated most of it in the course of so many revolving ages; and possibly portions of the exterior facing of fine brick may have disappeared at different periods." This description is a striking commentary upon the words of the Prophet Jeremiah (li. 25, 26, 44): "Behold, I am against thee, O destroying mountain, saith the Lord, which destroyest all the earth: and I will stretch out mine hand upon thee, and roll thee down from the rocks, and will make thee a burnt mountain. And they shall not take of thee a stone for a corner, nor a stone for foundations; but thou shalt be desolate for ever, saith the Lord. And I will punish Bel in Babylon, and I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed up: and the nations shall not flow together any more unto him: yea, the wall of Babylon shall fall."

BABYLON, CITY OF, the capital of the ancient kingdom of Babylonia. Its precise situation is not distinctly known, but it was situated on the river Euphrates, and as is supposed in north lat. 32° 28' 30" and east long. 44° 9' 45". Its early history is involved in much darkness. Josephus says that Nimrod, the grandson of Ham, was the founder of Babylon, and it was almost completely rebuilt by Semiramis, the Assyrian queen, B.C. 1200. Nebuchadnezzar, according to Eusebius, so improved and adorned it, as to have rendered it one of the wonders of the world. Hence his proud exclamation—"Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty?" Dan. iv. 30. This magnificent city stood in the midst of a large plain, and was divided into two parts by the river Euphrates, which ran through it from north to south. Hence it is described in Jer. li. 13, "O thou that dwellest upon many waters, abundant in treasures, thine end is come, and the measure of thy covetousness." The inhabitants were exceedingly credulous, superstitious, lewd, and debauched. Modesty, indeed, appears to have been utterly banished from all ranks. So debasing and brutifying was their idolatry,—or so much did they render the name of their religion subservient to their passions,—that practices the most abominable, which were universal among them, formed the very observance of some of their religious rites, of which even heathen writers could not speak but in terms of indignation and abhorrence. Against the Babylonians, therefore, for their idolatry, tyranny, pride, drunkenness, and lewdness,—in which they at once gloried and "trusted,"—the Spirit of God denounced the just and terrible judgments of Heaven. "Thou hast trusted in thy wickedness, and thy wisdom, and thy knowledge, it hath perverted thee, therefore shall evil come upon thee: none shall save thee. Behold the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it. I will cut off from Babylon the name and remnant, the son and nephew, saith the Lord; and I will sweep it with the besom of destruction." Isa. xiii. 9; xiv. 22, 23; xlvii. 10. Nor has one word failed of all the denunciations of wrath which were uttered against this city of "idols and graven images."

For the space of twenty-six years after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, Babylon continued to retain its glory, and was at once the seat of an imperial court, the station of a numerous garrison, and the scene of a most extensive commerce. It was at length invested, about 540 years before the Christian era, by the victorious armies of Cyrus the Great, who, having turned the river into another channel, obtained possession of the city, slew the king Belshazzar, and reduced the proud and wicked inhabitants under the Persian yoke. Jer. li. 31. From that period Babylon ceased to be the metropolis of a kingdom, and its grandeur very rapidly decayed.

The Babylonians having afterwards rebelled against the Persians, Darius Hystapes, B.C. 518, marched against them with a numerous army, and invested the city. Determined upon a desperate defence, and desirous to make their provisions last as long as possible, the inhabitants adopted the barbarous resolution of destroying all such persons in the city as could be of no service during the siege. Having, accordingly, sacrificed the lives of their friends and nearest relatives, and resolutely regardless of their own, they resisted successfully all the strength of the Persians for the space of eighteen months. But, by a stratagem far from being honourable to the conqueror, Babylon at length fell into the hands of Darius. As soon as the Persian monarch was in possession of the city, he ordered its hundred gates and its impregnable walls to be demolished, and put to death 3000 of the principal of its inhabitants. See Jer. li. 58.

In the year B.C. 478, Xerxes, the successor of Darius, plundered the temple of Belus of its immense wealth, and then laid its lofty tower in ruins. In this state it continued till the year B.C. 324, when Alexander the Great made an attempt to restore Babylon and its temple to their former magnificence; but his sudden death put an end to the undertaking. Under the successors of Alexander, this mighty city rapidly declined, and in the year B.C. 294, it was almost exhausted of its inhabitants by Selencus Nicator, who built, about fifty miles to the north of it, the city of Selucia. (See Jer. li. 41-46.)

The city originally consisted of twenty-five principal streets, intersecting each other, and which divided the city into a number of small squares, amounting to six hundred and twenty-six. A most magnificent bridge was thrown across the Euphrates, and at the two ends of the bridge were two splendid palaces, connected with each other by a passage running under the bed of the river. The old palace stood on the east end of the bridge, near which was the temple of Belus, enclosing the tower of Babel. The new palace, which stood on the west side of the river, was nearly four times as large as the other, being seven and a half miles in circumference, and surrounded by a lofty triple wall. This new palace was built by Nebuchadnezzar, and in it Alexander the Great died. Near this palace were situated the Hanging Gardens raised by Nebuchadnezzar, which were piled on a successive series of terraces as high as the walls. It is somewhat remarkable that Herodotus makes no mention of these gardens. The walls of Babylon appear to have been of immense height and breadth, though writers differ widely as to their precise dimensions. Diodorus Siculus says that they were so broad, that six chariots could be driven together upon them; and Herodotus states that they were eighty-seven feet in breadth. They were built of brick, baked in the sun, and cemented with bitumen. In each of the four sides were twenty-five gates of solid brass. Hence Isaiah (xlv. 2), speaking of Babylon, "I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight: I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron." The towers on the walls amounted to two hundred and fifty. The walls were composed of brick, and cemented by a glutinous earth called bitumen, which possessed the quality of hardening by course of time, and becoming durable as stone. The walls, for greater security, were surrounded on the outside with a ditch, which was always filled with water. The city was in its greatest glory in the time of Nebuchadnezzar. In the reign of his grandson, Belshazzar, it was taken and destroyed by Cyrus, king of the Medes. It is deeply interesting to mark the complete accordance of the actual events with the Scripture predictions.

The following striking comparison of the predictions of Scripture, in regard to the fate of Babylon, with its actual fulfilment, as narrated by the most recent travellers, is taken from the highly popular work of Dr Keith, on the 'Evidence of Prophecy':—"From the temple of Belus and the two royal palaces, to the streets of the city and single dwellings, all have become heaps; and the only difference or gradation now is from the vast and solid masses of ruins, which look like mountains, to the slight mound that is scarcely elevated above the plain. 'Babylon is fallen,' literally FALLEN to such a degree, that those who stand on its site and look on numerous parallel mounds, with a hollow space between, are sometimes at a loss to distinguish between the remains of a street or a canal, or to tell where the crowds frequented or where the waters flowed. 'Babylon is fallen,' till its ruins cannot fall lower than they lie. It is cut down to the ground. Her foundations are fallen; and the ruins rest not on them. Its palaces, temples, streets, and houses, lie 'buried in shapeless heaps.' And 'the view of Babylon,' as taken from the spot, is truly a picture of utter desolation, presenting its heaps to the eye, and showing how, as if literally buried under them, 'Babylon is brought down to the grave.'

"'Cast her up as heaps.'—Mr Rich, in describing a grand heap of ruins, the shape of which is nearly a square of seven hundred yards in length and breadth, states, that the workmen pierce into it in every direction in search of bricks, 'hollowing out deep ravines and pits, and throwing up the rubbish in heaps on the surface.' 'The summit of the Kasr' (supposed to have been the lesser palace), is, in like manner, 'covered with heaps of rubbish.'

"'Let nothing of her be left.'—'Vast heaps constitute all that now remains of ancient Babylon.' All its grandeur is departed,—all its treasures have been spoiled,—all its excellence has utterly vanished; the very heaps are searched for bricks, when nothing else can be found;—even these are not left wherever they can be taken away, and Babylon has for ages been 'a quarry above ground,' ready to the hand of every successive despoiler. Without the most remote allusion to this prophecy, Captain Mignan describes a mound attached to the palace, ninety yards in breadth by half that height, the whole of which is deeply furrowed in the same manner as the generality of the mounds. 'The ground is extremely soft, and tiresome to walk over, and appears completely exhausted of all its building materials; nothing now is left save one towering hill, the earth of which is mixed with fragments of broken brick, red varnished pottery, tile, bitumen, mortar, glass, shells, and pieces of mother-of-pearl,'—worthless fragments, of no value to the poorest. 'From thence shall she be taken,—let nothing of her be left.' One traveller, towards the end of last century, passed over the site of ancient Babylon, without being conscious of having traversed it.

"'Babylon shall be pools of water.'—While the workmen cast her up as heaps in piling up the rubbish while excavating for bricks, that they may take them from thence, and that nothing may be left; they labour more than trebly in the fulfilment of prophecy; for the numerous and deep excavations form pools of water, on the overflowing of the Euphrates, and, annually filled, they are not dried up throughout the year. 'Deep cavities are also formed by the Arabs, when digging for hidden treasure.' 'The ground is sometimes covered with pools of water in the hollows.'

"'Sit on the dust, sit on the ground, O daughter of the Chaldeans.'—The surface of the mounds, which form all that remains of Babylon, consists of decomposed buildings, reduced to dust; and over all the ancient streets and habitations there is literally nothing but the dust or the ground on which to sit.

"'Thy nakedness shall be uncovered.'—'Our path,' says Captain Mignan, 'lay through the great mass of ruined heaps on the site of "shrunk Babylon".' And I am perfectly incapable of conveying an adequate idea of the dreary, lonely nakedness that appeared before me.

"'Sit thou silent, and get thee into darkness.'—There reigns throughout the ruins 'a silence profound as the grave.' Babylon is now a 'silent scene, a sublime solitude.'

"'It shall never be inhabited, nor dwell in from generation to generation.'—From Rauwolf's testimony it appears that in the sixteenth century 'there was not a house to be seen.' And now 'the eye wanders over a barren desert in which the ruins are nearly the only indication that it ever had been inhabited.' 'It is impossible,' adds Major Keppel, 'to behold this scene, and not to be reminded how exactly the predictions of Isaiah and Jeremiah have been fulfilled, even in the appearance Babylon was doomed to present, that she should never be inhabited; that the "Arabian should not pitch his tent there"; that she should "become heaps"; that her cities should be "a desolation, a dry land, and a wilderness".' 'Babylon is spurned alike by the heel of the Ottomans, the Israelites, and the sons of Ishmael.' It is 'a tenantless and desolate metropolis.' 'It shall not be inhabited, but be wholly desolate.'

"'Neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their folds there.'—It was prophesied of Ammon that it should be a stable for camels, and a couching-place for flocks; and of Philistia, that it should be cottages for shepherds, and a pasture for flocks. But Babylon was to be visited with a far greater desolation, and to become unfit or unsuited even for such a purpose; and that neither a tent would be pitched there, even by an Arab, nor a fold made by a shepherd, implies the last degree of solitude and desolation. 'It is common in these parts for shepherds to make use of ruined edifices to shelter their flocks in.' But Babylon is an exception. Instead of taking the bricks from thence, the shepherd might with facility erect a defence from wild beasts, and make a fold for his flock amidst the heaps of Babylon; and the Arab who fearlessly traverses it by day, might pitch his tent by night. But neither the one nor the other could now be persuaded to remain a single night among the ruins. The superstitious dread of evil spirits, far more than the natural terror of the wild beasts, effectually prevents them. Captain Mignan was accompanied by six Arabs, completely armed; but he 'could not induce them to remain towards night, from the apprehension of evil spirits. It is impossible to eradicate this idea from the minds of these people, who are very deeply imbued with superstition.' And when the sun sunk behind the Mujelibè, and the moon would have still lighted his way among the ruins, it was with infinite regret that he obeyed 'the summons of his guides.' 'All the people of the country assert that it is extremely dangerous to approach this mound after night-fall, on account of the multitude of evil spirits by which it is haunted.' 'Neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their folds there.' But

"'Wild beasts of the desert shall lie there, and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs (goats) shall dance there,' &c.—'There are many dens of wild beasts in various parts. There are quantities of porcupine quills. And while the lower excavations are often pools of water, 'in most of the cavities are numbers of bats and owls.' 'These souterrains (caverns), over which the chambers of majesty may have been spread, are now the refuge of jackalls, and other savage animals. The mouths of their entrances are strewed with the bones of sheep and goats; and the loathsome smell that issues from most of them is sufficient warning not to proceed into the den.' The king of the forest now ranges over the site of that Babylon which Nebuchadnezzar built for his own glory; and the temple of Belus, the greatest work of man, is now like unto a natural den of lions. 'Two or three majestic lions' were seen upon its heights by Sir Robert Ker Porter, as he was approaching it; and 'the broad prints of their feet were left plain in the clayey soil.' Major Keppel saw there a similar foot-print of a lion. It is also the unmolested retreat of jackalls, hyenas, and other noxious animals. Wild beasts are 'numerous' at the Mujelibè, as well as on Birs Nimrood. 'The mound was full of large holes: we entered some of them, and found them strewed with the carcasses and skeletons of animals recently killed. The ordure of wild beasts was so strong that prudence got the better of curiosity; for we had no doubt as to the savage nature of the inhabitants. Our guides, indeed, told us that all the ruins abounded in lions, and other wild beasts; so literally has the Divine prediction been fulfilled, that wild beasts of the desert should lie there, and their houses be full of doleful creatures,—that the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses.'

"'The sea is come upon Babylon; she is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof.'—The traces of the western bank of the Euphrates are now no longer discernible. The river overflows unrestrained; and the very ruins, 'with every appearance of the embankment,' have been swept away. 'The ground there is low and marshy, and presents not the slightest vestige of former buildings, of any description whatever.' 'Morasses and ponds tracked the ground in various parts. For a long time after the general subsiding of the Euphrates, great part of this plain is little better than a swamp,' &c. 'The ruins of Babylon are then inundated, so as to render many parts of them inaccessible, by converting the valleys among them into morasses.' But while Babylon is thus covered with the multitude of waves, and the waters come upon it, yet, in striking contrast and seeming contradiction to such a feature of desolation (like the formation of pools of water from the casting up of heaps), at all times the elevated sun-burnt ruins which the waters do not overflow, and, generally throughout the year, the 'dry waste, and parched and burning plain on which the heaps of Babylon lie, equally prove that it is a desert, a dry land, and a wilderness. One part, even on the western side of the river, is 'low and marshy, and another an arid desert.'

"'It shall never be inhabited; it shall be utterly desolate.'—'Ruins composed, like those of Babylon, of heaps of rubbish impregnated with nitre, cannot be cultivated.' 'The decomposing materials of a Babylonian structure doom the earth on which they perish to everlasting sterility. On this part of the plain, both where traces of buildings were left and where none had stood, all seemed equally naked of vegetation; the whole ground appearing as if it had been washed over and over again, by the coming and receding waters, till every bit of genial soil was swept away; its half-clay half-sandy surface being left in ridgy streaks, like what is often seen on the flat shores of the sea after the retreating of the tide.' Babylon, which, in its pride, did say, 'I shall be a lady for ever,' is no more called 'The lady of kingdoms,' but is 'desolate for ever.'"

BABYLON, COUNTRY OF, generally called Babylonia or Chaldea, and inhabited by the Chaldeans or Chasdim. It is a country of Asia, bordering upon the Tigris and Euphrates, called in Scripture the "land of Shinar." It is now a Turkish province, having Bagdad as its capital city. What chiefly attracts the traveller as he passes through the vast plain of Chaldea, is the immense artificial mounds which everywhere present themselves, being visible at great distances. "Those beacons over the dreary sand," says Mr Ainsworth, "may be seen rising from the horizon's verge like giant pillars, deceiving the weary traveller in their distance, and contorted by a lake of light into a hundred fantastic forms; yet still faithfully guiding him to one point in his destination. Such is the pile of Aker-kuf; such the memorable Birs, and the still more colossal mounds of Orchoe, of Terdes, and of Irák." The researches of modern travellers, particularly of Rich and Botta and the indefatigable Layard, have brought to light many curious antiquities tending to throw much light on the manners and customs, as well as the history, of the ancient Babylonians and Assyrians. Ainsworth thus concisely describes the present general aspect of the country, "The great extent of the plains of Babylonia is every where altered by artificial works; mounds rise upon the otherwise uniform level; walls and mud ramparts and dykes intersect each other; elevated masses of friable soil and pottery are succeeded by low plains, inundated during the greater part of the year; and the antique beds of canals are visible in every direction. There is still some cultivation and some irrigation. Flocks pasture in meadows of the coarse grasses; the Arab's dusky encampments are met with here and there, but, except on Euphrates' banks there are few remains of the date-groves, the vineyards and the gardens, which adorned the same land in the days of Artaxerxes; and still less of the population and labour which must have made a garden of such a soil in the times of Nebuchadnezzar." The grand era of Babylonian greatness commences with Nebuchadnezzar, who succeeded his father shortly after the overthrow of Nineveh. Most of the great works for which his capital was famous are due to him, or to Nitocris his queen. Under Nebuchadnezzar Babylon became the mistress of the East, and its vast power excited the jealousy of surrounding nations. Pharaoh-Necho was the first to take up arms against him, and after being repulsed in the kingdom of Judah, joined battle with the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish, was defeated, and driven out of Asia. It was immediately after this that the Chaldeans marched against Jerusalem, de-throned the king whom the Egyptians had set up, and carried away a great number of prisoners, among whom were Daniel and his three friends, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah. The conquest of Egypt seems to have been the crowning work of Nebuchadnezzar's life; and on his return to Babylon, he seems to have spent the remainder of his reign in improving and beautifying the city. The Chaldaea-Babylonian empire, comprehending all Western Asia as far as the Mediterranean, never exceeded the limits it attained under the rule of Nebuchadnezzar, and on the death of its founder it began to decline. The book of Daniel relates its fall under his third or fourth successor, before the assault of Cyrus the Mede, B.C. 538. Babylon now remained subject to the Persian power, which dated from this period a vast predominance in Asia. Xenophon informs us that Cyrus's empire was bounded to the east by the Red Sea; to the north by the Black Sea; to the west by Cyprus and Egypt; to the south by Ethiopia. Babylon fell under the sway of the all-conquering Alexander. "He traversed the whole province of Babylon," says Plutarch, "which immediately made its submission. It was in this famous city that Alexander died of a fever brought on by eastern habits." The Seleucidæ for a time made Babylon the seat of an empire which succumbed in power to the Romans. After this time Babylon was, of course, only a distant and insignificant fragment of the Roman empire, lessening daily in fame and importance, until it eventually shared the fate of its sister Nineveh, and sunk beneath the very surface of the earth. The physical geography of the country of Babylon rendered it peculiarly adapted to be the scene of much commercial enterprise. "The whole of Babylonia," Professor Hecren tells us, "was intersected by a variety of large and small canals, some running right across the country from one river to the other, and answering the double purpose of a communication between these and the irrigation of the soil, while others were formed solely for the latter object. These canals began above Babylonia Proper, or Mesopotamia; four of the largest, running from the Tigris to the Euphrates, being formed north of the Median wall, about two miles and a half apart, and sufficiently broad and deep to be navigable for ships of burden. It is impossible to determine the number of these canals, for, according to the testimony of Herodotus, the whole land was every where intersected by them, from their being every where indispensable for the watering of the soil. He relates as a curious fact, that the Euphrates, which had formerly flowed to the sea almost in a direct line, had been rendered so serpentine in its windings by the number of canals dug above and in the neighbourhood of Babylon, that in its passage to the city, it passed three times the Assyrian village of Ardericca. The climate of this country is temperate, and the soil is said to have, in ancient times, rivalled that of Egypt in fertility. The government was despotic in the highest degree, every thing being regulated by the will of the prince. Chaldea or Babylonia is usually allowed to have been the cradle of science, particularly of astronomy. The Babylonian is unquestionably the most ancient of the great classes of cuneiform writing. It is well known that legends in this character are stamped upon the bricks which are excavated from the foundations of all the buildings in Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea, that possess the highest and most authentic claims to antiquity; and it is hardly extravagant, therefore, to assign its invention to the primitive race which settled in the plains of Shinar. Orientalists have been long divided in opinion as to whether its multitudinous branches can be considered as belonging to one type of alphabet and language. Those who have studied the subject with most care, have arrived at the conviction that all the inscriptions in the complicated cuneiform character which are severally found upon rocks, upon bricks, upon slabs, and upon cylinders, from the Persian mountains to the shores of the Mediterranean, do in reality belong to one alphabetical system. Colonel Rawlinson, however, can hardly subscribe in all its amplitude to this general and complete amalgamation. The complicated cuneiform character he divides into three distinct groups, the Babylonian, Assyrian, and Elymæan. In sacred Scripture Babylon is spoken of as "the glory of kingdoms; the beauty of the Chaldee excellency; the lady of kingdoms, given to pleasure; that dwelleth carelessly, and sayeth in her heart, I am, and there is none else beside me." What a striking contrast does its present aspect afford to its ancient greatness! It is now a desolate and barren country.

BABYLONIA, the province of which Babylon was the capital, and which is now called Irak. See BABYLON, COUNTRY OF.

BABYLON OF PETER. In his First Epistle (v. 13) these words occur: "The Church that is at Babylon saluteth you." Considerable diversity of opinion has existed among the learned as to the precise meaning of the apostle in this verse. Some, as Mill, Pearson, Wolff, Wall, and Fabricius, interpret it as referring to Babylon in Egypt. Lardner, however, has successfully combated this idea, and ably argues in favour of its figurative application to Rome,—an opinion which has been maintained by the ancients, and many eminent moderns. Many distinguished commentators, among whom may be mentioned Erasmus, Beza, Lightfoot, Sealiger, Le Clerc, Wetstein, Schlusner, and Rosenmüller, understand it as referring to Babylon in Assyria. But these commentators are not agreed whether it refers to Seleucia, the modern city, or to old Babylon. The latter alternative is held by Rosenmüller. Taylor, in his 'Illustrations of Calmet,' hazards the opinion that the Babylon to which Peter refers was not a city, but a district of country in the neighbourhood of Orfa, which is the ancient Edessa.

BABYLON THE GREAT, an appellation given to the false Church, or antichristian apostasy, by the writer of the Apocalypse. Rev. xiv., xviii. To perceive the force and propriety of denominating the apostate Church of Rome by the name of this renowned city, it is only necessary to consider that the kings of Babylon were in former times the most formidable enemies which God's ancient people, the Jews, had; and that in various respects. For not only as a nation did they suffer more from the Babylonians, by the invasion of their country, and their being carried into captivity, but much also of that corruption of their worship which brought down the judgments of Heaven upon them, seems to have been derived from that country. Hence the Prophet Jeremiah (l. 38), describing ancient Babylon, says, "It is the land of graven images, and they are mad upon their idols." And again (li. 7,) "Babylon hath been a golden cup in the Lord's hand, that made all the earth drunken: the nations have drunken of her wine; therefore the nations are mad." Thus, "as Babylon of old was the first of all idolatrous cities, she is taken as the fittest emblem to set forth the enormous guilt, and to exhibit in full light the extensive influence, of idolatrous Rome; each in its turn being the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth; the former corrupting the Heathen world with her fornication, and the latter the Christian." See ANTICHRIST.

BACA (or mullberry trees), the name of a valley mentioned only in Psal. lxxxiv. 6: "Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well; the rain also filleth the pools." Bishop Horne supposes it, with great probability, to have been a valley on the road to Jerusalem; while Taylor, in the 'Fragments of Calmet,' places it among the mountains of Lebanon, north of Judea. It may signify the valley of tears, or weepers, or Bochim, referred to in Judg. ii. 1; 2 Sam. v. 23.

BACHUTH-ALLON (the oak of weeping); probably thus denominated, because here Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, died and was buried. Gen. xxxv. 8. Here also Deborah, the prophetess, judged Israel. Judg. iv. 5.

BACK, the opposite of the face. God casts our sins behind his back when he fully forgives them, so as to place them no more in the light of his countenance to punish them. Isa. xxxviii. 17; Psal. xc. 8; Jer. xvi. 17. He shows men the back, and not the face, when he disregards them, and refuses to smile on or show favour to them. Jer. xviii. 17. Christ's giving his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair, imports his ready and cheerful exposure of himself to suffering for our sake. Isa. l. 6. Men's turning their back on God, or his temple; their looking back, going back, drawing back, turning back, from him, import their contempt of him,—their gradual revolt from the knowledge, love, profession, and practice of his truth. Jer. ii. 27, xxxii. 33. Their casting him or his laws behind their back, imports their utmost contempt and abhorrence of both. Ezek. xxiii. 35; Neh. ix. 26. The Church has her back ploughed on, when her members are cruelly oppressed and persecuted. Psal. cxxix. 3. The Jews, since the crucifixion of Christ, have their back bowed down alway. The strength of their nation, their government, and great men, are gone; and they are laden and grievously weighed down with slavery, oppression, and sorrow. Psal. lxxix. 23; Rom. xi. 10.

BACK, or BACKWARD. In the metaphorical language, to go, or turn back or backward, denotes wilful rebellion, and active apostasy from God. Jer. vii. 24. To be driven, turn, or fall backwards, imports disappointment, and sudden, unexpected, and fearful destruction. Psal. xl. 14, lxx. 2; Isa. xxviii. 13, xlv. 25. To turn judgment backwards, is violently to pervert good laws and their sanctions, in order to promote and maintain wickedness. Isa. lix. 14.

BACKBITE, to speak evil of an absent person. Paul classes this sin with several others of a heinous nature. Rom. i. 30. See DETRACTION—SLANDER.

BACKSLIDING, the act of turning from the path of duty. It may be considered as partial, when applied to true believers, who do not backslide with the whole bent of their will; as voluntary, when applied to those who, after professing to know the truth, wilfully turn from it, and live in the practice of sin; as final, when the mind is given up to judicial hardness, as in the case of Judas. Partial backsliding must be distinguished from hypocrisy, as the former may exist where there are gracious intentions on the whole; but the latter is a studied profession of appearing to be what we are not.

The causes of backsliding are,—the cares of the world,—improper connections,—inattention to secret or closet duties,—self-conceit and dependence,—indulgence,—listening to, and parleying with temptations. A backsliding state is manifested by indifference to prayer and self-examination, trifling or unprofitable conversation, neglect of public ordinances, shunning the people of God, associating with the world, thinking lightly of sin, neglect of the Bible, and often by gross immorality. The consequences of this awful state are,—loss of character, loss of comfort, loss of usefulness; and, as long as any remain in this state, a loss of a well-grounded hope of future happiness. To avoid this state, or recover from it, we should beware of the first appearance of sin; be much in prayer; attend the ordinances, and unite with the people of God. We should consider the awful instances of apostasy,—as Saul, Judas, Demas, &c.; the many warnings we have of it (Matt. xxiv. 13; Heb. x. 38; Luke ix. 62); how it grieves the Holy Spirit; and how wretched it makes us;—above all things, our dependence should be on God, that we may always be directed by his Spirit, and kept by his power. See APOSTASY.

BACON (SIR FRANCIS), Lord Verulam. Few men have exercised a greater influence over the progress of the human mind in researches of all kinds, both religious and secular, than the distinguished man whose name is prefixed to the present article. He was born in London, on the 22d January 1561, his father being Keeper of the Great Seal. Being educated for the bar, he rapidly rose to great eminence in his profession, and became Lord High Chancellor of England. His talents had early attracted the notice of Queen Elizabeth, and all who were acquainted with his large and capacious mind, and the vast acquirements which he had made, even while yet young, could not fail to admire his extraordinary genius. Early had he begun to perceive the imperfections of the Aristotelian method in physics, and to project improvements in the mode of investigation. And even his exaltation to the highest judicial office in the kingdom did not divert his mind from the pursuit of those points which he seemed always to regard as the studies of his life. Amidst the multiplicity and variety of engagements in which his high station involved him, he still found time for his favourite study of philosophy. In 1620 he published his most finished performance under the title of Notum Organum Scientiarum, which formed the sequel to his 'Grand Instauration of the Sciences.' In this work he illustrates the true mode of interpreting nature by sound inductions,—far remote from those purile sophistries which had so long disgraced the schools. He dedicated it to the king, who favourably received it, and wrote him a letter of approval with his own hand. It was highly appreciated by the learned men of his time, who regarded it as a standard of true philosophical inquiry; and later times have not been unjust to his memory, in styling him "The Father of the Inductive Philosophy."

While, however, he was thus acquiring the greatest credit as a philosopher, a storm was rising, which soon overwhelmed him with dishonour. Being of an easy temper, and naturally generous and profuse in his domestic economy, his household had been guilty of great impositions, at which he had inconsiderately connived; and in March, 1621, he was accused by the House of Commons of having taken bribes in causes that had come before him as chancellor. At first he attempted to defend himself from the charges, but more accusations being brought against him, he was impeached before the Lords, on which he threw himself on the mercy of his judges, and received sentence to pay a fine of forty thousand pounds, to be imprisoned in the Tower during the king's pleasure, to be incapable of holding any place of trust in the state, and never to sit in Parliament, or come within the verge of the court. In two days he was released from his confinement, and obtained access to his majesty, who granted him several favours, and at last remitted the whole sentence; but he never recovered himself from this disgrace. From the whole of the circumstances connected with this distressing affair, it is only too evident that Bacon was really guilty of being a corrupt judge; and we must, however reluctantly, admit the truth of the poet's description of this wonderful man,—

"The greatest, wisest, meanest of mankind."

Being now freed from the hurry of public business, Lord Bacon found full leisure for more pleasing and congenial studies, and he frequently lamented that he had been so long diverted from them by the pursuits of ambition and false glory. During the five years which intervened between his misfortunes and his death, he published a number of interesting and important works, in addition to the revision and arrangement of several of his former treatises; and we cannot too much admire the compass of mind that, under so many discouragements, could accomplish in so short a period what would have constituted, in ordinary men, the labour of a long life. At this time he wrote his 'History of Henry VII.,' 'Essays; or, Counsels Civil and Moral;' and the third, fourth, and fifth parts of the 'Grand Instauration of the Sciences;'—by which last work in particular he enlarged the boundaries of science beyond all who had gone before him, as both individuals and learned societies of all the most civilized nations of Europe have freely acknowledged.

And as his philosophy dealt not in metaphysical subtleties, but in the sober results of experimental deduction, there was little tendency in his mind to doubt or oppose the great truths of religion. From many parts of his writings, he appears to have been a firm believer, and experimentally acquainted with the power of these sacred principles; and his retirement seems to have been much spent in this study, and his strongest consolations in adversity to have been drawn from this Divine source. His sentiments on these subjects appear to have been what is called moderate Calvinism; that is to say, while he firmly believed the doctrine of the Divine decrees, and their influence on the future character of the elect, he maintained the absolute accountableness of man, the full and free invitations of the gospel, and the infinite value of the death of Christ to save all,—though, through unbelief, many fall short of the blessing. This will be better illustrated by a short quotation from his confession of faith: "I believe that the sufferings of Christ, as they are sufficient to take away the sins of the whole world, so they are only effectual to those who are regenerate by the Holy Ghost, who breatheth where he will of his free grace; which grace, as the seed incorruptible, quickeneth the spirit of man, and conceiveth him anew a son of God, and a member of Christ."

In these pursuits he spent the years of his retirement, gradually becoming more infirm, but frequently exerting his faculties with an application beyond his strength, till he at last fell a sacrifice to his zeal in making some experiments with regard to the preservation of bodies. He was suddenly affected in his head and stomach, so that, not being able to reach his home, he was obliged to retire to the house of the Earl of Arundel, at Highgate, where he sickened of a fever and defluxion on his breast, and, after a week's illness, expired in the sixty-sixth year of his age, on the 9th of April 1626. He was buried privately at St Albans, and his tomb remained for some time undistinguished, until Sir Thomas Meautys, who had formerly been his servant, raised a monument to his memory. Thus died Lord Bacon, of whom it is little to say, that he was one of the greatest philosophers of modern times. To him belongs the praise of striking out a new path to science, and rescuing it from that load of metaphysical jargon which had overwhelmed and nearly extinguished it. Goethe says, "He drew a sponge over the table of human knowledge." His contemporaries could not fully appreciate the extent of his genius, and the value of his labours. Sensible of this himself, he says in his will, "My name and memory I bequeath to foreign nations and to my own countrymen, after some time be passed over!" With regard to physics, if the learned of our times have made more brilliant discoveries, few will deny that it was Bacon who led the way to those discoveries, and laid the foundation of the sciences in the most solid and decisive experiments.

That the Baconian method has been adopted by the best writers on metaphysical and moral, and even theological subjects, might be easily proved by a reference to the most distinguished writers, both of this country and the continent of Europe, as well as of America. No man, however, valued more highly, and exemplified more fully, the practical influence of the Baconian method than the late lamented Dr Chalmers. His own mind was thoroughly practical, and therefore he was all the better qualified to appreciate the method of Bacon. It has been well remarked, indeed, by Mr Morell, that the spirit of the whole of Bacon's philosophy "was such as could not fail to leave an indelible impression upon every subject lying within the range of human research." "Bacon," says Professor Powell, "wrote for ages to come. And it may be safely affirmed, that though we could name several philosophers, who, placed in the same circumstances as Galileo, might have made the same discoveries, yet we cannot say this of Bacon; we might find substitutes for the one but not for the other." In a word, we must entirely agree with D'Alembert, that "when one considers the sound and enlarged views of this great man, the multitude of the objects to which his mind was turned; and the boldness of his style which unites the most sublime images with the most rigorous precision, one is disposed to regard him as the greatest, the most universal, and the most eloquent of philosophers."

BACON'S PHILOSOPHY: It is impossible to estimate too highly the influence which was produced upon the intellectual progress of mankind, by the revolution which was effected by the introduction of the Baconian or inductive philosophy. It is a curious fact, that Aristotle seems so far to have acted upon the principles afterwards enforced by Bacon, as to have been most industrious in the collection of facts; but he seems never for a moment to have imagined that these had the slightest connection with the general principles which he regarded as the ground-work of his system. All nature was rendered subservient to metaphysics, and instead of attempting, by a careful induction of particulars, to arrive at general principles, he set out with these at first, endeavouring to distort all the facts and phenomena of nature to their support and vindication. The inductive system, however, or the rising from particulars to generals, was the mode of investigation which most of the physical sciences seemed to favour. Galileo had done much, by his experimental researches, to pave the way for the open introduction of the system, but it was not until the publication of the Novum Organum of Bacon that it was fully developed. And yet in striving to avoid one error, the distinguished originator of the inductive system has perhaps inadvertently fallen into another. He has perhaps been too severe in discarding principles from the investigations of physical philosophers, even at the outset of their inquiries; for it is a well-known fact, that a very general mode of proceeding is, to start from hypotheses which occur to the mind, and in the course of the examination of these, facts present themselves, which, in the end, lead to important results. It is not in every case that the Baconian system is strictly applicable; but it is peculiarly valuable in guiding the researches of philosophers generally, and more particularly, in withdrawing the minds of inquirers at the period of its first promulgation from the absurd investigation of universals to the due consideration of particulars. The mind of Bacon was, perhaps, the most vigorous, the most colossal, that has ever appeared. He stands almost single and alone in the history of science, a man not of an age, but of many generations. "The range which Bacon's speculations embraced," says the late Professor Playfair, "was altogether immense. He cast a penetrating eye on the whole of science, from its feeblest and most infantine state to that strength and perfection from which it was then so remote, and which it is perhaps destined to approach to continually, but never to attain. More substitutes might be found for Galileo than for Bacon. More than one could be mentioned who, in the place of the former, would have done what he did; but the history of human knowledge points out nobody of whom it can be said, that, placed in the situation of Bacon, he would have done what Bacon did; no man whose prophetic genius would have enabled him to delineate a system of science, which had not yet begun to exist,—who could have derived the knowledge of what ought to be, from what was not, and who could have become so rich in wisdom, though he received from his predecessors no inheritance but their errors." "He is destined," adds the same writer, in another passage, with an elegance peculiarly his own, "he is destined, if, indeed, anything in the world be so destined, to remain an instantia singularis among men; and as he had no rival in the times that are past, so is he likely to have none in those which are to come. Before any parallel to him can be found, not only must a man of the same talents be produced, but he must be placed in the same circumstances; the memory of his predecessor must be effaced, and the light of science, after being entirely extinguished, must be again beginning to revive. If a second Bacon is ever to arise, he must be ignorant of the first."

Bacon lays it down as a fundamental principle in the study of physical science, that, for the attainment of a sound philosophy of nature, there must previously be a natural history of phenomena and facts, which may form its ground-work, and from the study of which principles may be deduced. This being accomplished, both the inductive and the syllogistic systems are at one,—they draw their conclusions precisely on the same principles. It has been not unfrequently alleged, as a striking proof of the superiority of the Baconian to the Aristotelian system, that it is in complete accordance with the mode in which we usually discover truth. We rise from particulars to generals; but if by induction be meant the contrary of the syllogism,—that is, that something is affirmed of a whole, which has been affirmed of all its parts,—then the induction of Bacon is nothing more than what was recognised by Aristotle as induction by enumeration. What is true of every one of the parts separately, is affirmed to be true of the whole collectively. This is nothing more than an actual syllogism; and instead of being identical with the process of induction, which Bacon illustrated and enforced, is termed by him a "puerile employment of the mind." The induction of Bacon proceeds not by enumeration, but by a strict analytic investigation. Certain facts are taken as the basis of our inquiry, and we proceed, "by means of rejections and conclusions," to use Bacon's own words, until we arrive at the general principle or law which explains the effects in question.

The opening sentence of the Novum Organum is sufficiently expressive of the real character of the system which it is intended to unfold: "Man, the servant and interpreter of nature, understands, and reduces to practice, just so much as he has actually experienced of nature's laws; more he can neither know nor achieve." The foundation of all science is here justly declared to be experience,—a possession which belongs to every man, with no difference in kind, but only in degree. The experience of the philosopher is, in quality and in its real nature, the experience of the simple unlettered peasant. In the ordinary intercourse of life there are innumerable facts and phenomena which lie within the range of every man's perception, and therefore constitute what is termed his experience, which is insensibly acquired by each of us as we pass through the world; and according to the value and importance of the facts which form the sum total of our experience, are we regarded as being more or less possessed of that practical sagacity which is of so much consequence in the common business of life. To the philosopher, however, these facts and phenomena, which have passed unnoticed by the common herd of mankind, are matters of serious investigation, through the media of observation and experiment. In the use of these means of inquiry, the man of science acquires a decided superiority to the vulgar. "By habits of scientific attention," says Mr Stewart, "his accuracy as an observer is improved, and a precision is given to his judgment essentially different from the vagueness of ordinary perception. By a combination of his own observations with those made by others, he arrives at many conclusions unknown to those who are prevented, by the ordinary avocations of human life, from indulging the impulse of a speculative curiosity; while the experiments which his ingenuity devises, enable him to place nature in situations in which she never presents herself spontaneously to view, and to extort from her secrets over which she draws a veil to the eyes of others." Thus it is that man becomes, in the true sense of the words as employed by Bacon,—“the interpreter of nature.” He learns to make a due selection of facts, by the careful examination of which, he arrives at a knowledge of the principles on which they may be explained.

And the two grand instruments by which alone we can ascertain the requisite facts, are, observation and experiment. Hence the importance attached to these two modes of inquiry in all physical, and no less so in all intellectual, investigations. So anxious were philosophers, in most instances, before the days of Bacon, to arrive at general principles, that they started towards them from some crude conjectures. This mode of inquiry the illustrious founder of modern science has termed, anticipating nature, “which,” he says, “rash, hasty, and unphilosophical as it is, has, nevertheless, a much greater power than the other to entrap the assent of the mind, which is too apt to be delighted with its own conjectures, and to allow the imagination to be strnck and filled with its own plausible subtilties; whereas interpretations of nature, or real truths arrived at by induction, being separately and more slowly collected, cannot so suddenly arrest the mind; and when the conclusion actually arrives, it may so oppose prejudice, and appear so paradoxical, as to be in danger of not being received, notwithstanding the evidence that supports it, like mysteries of faith.”

This method of anticipation was nothing less than the arrogant attempt to dictate to nature what her operations either were or ought to be; and was, therefore, altogether unfit to be employed by man, who ought rather patiently to sit at the feet of nature, listening to her dictates, and, as humble disciples, learning what she is pleased to reveal. In prosecuting our inquiries upon the inductive system, we are assuming the attitude which so well becomes our feeble, short-sighted reason. We seem only formed to know what is, and we exceed the limits which have been set to our investigations, when we presume to say what ought to be; and hence, on the Baconian principles the progress of science has, since the days of Bacon, been astonishingly rapid. Departments of philosophy which were then unknown have been opened up, and the whole aspect of human knowledge has been changed. The results of the application of inductive philosophy to the various departments of the science of matter, have been sufficient to establish its superior efficacy as a mode of investigation.

BADGER. The Hebrew word, tahash, translated in our Bibles badger, has been very variously rendered by different critics. It is mentioned chiefly in connection with a word signifying skins, when speaking of the coverings of the tabernacle. It occurs, however, alone in Numb. iv. 25; Ezek. xvi. 10; in the latter of which passages it is declared that the shoes of females are made of it. The ancient interpreters, followed by Bochart, instead of applying the word to an animal, understand by it simply a colour given to the leather. This conjecture, however, is without foundation. The Chaldee is the only one of the ancient versions which supposes the badger to be intended; but the Talmudists and the Hebrew interpreters almost unanimously hold it to be an animal whose skin was used as a covering for the tabernacle, and also for shoes or sandals. Gesenius is of the same opinion, and supposes the tahash to be either the seal or the badger. The corresponding word in the Arabic, tuhash or duhash, is translated, a dolphin, and also, a seal. The skins either of badgers or of seals may have been used for covering the tabernacle, and also for shoes. Even at the present day the skins of seals are made into shoes. This latter translation is adopted by Faber, Rosenmüller, Rau, and others, and is perhaps preferable, when we reflect that the badger is not an inhabitant of Arabia or Palestine, and there is little probability that its skin would be used either for a covering of the tabernacle or for the making of shoes.

BAG, a sack, pouch, or purse. The money collected in the treasuries of Eastern princes was reckoned up in certain equal sums, put into bags, and sealed. Some of these bags will contain fifty, or sixty, or a hundred pounds sterling; and persons of distinction, when they travel, generally furnish themselves with a few of these money bags, to defray the expenses of the journey. God is said to seal and sew up men's iniquity in a bag; a striking image, to denote that he remembers every act and circumstance thereof, in order to charge it on them, and punish them for it at a future time. Job xiv. 17. Riches blasted by the curse of God, are styled wages put into a bag with holes; that is, they profit not the owner, but are secretly and unexpectedly consumed. Hag. i. 6. On the contrary, treasures of spiritual good, blessings promised in the heavens to such as liberally expend their property in doing good on Christian principles, are said to be deposited in bags or purses that wax not old. Luke xii. 33. Of course these riches of the soul are permanent, and can neither be tarnished, scattered, nor lost. How few, comparatively, provide, according to the precept of the Saviour, these safe and indestructible depositories for their wealth, beyond the grave!

BAHURIM, a village of Benjamin (2 Sam. iii. 16, xvi. 5, xix. 16); probably built by the young men who escaped the destruction of their tribe. It is thought to have been also named Almon (Josh. xxi. 18), and Alemath. 1 Chron. vi. 60. Phaltiel accompanied his wife Michal, the daughter of Saul, “weeping behind her to Bahurim,” when Ishbosheth took her from him, and sent her to David. 2 Sam. iii. 16. David passed Bahurim in his flight from Absalom; and it was here that Shimei cursed him. It is situated beyond the Mount of Olives.

BAJITH, a town of Moab, mentioned in Isa. xv. 2, where there was a celebrated idolatrous temple, supposed to be the same as Baal-meon. Accordingly, the king of Moab is represented as repairing thither to implore the assistance of his idol against the Assyrians: "He is gone to Bajith and to Dibon, the high places, to weep." Bishop Lowth removes the connecting particle, and joins the two places together, translating the verse thus: "He goeth up to Beth-dibon, to the high places, to weep." The word Beth may signify the house or temple of an idol.

BAKE. In the earliest times the Oriental nations appear to have baked their bread with great simplicity, on a clean part of the hearth, or in a pan of iron. Gen. xviii. 6; Lev. ii. 4-7. Afterwards other inventions were employed. It is said the Arabs are accustomed to make a fire in a large stone pitcher, and when it is sufficiently heated, apply the soft paste or dough to the outside. As it is usually very thin, the heat of the pitcher bakes it almost in an instant. Dried dung is frequently used inside, as fuel; a practice which explains a very singular passage, Ezek. iv. 9-17. Such a custom is still found also in Barbary. Ten women baking the bread of a nation in one oven, imports great scarcity of provisions. Lev. xxvi. 26. The baker sleeping all the night, indicates the singular inattention of the Jewish rulers to the dangers arising from the inflamed state of the public mind, which menaced the destruction of the state. Hos. vii. 6. It is only in large towns in the East that there are bakers by trade. In the villages and rural districts, each family bakes its own bread. Females are chiefly employed in this process. Thus we find Sarah, in Gen. xviii. 6, engaged in baking cakes upon the hearth. These refer, probably, to the unleavened cakes, which are well known in many Eastern countries at this day. Ovens seem to have been unknown in patriarchal times. Moses, however, in his description of the modes in which the different kinds of meat-offering were to be prepared, mentions (Lev. ii. 4-7) a meat-offering baken in the oven, another in the pan, and another in the frying-pan,—evidently referring to the different ways in which the process of baking was conducted. The whole process is thus described in 2 Sam. xiii. 8, 9, where Tamar prepares cakes for her brother, Amnon: "She took flour and kneaded it, and made cakes in his sight, and did bake the cakes. And she took a pan and poured them out before him." When ovens were first used, they were designed to serve only one family, and that to supply bread for only a single day; but as population increased in the cities, public bakehouses were established; and accordingly, we find the Prophet Jeremiah (xxxvii. 21) speaking of the "bakers' street." These public bakchouses are still found in Algiers.

BALAAM, a prophet or diviner, who resided at Pethor on the Euphrates. He appears to have been celebrated for his skill in the art of divination, and to have been much consulted as a soothsayer or magician. The first mention of this individual occurs towards the close of the journey of the Israelites in the wilderness. When they had reached the country of the Moabites, Balak, the king, alarmed at their approach, sought the assistance of Balaam, who, he imagined, by his prayers and imprecations, as well as by his magical incantations, would avert from him the calamity which he dreaded. The soothsayer, accordingly, was bribed by a large sum of money to come to the aid of Balak; yet he dared not to accept the invitation without previously consulting the will of God. A clear and express answer was vouchsafed to him from heaven: "Thou shalt not go with the men, thou shalt not curse the people; for they are blessed." Warned by this prohibition, he refused to accompany the messengers of the King of Moab. A second attempt was made by Balak, by means of larger bribes, to work upon the mercenary dispositions of the soothsayer. For a while he seemed proof against the temptation; but at length he began to waver, because "his heart went out after his covetousness." Accordingly, he requested leave to deliberate, and to consult the Lord again. He obtained the leave which he desired. The Lord permitted him, in anger, to fulfil the desires of his own covetous heart; and glad to obtain the opportunity, he hastened to accompany the princes of Moab to their own land. But he was suddenly arrested by the way. "God's anger was kindled because he went; and the angel of the Lord stood in the way for an adversary against him." By a miracle was Balaam rebuked for his iniquity; "the dumb ass, speaking with man's voice, forbade the madness of the prophet." Yet even this failed to arrest him. He seemed determined to prosecute his journey, till "the Lord opened his eyes; and he saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand." Smitten with appalling dread, he fell to the ground, and exclaimed, "I have sinned; now, therefore, if it displease thee, I will get me back again." Permission was granted him to proceed; but, at the same time, he was warned that a restraint would be laid upon him, and words put into his mouth. With such an allowance he pursued his journey. Both Balaam and his employer, Balak, were disappointed in their schemes. Enchantments were tried in vain. The Lord God again and again declared, by the mouth of the soothsayer, that Israel was blessed, and constrained him to confirm the benediction. At length, Balak's indignation was kindled, and, refusing to grant Balaam the promotion he desired, he ordered him to flee from the place. Thus disappointed in his expectations of preferment, and foiled in his wicked schemes, he sought to ensnare God's chosen people, that by their own sins God might be induced to curse them, as Balak desired. The stratagem was but too successful. The Israelites fell into the snare, and the judgments of the Almighty were poured out upon them. Such was the history of this wicked man; and, as might have been anticipated, "he was driven away in his wickedness;" for when the Midianites, by the Divine command, were put to the sword, the Syrian soothsayer was found in their company, and slain in the general massacre.

It is a question which has given rise to considerable discussion, whether Balaam was a true prophet of the Lord? That he was permitted to prophesy is undoubted, and the Apostle Peter terms him a prophet; but his whole character and conduct was so completely opposed to the Word of God, that it is probable he was nothing more than a Chaldean magician, who, by the permission of God, occasionally received the gift of prophecy.

BALADAN, the Belesis and Nabonassar of profane historians, was the founder of the Babylonian empire. (See ASSYRIA.) The era of this monarch, which is well known as the era of Nabonassar, is famous in astronomy, having been generally followed by Hipparchus and Ptolemy. The epoch from which it is reckoned is precisely determined by numerous celestial phenomena recorded by Ptolemy, and corresponds to Wednesday at mid-day, the 26th of February, of the year 747 B.C.

BALAK, son of Zippor, king of Moab. He waged war against the Israelites, and, as was customary in the East, employed a Chaldean diviner to curse his enemies. (See BALAAM.) But vain are the purposes of man when opposed to the counsels of Jehovah. God, by the mouth of the unwilling prophet, blessed his people. Finding that he was defeated in this scheme, he strove, at the instigation of Balaam, to lead the Israelites into sin. This he effected by means of the women of Midian, and thus brought upon that country, to which he was bound by alliance, the severe judgments of the Lord.

BALANCE, a machine for ascertaining the weight of substances. In Job and the Pentateuch, the Hebrew word employed to denote a balance (moznaim), is a word of plural, or, as pointed by the Masorites, of dual import. It is very probable, therefore, that the common balance is referred to, the dual form having reference to the two scales. If this conjecture be correct, the common balance must have been in use in the time of Job, who lived little more than two centuries after the deluge. There is another Hebrew word, however, of a singular termination (pheles), which does not occur until the time of Solomon, and which probably denotes, not the common balance, but the steelyard, as Gesenius defines it. The two Hebrew words, the one dual and the other singular, are both found together in Prov. xvi. 11, and also in Isa. xl. 12. Perhaps, therefore, as is conjectured by the author of the article, "Weighing Machines," in the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' both words may be regarded as synonymous terms for the common balance; the one descriptive of it by reference to its beam, or balance-rod; and the other, by reference to its pair of scales. There is another word, different from both these words now mentioned, which Isaiah uses, when describing the construction of idol-images among the Babylonians. He says (xli. 6), "They weigh silver in the balance,"—using the word kaneh to denote the kind of balance meant, and which may have been the graduated steelyard. In this one passage the word kaneh indicates a balance; in all other passages it implies a measuring rod or line. We find in Dan. v. 27 the declaration concerning Belshazzar: "Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting." The allusion in this passage may possibly be to some opinion prevalent among the Babylonians, allied to that which the Egyptians entertained, that the actions of the dead were solemnly weighed in balances before Osiris, and that their final destiny depended upon the preponderance of good or evil. The same idea occurs in the Koran. Or, perhaps, there may be a reference to a custom which Sir Thomas Roe mentions in his 'Embassy to the Great Mogul,' and which is thus explained by Professor Paxton:—"On his birth-day, in obedience to an ancient custom, he is weighed in a balance, in the presence of his principal nobility. The ceremony is performed in a spacious apartment of his palace, into which none are admitted but by special permission. The scales in which the emperor was weighed, when Sir Thomas Roe resided at his court, were plated with gold; and the beam on which they hung by great chains was made of the same precious metal. The emperor, sitting in one of these scales, was weighed first against silver coin, which was immediately afterwards distributed among the poor; then he was weighed against gold; after that, against jewels. By his weight (of which his physicians keep an exact yearly account), they presume to give an opinion relative to the present healthful state of his body; of which, whatever be their real sentiments, they always speak in flattering terms. This ceremony of weighing the emperor of Hindostan, is performed twice every year,—in the solar and the lunar anniversary of his birth; and, according as he is lighter or heavier than before, the physician appointed to attend him judges him to be in a prosperous or declining state. Hence the doom of Belshazzar, written upon the wall, admits of a literal interpretation; it alludes to a custom which the Hindus, when they emigrated from Persia, the land of their fathers, carried with them, and transmitted through a long succession of ages, down to modern times."

BALDNESS, a natural effect of old age, when the hair of the head falls off, and leaves the head naked. In Oriental countries, where baldness is sometimes the effect of leprosy, it became necessary to provide, as was done in the law of Moses, that where no other symptom than baldness presented itself, the individual was not to be suspected of being a leper. We find the following incident related in connection with the baldness of the prophet Elisha, "And he went up from thence unto Beth-el: and as he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city, and mocked him, and said unto him, Go up, thou bald head; go up, thou bald head. And he turned back, and looked on them, and cursed them in the name of the Lord: and there came forth two she bears out of the wood, and tare forty and two children of them." 2 Kings ii. 23, 24. Artificial baldness was resorted to in the East as a sign of mourning. It is threatened, instead of well-set hair, to the daughters of Israel. Various instances of it occur in the Old Testament. Thus, Isa. xv. 2; Jer. xlvii. 5; Ezek. vii. 18; Amos viii. 10. Baldness in the hind part of the head is regarded as ignominious by the Orientals, while baldness in front is not. Roberts tells us, that it is quite common in the East to hear the term Bald-head used as a mark of reproach.

BALL, well-known as being used in various sports or games, even from the earliest times. The only occasion on which any direct allusion to it is to be found in Scripture, is in Isa. xxii. 18, where it is said, "He will surely violently turn and toss thee like a ball into a large country;" from which passage it is obvious that the ball must have been used in somewhat the same manner as in modern games.

BALM, mentioned in Gen. xxxvii. 25, xliii. 11; Jer. viii. 22, xlv. 11, li. 8; Ezek. xxvii. 17. The word balm, or balsam, is used as a common name for those resinous substances which either naturally exude, or are artificially obtained by incision from certain trees or plants, and are often used in medicine. It is mentioned as an article of commerce in very early times. In Gen. xxxvii. 25, we find the Ishmaelites bringing it from Gilcad. The balm of Gilead has been famed for its peculiar costliness, and its medicinal qualities. Josephus says, that the tree which yields this precious balsam is found in the neighbourhood of Jericho, but that it was originally brought by the Queen of Sheba to King Solomon, from Arabia Felix, the country which now principally supplies the valuable drug known as the balsam of Mecca, or balm of Gilcad. The balsam tree, called in Arabic, Abu-schâm—that is, "father of scents," or sweet-scented—is an evergreen; grows to the height of about fourteen feet, and from eight to ten diameter; the trunk having a smooth bark, with spreading crooked branches; small bright green leaves, growing in threes; and small white flowers on separate footstalks; the petals are four in number; the fruit is a small egg-shaped berry, containing a smooth nut. There were three kinds of balsam extracted from this tree, the most valuable and esteemed of which was the opobalsamum. The trees of the opobalsamum have a resemblance to fir trees; but they are lower and are planted and husbanded after the manner of vines. On a set season of the year they sweat balsam. The darkness of the place is, besides, as wonderful as the fruitfulness of it; for although the sun shines nowhere hotter in the world, there is naturally a moderate and perpetual gloominess of the air. According to Mr Buckingham, this description is most accurate. "Both the heat and the gloominess," he says, "were observed by us, though darkness would be an improper term to apply to this gloom."

BAMAH, an eminence, or high place, where the Jews worshipped their idols. Ezek. xx. 29. The word is translated in all other passages, a "high place," and is generally used to indicate those heights on which the heathen, and too often the Hebrews in imitation of the heathen, practised idolatrous rites.

BAMOTH, a station of the Israelites. Num. xxi. 19, 20. Eusebius says, Bamoth is a city of Moab, on the river Arnon.

BAMOTH-BAAI (the high places of Baal, or, the heights sacred to Baal) was a city east of the river Jordan, given to Reuben. Josh. xiii. 17. Eusebius says it was situated on the plains of the Arnon. Gesenius considers this place as identical with Bamoth, being simply a fuller expansion of the name.

BAND, a connecting ligature, a cord or chain. Hence also, a company of men; because bound and linked together, as it were, for the accomplishment of an object. A band of Roman soldiers consisted of about a thousand. Acts xxi. 31, xxvii. 1. Government and laws are bands that restrain from sin, and draw into the path of righteousness. Psal. ii. 3; Jer. v. 5. Slavery, distress, fears, and perplexity, are called bands; because they restrain liberty, and create irritation. Lev. xxvi. 13; Ezek. xxxiv. 27; Psal. cvii. 14. Sinful customs, or meretricious allurements, are bands; they enslave, weaken, degrade, and embitter the soul; they are fetters that at first may seem soft as silk, but are found at last to be stronger than iron. Isa. lviii. 6; Eccles. vii. 26. The wicked often "have no bands in their death;" that is, they frequently die without any peculiar distress, fear, or perplexity, such as might be expected to stamp their real character and condition on the verge of their future woe. Psal. lxxiii. 4; Eccles. vii. 15, ix. 2. Faith and love are bands, which unite and fasten every believer to Christ, and to the whole body of his holy people. Col. ii. 19. The authority, arguments, instances, and influence of Divine love, because they draw and engage us to follow the Lord in a way suited to our rational nature, are generally supposed to be intended in Hos. xi. 4, by "the bands of a man;" but as this idea of constraining love is distinctly expressed in the clause preceding, I am more inclined to understand the bands of a man here to signify the strong feelings of necessity. The prodigal son was drawn to his father by these natural bands, as well as by the cords of love. Luke xv. 14-20.

BANISHMENT, exile, judicial exclusion from one's kindred and country, or from the presence of the king. Ezra vii. 26. God's banished ones (2 Sam. xiv. 14) may mean either his children under his corrections, or his chosen in their outcast and unconverted state. Banishment was not a punishment enjoined by the law of Moses; but after the captivity, it seems, along with the forfeiture of goods, to have been introduced among the Jews. This punishment existed also among the Romans. Thus we find the Apostle John banished to the Isle of Patmos, where he wrote the Apocalypse.

BANK, a treasury for exchanging, receiving, or giving out money on interest; mentioned only in Luke xix. 23. Though there were no regular institutions like our banks in ancient times, the original word, which strictly signifies a "table," is properly rendered a "bank" in this passage, because we have nothing else which comes so near the idea to be expressed. We read elsewhere, of the "tables of the money-changers." These men dealt in exchanging different kinds of coin, and in borrowing and lending money.

BANNER, an ensign or standard, used by armies and caravans on their journeys in Eastern countries. An army was not considered to be in full martial equipment, unless its banners were unfurled. To receive a banner from the conqueror in war was accounted a solemn pledge of protection. Accordingly, we find the Psalmist declaring that God had given his people a banner to be displayed, because of the truth, implying probably a pledge of the Divine protection, while engaged in defending the truth against its numerous and powerful assailants. In the 60th Psalm, David celebrates a victory which he had gained over the Syrians and Edomites, declaring "Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee," thus assuring them of the favour and defence of Jehovah. Hengstenberg considers that the Psalmist is here comparing the salvation which the Lord bestows upon his people to a highly exalted banner, which serves as a signal to a man lying low in misery to rise up, with perhaps an allusion to Numb. xxi. 8:—"And the Lord said to Moses, Make thee a serpent, and set it upon a standard-pole; and it happened that every one who was bitten and looked at it lived." Roberts tells us that in India, "in all religious, as well as warlike processions, the people carry banners. Hence, on the pinnacles of their sacred cars, on the domes or gateways of their temples, and on the roof of a new house may be seen the banner of the caste, or sect, floating in the air. Siva the Supreme is also described as having a banner in the celestial world."

BANQUET. The following description of banquets in the Oriental countries is extracted from Professor Paxton's 'Illustrations of Scripture':—"The hospitality of the present day in the East exactly resembles that of the remotest antiquity. The parable of the 'great supper' is in those countries literally realized. And such was the hospitality of ancient Greece and Rome. When a person provided an entertainment for his friends or neighbours, he sent round a number of servants to invite the guests; these were called vocatores by the Romans, and kletores by the Greeks. The first ceremony, after the guests arrived at the house of entertainment, was the salutation performed by the master of the house, or one appointed in his place. Among the Greeks, this was sometimes done by embracing with arms around; but the most common salutation was by the conjunction of their right hands,—the right hand being reckoned a pledge of fidelity and friendship. Sometimes they kissed the lips, hands, knees, or feet, as the person deserved more or less respect. The Jews welcomed a stranger to their house in the same way; for our Lord complains to Simon, that he had given him no kiss,—had welcomed him to his table with none of the accustomed tokens of respect. The custom of reclining was introduced from the nations of the East, and particularly from Persia, where it seems to have been adopted at a very remote period. The Old Testament Scriptures allude to both customs; but they furnish undeniable proofs of the antiquity of sitting. The tables were constructed of three different parts or separate tables, making but one in the whole. One was placed at the upper end crosswise, and the two others joined to its ends, one on each side, so as to leave an open space between, by which the attendants could readily wait at all the three. Round these tables were placed beds or couches, one to each table; each of these beds was called clinium; and three of these being united to surround the three tables, made the triclinium. At the end of each clinium was a footstool, for the convenience of mounting up to it. These beds were formed of mattresses, and supported on frames of wood, often highly ornamented; the mattresses were covered with cloth or tapestry, according to the quality of the entertainer. At the splendid feast which Ahasuerus made for the nobles of his kingdom, beds of silver and gold were placed round the tables. According to a custom in the East of naming a thing from its principal ornament, these must have been couches profusely ornamented with the precious metals. Each guest inclined the superior part of his body upon his left arm, the lower part being stretched out at length, or a little bent; his head was raised up, and his back sometimes supported with pillows. In conversation, those who spoke raised themselves almost upright, supported by cushions. When they ate, they raised themselves on their elbow, and made use of the right hand, which is the reason our Lord mentions the hand of Judas in the singular number: "He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me." Matt. xxvi. 23. See ACCUBATION.

"When a Persian comes into an assembly, and has saluted the house, he then measures with his eye the place to which his degree of rank entitles him; he straightway wedges himself into the line of guests, without offering any apology for the general disturbance which he produces. It often happens that persons take a higher seat than that to which they are entitled. The Persian scribes are remarkable for their arrogance in this respect, in which they seem to bear a striking resemblance to the Jews of the same profession in the days of our Lord. The master of the entertainment has, however, the privilege of placing any one as high in the rank of the assembly as he may choose; and Mr Morier saw an instance of it at a public entertainment to which he was invited. When the assembly was nearly full, the Governor of Kashan, a man of humble mien, although of considerable rank, came in and seated himself at the lowest place, and the master of the house, after numerous expressions of welcome, pointed with his hand to an upper seat in the assembly, to which he desired him to move; which he accordingly did. These circumstances afford a beautiful and striking illustration of the parable which our Lord uttered, when he saw how those that were invited chose the highest places.

"Before the Greeks went to an entertainment, they washed and anointed themselves, for it was thought very indecent to appear on such an occasion defiled with sweat and dust; but they who came off a journey were washed and clothed with suitable apparel, in the house of the entertainer, before they were admitted to the feast. When Telemachus and Pisistratus arrived at the palace of Menelaus, in the course of their wanderings, they were immediately supplied with water to wash, and with oil to anoint themselves, before they took their seats by the side of the king. The oil used on such occasions, in the palaces of nobles and princes, was perfumed with roses, and other odoriferous herbs. They also washed their hands before they sat down to meat. To these customary marks of respect, to which a traveller, or one who had no house of his own, was entitled, our Lord alludes in his defence of Mary: "And he turned to the woman, and said unto Simon, Seest thou this woman? I entered into thine house, thou gavest me no water for my feet: but she hath washed my feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. Thou gavest me no kiss: but this woman, since the time I came in hath not ceased to kiss my feet. My head with oil thou didst not anoint: but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment." Luke vii. 44-46. Homer mentions it as a custom quite common in those days, for daughters to wash and afterwards to anoint the feet of their parents. Our Saviour was in the circumstances of a traveller,—he had no home to wash and anoint himself in, before he went to Simon's house; and, therefore, had a right to complain that his entertainer had failed in the respect that was due to him as a stranger, at a distance from the usual place of his residence. The Jews regularly washed their hands and their feet before dinner; they considered this ceremony as essential, which discovers the reason of their astonishment, when they observed the disciples of Christ sit down at table without having observed this ceremony. "Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread." Matt. xv. 2. After meals they wash them again: "for," says the evangelist, "the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands oft, eat not, holding the tradition of the elders." Mark vii. 3. When they washed their hands themselves, they plunged them into the water up to the wrists; but when others performed this office for them, it was done by pouring it upon their hands. The same custom prevailed in Greece; for Homer says, the attendants poured water on the hands of their chiefs. This was a part of the service which Elisha performed for his master, Elijah; but in no instance where such partial washings are mentioned, is either the Hebrew, taval, or the Greek, baptizo, employed.

"To wash the feet was a mean and servile office; and, therefore, generally performed by the female servants of the family. It was occasionally performed, however, by females of the highest rank; for the daughter of Cleobulus, one of the Grecian sages, and king of Lindus, a city on the south-east part of Rhodes, was not ashamed to wash the feet of her father's guests. And it was customary for them to kiss the feet of those to whom they thought a more than common respect was due; for the daughter of Philocleon, in Aristophanes, washed her father, anointed his feet, and, stooping down, kissed them. The towel which was used to wipe the feet after washing, was considered through all the East as a badge of servitude. Suetonius mentions it as a sure mark of the intolerable pride of Caligula, the Roman emperor, that, when at supper, he suffered senators of the highest rank sometimes to stand by his couch, sometimes at his feet, girt with a towel. Hence it appears that this honour was a token of humiliation, which was not, however, absolutely degrading and inconsistent with all regard to rank. Yet our blessed Redeemer did not refuse to give his disciples, and Judas Iscariot himself, that proof of his love and humility.

"The entertainment was conducted by a symposiarch, or governor of the feast. He was, says Plutarch, one chosen among the guests, the most pleasant and diverting in the company, that would not get drunk, and yet would drink freely; he was to rule over the rest, to forbid any disorder, but to encourage their mirth. He observed the temper of the guests, and how the wine worked upon them,—how every one could bear his wine, and to endeavour, accordingly, to keep them all in harmony, and in an even composure, that there might be no disquiet nor disturbance. To do this effectually, he first proclaimed liberty to every one to drink what he thought proper, and then observing who among them was most ready to be disordered, mixed more water with his wine, to keep him equally sober with the rest of the company; so that this officer took care that none should be forced to drink, and that none, though left to their own choice, should get intoxicated. Such, we have reason to believe, was the governor of the feast at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, which our Lord honoured with his presence. The term architriclinos literally signifies the governor of a place furnished with three beds; and he acted as one having authority; for he tasted the wine before he distributed it to the company, which, it is universally admitted, was one of the duties of a symposiarch. Neither the name nor the act accords with the character and situation of a guest; he must, therefore, have been the symposiarch, or governor of the feast. The existence of such an officer among the Jews is placed beyond a doubt, by a passage in the apocryphal Book of Ecclesiasticus (xxxii. 1), where his office is thus described: "If thou be made the master of a feast, lift not thyself up, but be among them as one of the rest; take diligent care of them, and so sit down. And when thou hast done all thine office, take thy place, that thou mayest be merry with them, and receive a crown for the well-ordering of the feast."

BAPTISM (from the Greek, baptisma, or baptizo), a word whose usage in the Sacred Writings has given rise to a vast amount of disputation.

In accordance with the plan of our work, we shall present to our readers, in succession, the views taken of this subject by the two great denominations into which the Christian world is divided,—Pædobaptists and Baptists,—those who are favourable, and those who are opposed, to Infant Baptism. The reader is thus fully supplied with the chief arguments on both sides in this great controversy. These have been taken from American divines.

I.—VIEWS OF THE PÆDOBAPTISTS.

The word Baptism is derived from the Greek, baptisma and baptizo, and more remotely from bapto, and properly signifies a washing, whether the substance washed be partially or wholly immersed in the liquid, or the liquid be applied to the substance, by running, pouring, rubbing, dropping, or sprinkling. There were "divers washings" or baptisms enjoined under the former dispensation (Heb. ix. 10), some of which were performed by bathing, but more by sprinkling or affusion. The apostle, having mentioned these "divers baptisms," speaks expressly, in the following verses, of divers sprinklings; which shows satisfactorily that they were included.

Proselyte Baptism.—We have sufficient evidence that baptism, as an initiatory rite, was practised in connection with circumcision, on the admission of proselytes to the Jewish Church, long before the coming of Christ. As this fact is disputed, it will be necessary to exhibit some of the evidence on which it rests.

1. The baptism of proselytes appears altogether natural and probable, considering the genius of the Mosaic institutions, and the views which the Israelites were accustomed to entertain of the Gentile nations. Nothing was more common among this people than lustrations and purifications by washing, or baptism. In these the external part of their religion in no small degree consisted. And as they considered all the Gentiles to be impure, unclean, how natural for them to insist, when any of these came over to their religion, that they should be ceremonially purified by the application of water.

2. That the Jews were familiar with the rite of baptism previous to the coming of Christ, is implied in the question addressed to John by those who were sent to him from Jerusalem: "Why baptizest thou then, if thou be not that Christ, neither Elias, neither that prophet?" John i. 25. The inquiry was not, "What new rite is this?" but, "Why do you administer it?" The Jews had long been accustomed to the rite of baptism; but if John was "not the Christ, neither Elias, neither that prophet," they understood not by what authority, or for what reason, he had taken it upon him to baptize.

3. The Jewish Rabbins, ancient and modern, bear testimony to the custom of baptizing proselytes. This practice is mentioned and enjoined in both the Talmuds. It is thus spoken of by Maimonides, a learned Jew, who flourished in the twelfth century: "In all ages, when a Gentile is willing to enter into the covenant of Israel, and place himself under the wings of the Divine Majesty, and take upon him the yoke of the law, he must be circumcised and baptized, and bring a sacrifice; or if it be a woman, be baptized, and bring a sacrifice."

4. Other writers besides Jews, ancient and modern, who have paid most attention to the subject, and been in the most favourable circumstances to form an opinion, have been generally agreed in maintaining that the Jews baptized their proselytes. Thus Arian, a heathen philosopher at Rome, A.D. 140, reproaches those who turned proselytes to the Jews, calling them the baptized ones. And Cyprian, a Christian father of the third century, says, "The case of the Jews, who were to be baptized by the apostles, was different from that of the Gentiles; for the Jews had already, and a long time ago, the baptism of the law and of Moses, and were now to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ." Other writers, who speak expressly of this practice among the Jews, are Leo Modena, in his Jewish History, Lightfoot, Reiskius, Selden, Michaelis, Ainsworth, Ernesti, Wetstein, Hammond, Witsius, Prideaux, Stackhouse, Wall, Jahn, Priestly, Rosenmüller, Kuinöel, Doddridge, &c.

5. The existence of such a rite as baptism among the Jews, can hardly be accounted for, unless it be traced to a period anterior to the commencement of the Christian era. We know that they baptized their proselytes in the second century, and have continued to do so ever since. But how was this rite introduced among them? Was it copied from the Christians? Is it likely that at so early a period, or at any period, the Jews, the most inveterate enemies of Christ, should copy one of his sacraments, and incorporate it among the institutions of their venerated lawgiver? To those who have any knowledge of Jewish prejudices, the supposition must appear incredible. It follows, therefore, that the Jews must have received the custom of baptizing proselytes, as they profess, from the patriarchs of their nation, and that it was in common use at the coming of the Saviour.

John's Baptism.—The first mention of baptism in the New Testament relates to its administration by the forerunner of Christ: "In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea," &c. Matt. iii. 1-6.

It has been made a question, respecting the baptism of John, whether it was the same as the ordinance instituted by Christ (Matt. xxviii. 19), and observed in the Church in all periods since? We are decidedly of opinion that it was not the same, but merely an introductory rite, designed to prepare the way for the gospel dispensation; and in this we agree, not only with the ancient Church,* but with the most respectable writers, Baptist and Pædobaptist, of the present day. The following are some of the reasons urged by the Rev. Robert Hall (a Baptist) and others, to show that the baptism of John was a preparatory rite, and not to be regarded as a Christian ordinance:—

1. This baptism took place under the Jewish dispensation. The Jewish dispensation continued in force till the death of Christ. Then the veil of the temple was rent in twain. Then the great Sacrifice for sin was offered, and the typical sacrifices ceased. It was then that Christ "blotted out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nauling it to his cross." Col. ii. 14. Our Saviour lived under the old dispensation, and was a strict observer of the institutions of Moses; and all that was done in the Church previous to his death belonged properly to that dispensation. This certainly is strong presumptive evidence that the baptism of John was not a Christian ordinance.

2. Christian baptism originated in the express command of CHRIST: "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." No such origin can be claimed for the baptism of John, who baptized for some time before he knew Christ. John i. 31. He ascribes his commission to the Father. John i. 33.

3. The baptism of John was evidently a preparatory ordinance. He came to "prepare the way of the Lord." He preached to the people that the Messiah was coming, and exhorted them to prepare to receive him; and in order that they might be prepared, called them to repentance and baptism.

4. One part of the design of John's baptism, as stated by himself, shows it to have been entirely distinct from Christian baptism: "That he (Christ) should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water." John i. 31. It was an important part of the object of John's ministry and baptism to point out the Messiah to the Jewish people, bear public testimony in his behalf, and induct him, by the washing of water, into the ministry. It hardly need be said, that there is nothing in Christian baptism which resembles this. "A Christian ordinance," to use the words of Robert Hall, "not founded on the authority of Christ, not the effect but the means of his manifestation, and first executed by one who knew him not, is an incomprehensible mystery."

5. The baptism of John, unlike Christian baptism, was not administered in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. This we know, because some whom John baptized had "not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." Acts xix. 2. Indeed, John did not baptize in the name of Christ, or in any other name; but merely directed those who came to his baptism to "believe on him which should come after him." Acts xix. 4.

6. Some of those who received John's baptism were afterwards baptized by the apostles. This was the case with certain disciples whom Paul found at Ephesus (Acts xix. 5), and in all probability with many others.

For these reasons we think it demonstrable that John's baptism was not Christian baptism, but rather an introductory rite, intended to prepare the way for the coming of the Messiah and his kingdom.

Mode of Baptism.—The Protestant world has long been agitated with an unhappy controversy respecting the mode of Christian baptism; one part affirming, and the other denying, that a total immersion in water is essential to the ordinance. After long study and reflection, we are decidedly with those who take the negative on this question. Our reasons for this opinion we propose briefly to exhibit.

The question at issue between Baptists and Pædobaptists relative to this matter, it should be remembered, is not this, Whether immersion is valid baptism?—we admit that it is, and are willing that those in our congregations who prefer to be baptized in this way should be gratified. Nor is the question this, Whether immersions have not been frequently practised in the Christian Church? for we admit that they have been,—they have been practised much more frequently at some periods, than it can be proved that they were in the days of the apostles. But the question at issue is simply this, Is immersion essential to the ordinance? Our Baptist brethren contend with one voice that it is. They tell us that the idea of immersion enters into the very "nature of baptism,—that the terms baptism and immersion are equivalent and interchangeable." "The meaning of the word (baptize) is always the same, and it always signifies to dip. It never has any other meaning." All Baptists hold that there can be no baptism without immersion,—that this is essential to the ordinance. Now this we deny; and in justification of the denial offer the following reasons:—

1. The rite of immersion is not calculated for universal practice. The health of ministers is often such as to render it unsafe for them to go into the water; and the health of those desiring baptism is more frequently such as to render it unsafe for them to receive the ordinance in this way. In some parts of the earth, and particularly at some seasons of the year, it must be very inconvenient, if not impracticable, to administer baptism by immersion. Now, is it likely that our blessed Lord, who intended that his religion should be universal, would append to it, and make

* Origen says, "Christ himself was baptized by John, not with that baptism which is in Christ, but with that which is in the law." (Com. in Rom. vi.) Chrysostom says, "It (the baptism of John) was, as it were, a bridge, which, from the baptism of the Jews, made a way to that of the Saviour. It was superior to the first, but inferior to the second."—Homil. xxiv.

essential, a rite which is so ill fitted for universal practice?

2. The signification of water baptism shows the propriety of some other mode of administration besides immersion. Water baptism is a symbol, an emblem of spiritual baptism. It shadows forth, by an expressive sign, the cleansing, purifying operations of the Holy Spirit. Hence the mode of water baptism might be expected to correspond to the manner in which the Divine Spirit is represented as descending upon the heart. But this is uniformly by pouring or sprinkling. "I will pour out my Spirit upon you." "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean." This pouring out and sprinkling of the Holy Ghost is in Scripture called the baptism of the Holy Ghost, of which water baptism is the instituted sign. It seems evident, therefore, that pouring or sprinkling must be a proper, if not the most proper, mode of water baptism.

3. That the original words used to denote the ordinance of baptism may be used to signify immersion is conceded; but certainly they are not confined to this particular sense. This is evident,

(1.) From their etymology. They are derived from the Greek,—bapto, a word which, it is now admitted, does not always signify immerse. Mr Carson, a late Baptist writer, proves that this word signifies to dye, as well as to dip, and to dye or colour IN ANY MANNER. It is the word used in the Septuagint, where the body of Nebuchadnezzar is said to have been "wet with the dew of heaven." Dan. v. 21. Certainly his body was not immersed in the dew.

(2.) The translators of our New Testament, whenever they have translated the words denoting baptism, have uniformly given to them the general sense of washing. See Heb. ix. 10; Luke xi. 38; Mark vii.

4. And in most instances where they have transcribed (not translated) the original words, they have connected them with particles, which show that they intended to use them in the same general sense. This is true in all those cases in which persons are said to be baptized with water, or with the Spirit. No English scholar would say, immersed with water.

(3.) The most respectable lexicographers, ancient and modern, concur in giving to the words in question a wider signification than that of simple immersion. In proof of this, we may refer to Stephanus, Scapula, Passor, Suidas, Hedericus, Coulon, Parkhurst, Ainsworth, Schleusner, and Wahl. Indeed, Mr Carson, after announcing his position, that baptizo "always signifies to dip," admits that he has "all the lexicographers against him."

(4.) To the judgment of lexicographers may be added that of the most learned and respectable commentators and theologians. Piscator, Zanchius, Alstedius, Mastricht, Pareus, Wickliffe, Leigh, Lightfoot, Calvin, Beza, Witsius, Hammond, Wall, Poole, and many others, speak of the mode of baptism as a thing not essential. It may be immersion, or it may be something else.

(5.) But that which is most decisive in regard to the meaning of the words denoting baptism, is their use. They are certainly used by authors, sacred and profane, in other senses besides that of immersion. They are so used in the apocryphal books of the Old Testament, and so translated by our English translators. See Ecclus. xxxiv. 25; Judith xii. 7. They are so used by the early Christian fathers. Origen represents the wood on the altar, over which water was poured at the command of Elijah (1 Kings xviii. 33), as having been baptized. Cyprian, Jerome, and some other of the fathers, understood the prediction, "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean" (Ezek. xxxvi. 25), as having reference to water baptism. The baptism of tears and blood was a favourite phraseology with the early Christians.

The words denoting baptism are used in the New Testament where they cannot signify immersion. The congregation of Israel "were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea." 1 Cor. x. 2. Yet we know that they were not baptized by an immersion in the waters; for they "went into the midst of the sea upon dry ground." Exod. xiv. 22. The Jews were accustomed to baptize not only their cups and pots, but their brazen vessels and their tables. Mark vii. 4. But it is not at all likely that they washed their large vessels and tables by immersing them in water.

4. The circumstances attending most of the baptisms recorded in the New Testament indicate some other mode besides immersion. Let any impartial reader contemplate the baptism of the three thousand on the day of Pentecost, after the greater part of the day had been spent; or the baptism of Paul, in the peculiar situation in which he was placed; or the baptism of Cornelius and his family, when the apostle said, "Can any man forbid water?"—i.e., that it should be brought; or the baptism of the jailer and his household by one of his prisoners, in the midst of an agitated and affrighted city, and at the dead hour of night; and in whatever mode he may think these different persons were baptized, he will find it difficult to satisfy himself that they could have been immersed.

5. Immersion was never considered as essential to baptism till subsequent to the Reformation in the sixteenth century. We say essential; for this, it will be recollected, is the point in dispute. That immersions were frequent in the ancient Church (at some periods more frequent than they now are among the Pædobaptists, or than they were in the days of the apostles), we see no reason to doubt; but at times when immersions most generally prevailed, the sick were always baptized in some other mode; and such baptisms were considered as perfectly valid. A question was proposed to Cyprian, about the middle of the third century,—“Whether they are to be esteemed right Christians who have been only sprinkled with water, and not washed, or dipped?” to which this learned father replied, that "the sprinkling of water is of equal validity with the laver." Cave says, that the primitive Christians "did not hold sprinkling to be unlawful, especially in cases of necessity, or where conveniency of immersing could not be had." Calvin tells us that, "the substance of baptism being retained, the Church, from the beginning, enjoyed a liberty of using somewhat different rites." Dr Wall, who had a partiality for immersion, says, "On extraordinary occasions, baptism by affusion of water on the face was by the ancients counted sufficient baptism. Of this there are many proofs."

The author of 'Letters to Bishop Hoadley,' a learned and professed Baptist, admits that "for thirteen hundred years successively after the apostles, sprinkling was permitted upon extraordinary occasions." Mr Robinson, also a learned Baptist, admits that "before the Reformation, sprinkling was held valid in cases of necessity." The doctrine, then, that there can be no valid baptism without immersion is a novelty. It was not held by the primitive Church.

Subjects of Christian Baptism.—There is a difference of opinion between Baptists and Pædobaptists respecting not only the mode, but the subjects of Christian baptism; the latter affirming, and the former denying, that the children of believing, covenanting parents should be baptized. In support of the duty of baptizing such children, the following reasons may be urged:—

1. This duty is reasonable in itself, and in accordance with our best affections. In the children of those we love, we all naturally feel a peculiar interest. A good prince would wish, and would provide, that the children of his beloved and faithful friends should be placed in a near relation to himself. And shall it be supposed that the Prince of Life will not regard, with tokens of peculiar favour, the children of his covenant people?

2. The analogy of God's covenant dealings in past ages is in favour of the doctrine of infant baptism. In all the covenants which God has hitherto made with men, children have been connected with their parents. Thus it was in the covenants with Adam, with Noah, with Abraham, and with David. God dealt favourably with the children of Lot for their father's sake; and he declares himself to be a God keeping covenant with those that love him "to a thousand generations." How unlikely, then, that in the covenant of the Christian Church, God has swerved from the invariable economy of his covenant dealings, and sundered the connection between believing parents and their children!

3. Had children been deprived of their interest in the covenant under the gospel dispensation, believing Jewish parents in the primitive Church would undoubtedly have complained. In the days of the apostles, many thousands of the Jews believed, who were "all zealous of the law." They were tenacious even of their former burdens; and would they cheerfully relinquish their accustomed privileges? Yet we hear not a word of complaint on the subject. There was no objection to the gospel, by friend or foe, on this ground. It is morally certain, therefore, that, in respect to covenant relations and privileges, "their children were as aforetime."—Jer. xxx. 20.

4. It is a conclusive argument in favour of infant baptism, that baptism is now substituted in place of circumcision. In support of this proposition, it may be observed,

(1.) That the visible Church has been substantially the same under both dispensations. It has held essentially the same doctrines, enjoyed the same spiritual promises, and professed the same religion,—the religion of the Bible. The religion of the Old Testament is not distinct from that of the New, like the religion of Brahma, or Mohammed. In all essential particulars it is the same, and has been professed by the Church in all ages.

The Church, under both dispensations, is represented as the same in various passages of Scripture. The ancient predictions of the ingathering of the Gentiles, and of the future prosperity and glory of the Church, were made, not to a new Church to be established under the gospel, but to the Zion of the Old Testament,—the Church at that time existing in Israel. See Isa. lx., and xlix. 20, 21. Our Saviour predicted that many should "come from the east, and west, and sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the" same "kingdom of heaven," the same visible Church from which the "children of the kingdom," the Jews, should "be cast out;" and that the same "kingdom of God," in which the Jews had been unfaithful, should "be taken from them, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Matt. viii. 11, 12., xxi. 43. In perfect accordance with these predictions, Paul represents the Gentile believers as grafted into the same olive tree from which the Jews, for their unbelief, were broken off, and into which the converted Jews shall be grafted again. Rom. xi. 17. In view of these representations, nothing is more certain than that the visible Church, under both dispensations, has been substantially the same body. But baptism is now what circumcision was formerly, an instituted prerequisite to a regular standing in the visible Church. Consequently, baptism is substituted in place of circumcision.

(2.) The covenant of the Church under both dispensations has been essentially the same. This is evident from the identity of the Church. The Church is constituted by its covenant; so that if the former is unchanged, the latter must be. The covenant of the Church under the former dispensation was the covenant with Abraham. Consequently this, in its full and spiritual import, must be regarded as the covenant of the Church now. The covenant with Abraham has never been abolished. It is spoken of in the Old Testament as "everlasting;" and in the New as to exist "for ever." Gen. xvii. 7; Luke i. 55. It is represented by Paul as a covenant of "promise," and as "confirmed of God in Christ;" and we are assured that "the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul" it, and render it of no effect. Gal. iii. 17. Believers under the gospel are spoken of as children of the covenant with Abraham. Acts iii. 25. It is on account of their interest in this covenant that they are denominated "Abraham's seed" (Gal. iii. 29), and that Abraham is so often represented as "the father of all them that believe." "He received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised, that he might be the father of all them that believe." Rom. iv. 11. It is evident from Scriptures such as these, that the covenant of the Church, like the Church itself, has been essentially the same under both dispensations; and that this covenant is the covenant with Abraham. But of this covenant baptism is now, what circumcision was formerly, the visible token. Hence, baptism has come in place of circumcision.

(3.) Baptism and circumcision are of precisely the same import. Circumcision was both a sign and a seal. As a sign, it represented the circumcision of the heart, or regeneration. "Circumcision is of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter." Rom. ii. 29. As a seal, it confirmed "the righteousness of faith," or the covenant of grace. Rom. iv. 2. Baptism, too, is both a sign and a seal. As a sign, it is an emblem of "the washing of regeneration," or the baptism of the Holy Ghost. As a seal, it assures those who receive it, and whose characters are conformed to its sacred import, that their faith is imputed to them for righteousness. It thus appears that when the ancient token of the covenant was abolished, an ordinance was established in the same Church, and appended to the same covenant, of precisely similar import. How is it possible, then, to resist the conclusion, that the latter is substituted for the former?

(4.) The Scriptures countenance the idea, that baptism is substituted in place of circumcision. "Beware," says the apostle, "of the concision," or those persons who lay an exorbitant stress on the rite of circumcision; "for we," we who have been baptized,

"are the circumcision which worship God in the spirit." Phil. iii. 2, 3. Again, to the Colossians he says, "Ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ, buried with him in baptism." Col. ii. 11, 12. In other words, Ye are circumcised, having been baptized. It is admitted that the circumcision and baptism here spoken of are both spiritual. But if the two ordinances are spiritually the same, and the one was instituted in the Church on the removal of the other, is not this the substitution of the one for the other?

(5.) The primitive Christian fathers considered baptism as having come in the place of circumcision. Our limits forbid us to cite particular passages. Whoever will take the trouble to consult 'Wall's History of Infant Baptism' will find that many of the early fathers, as Justin, Cyprian, Basil, Ambrose, Augustine, and Chrysostom, speak expressly on this point. They considered baptism as the Christian circumcision, and as standing thus in place of circumcision.

But if this is true, and if such was the understanding of the Church in times nearest the apostles, then the question about baptizing infants is at an end. There certainly was a command to circumcise infants; and if baptism is substituted in place of circumcision, the same command is valid in favour of their baptism.

5. The Jewish proselyte baptism furnishes a conclusive argument for the baptism of children. At the time of our Saviour's appearance, and long previous, the Jews had been accustomed not only to circumcise their proselytes, but to baptize them. And they were accustomed to baptize children with their parents. In proof of this, see 'Wall's Introduction to the History of Infant Baptism.' But when our Saviour gave the command, "Go ye and teach, or proselyte, the nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," must not his disciples have understood him to intend that kind of baptism to which both he and they had been accustomed, viz., the baptism of children with their parents? How could they have understood him in any other way? Under these circumstances, instead of needing an express command to authorise the baptism of children, the disciples needed an express prohibition to prevent their doing it. But no such prohibition was given.

6. Christ and his apostles taught and practised just as we might expect, on the supposition that they intended that children should be baptized; and just as we should not expect on the contrary supposition. In order to determine what we might or might not expect of Christ and his apostles, it will be necessary to keep in mind the established customs of the period in which they lived. In the Jewish Church, children had always been connected with their parents. They early received the token of the everlasting covenant. Also, the children of proselytes were connected in covenant with their parents, and entitled to the initial rites of circumcision and baptism. And now, what might be expected of Christ and his apostles, on the supposition that they intended to put an end to this state of things? Not silence, surely. Silence would be a virtual approbation of it. On this supposition, they would have lost no opportunity of insisting that the ancient covenant connection between children and parents was abolished, and must no more be recognised in the rites of the Church. But did they pursue such a course? Never, in a single instance.

What, then, might be expected of Christ and his apostles, on the supposition that they intended that the established covenant connection of children with their parents should be continued? Not, indeed, that they should enjoin it by express precepts; for this would be to enjoin expressly what every one already understood and practised. But they would be likely often to allude to this connection with approbation, and to drop expressions which implied it. They would be likely, also, as occasions occurred, to baptize households, when those at the head of them made profession of their faith. And this, it hardly need be said, is the course which our Saviour and the apostles actually pursued. Christ applauded the practice of bringing infants to receive his blessing, and declared that "of such is the kingdom of God." Luke xviii. 16. He spoke of little children being received in his name, or as belonging to him. Mark ix. 37, 41. Peter taught believing parents that the promise was to them and to their children. Acts ii. 39. Paul affirms that "the blessing of Abraham," an important part of which consisted in the covenant connection of his children, has "come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ;" and he denominates the children of believing parents holy. Gal. iii. 14; 1 Cor. vii. 14. He repeatedly baptized households on the profession of parents, or of those who had the charge of them. Lydia believed, and she and her household were baptized. The jailer believed, and he and all his were baptized straightway. Paul also baptized the household of Stephanas. 1 Cor. i. 16.

7. The testimony of history is conclusive in favour of the practice of infant baptism. It has been observed already, that the Christian fathers considered baptism as having come in the place of circumcision. Justin, who wrote only about forty years after the death of John, says, "We have not received this carnal circumcision, but the spiritual circumcision; and we have received it by baptism." Is it not manifest from this passage what must have been the opinion of Justin in regard to the important question before us?

Irenæus, who wrote a few years later than Justin, says, "Christ came to save all persons who by him are baptized unto God,—infants, and little ones, and children, and youths, and elder persons." The only objection to this testimony is, that Irenæus here expresses baptism by a word which literally denotes regeneration, putting, by a common figure, the thing signified for the sign. That he really intended to express baptism by this word is so evident from his use of it in other instances, and from the general usage of the fathers, that Dr Wall does not hesitate to speak of the above passage as an "express mention of baptized infants." And Whiston, a learned Baptist, admits the same. "This," says he, "is a thing undeniable by any modest arguer."

Tertullian, who was contemporary with Irenæus, although he advises to delay baptism in the case of infants and unmarried persons, yet speaks most expressly of infant baptism as a prevailing and established practice.

Origen, who was born within eighty-five years of the death of John, and was descended from Christian ancestors, who must have lived in the apostolic age, speaks repeatedly and expressly of infant baptism, and declares that the practice had come down from the apostles.

Subsequent to this period infant baptism is mentioned often, and in the most positive terms, by all the principal Christian fathers, as Cyprian, Optatus, Basil, Gregory, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Jerome, and Augustine. It is recognised in the acts of councils, as well as the writings of individuals. It is represented as resting on apostolic example and authority. Indeed, the right of infants to baptism was denied by no one in the primitive Church, except those who rejected water baptism altogether. Pelagius, in his controversy with Augustine, had strong inducements to deny it,—so strong that he was reported by some to have done so; but he repels the charge as an injurious slander. “Men slander me,” says he, “as if I denied the sacrament of baptism to infants.” “I never heard of any, not even the most impious heretic, who denied baptism to infants.”

Dr Wall, who has so thoroughly investigated the history of infant baptism as to leave little to be done by those who come after him, assures us that the first body of men, of which he can find any account, who denied baptism to infants, were the Petrobrusians, a sect of the Albigenses, in the former part of the twelfth century. And Milner says that, “a few instances excepted, the existence of Anti-Pædobaptism seems scarcely to have taken place in the Church of Christ till a little after the beginning of the Reformation.”

Such, then, is the history of infant baptism; and the argument from this source, in favour of the Divine origin and authority of the practice, is deemed conclusive. If infant baptism does not rest on the ground of apostolic example, how can it be accounted for that it should have been introduced so early into the Church, and prevailed so universally, and that, too, without a whisper of dissension, or a note of alarm? We have catalogues extant of all the different sects of professing Christians in the four first centuries,—the very period when infant baptism must have been introduced, if it were not of Divine origin,—in which the differences of opinion which obtained in those times respecting baptism are particularly recounted and minutely designated; yet there is no mention of any, except those who denied water baptism altogether, who did not consider infant baptism as a Divine institution. Is it not certain, then, that infant baptism is a Divine institution,—that it is not an innovation, but was sanctioned by the apostles themselves? On this ground, and this only, “all sacred and profane history, relating to the subject, appears plain and consistent, from Abraham to Christ, and from Christ to this day.”

II.—VIEWS OF THE BAPTISTS.

We will now proceed to state the opinions of the Baptists, and the arguments by which they maintain them.

Preliminary Observations.—Baptism is the name of a Christian rite, which the Saviour has commanded all his followers to observe. His commission to the apostles, and to all succeeding ministers, requires them to “go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned.” Mark xvi. 15, 16. In the corresponding passage (Matt. xxviii. 19) the same command is expressed in somewhat different terms: “Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.”

This command of the Saviour is confirmed and illustrated by his own example (Matt. iii. 13–17; Mark

i. 9–11; Luke iii. 21, 22) and by the uniform practice of the apostles, both under his own immediate direction (John iv. 1, 2) and after his resurrection. Acts ii. 38–41, viii. 12, 36–38, ix. 18, &c. The rite has been observed, in some form, through all the succeeding ages by nearly all professed Christians.

The Baptists, in common with the greater portion of their brethren, believe that the ordinance of baptism is positively binding on every Christian who has the opportunity to observe it. They believe it to be essential to salvation, in the same sense that obedience to any other command of the Saviour is necessary to salvation. They believe that neither baptism nor any other ceremony is of any avail in preparing men for heaven, without regeneration by the power of the Holy Ghost; but they believe that he who should deliberately refuse to be baptized, or to perform any other duty, so far as he understood that duty, and had the opportunity to perform it, would thus furnish evidence that he had not been born again, and consequently, was unprepared for heaven. “He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me. He that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings.” John xiv. 21, 24.

The Baptists believe, moreover, that baptism is a specific rite, having, as to its essence, one unvarying character; and that, as there is but “one Lord,” and “one faith,” so there is, in the same literal, numeral sense, but “one baptism.” Eph. iv. 5.

Baptism is a positive institution, and the obligation to practise it arises wholly from the authority of the Saviour. His command is the origin and the rule of our duty respecting baptism; we must obey the precept exactly as it was meant to be observed; we have no right to deviate in the slightest degree from the prescribed rule, just as the Jews could not, without guilt, deviate from a strict compliance with the ceremonies of their law; and consequently, if we can ascertain what the Lord Jesus meant by baptism, that, and that only, we must practise, without hesitation or change.

One additional observation remains. As the Saviour's will is our only rule in baptism, and as that will is revealed in the Bible alone, we must resort to the Bible to ascertain what is baptism, and who are the proper subjects. The Baptists adhere stedfastly to the great Protestant principle, that the Bible is the sole and sufficient rule in religious concerns. They, accordingly, appeal to the Scriptures, and insist that if any practice, claiming to be a positive Christian rite, is not clearly sanctioned by the Bible, it must be rejected, whatever arguments may be produced in its favour from supposed analogies, or from the practice of some portions of the Christian world.

After these preliminary remarks, we proceed to state, that, in the opinion of the Baptists, baptism is the immersion in water of a suitable candidate, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. The only suitable candidate is a person who has been born of the Spirit, and who is united to Christ by faith.

The arguments by which the Baptists maintain these positions must be presented in a very compendious manner, without extended critical remarks, or a full citation of authorities.

The Nature of Baptism.—1. The first argument which proves that baptism is immersion only, is drawn from the meaning of the word employed in the Scriptures to designate the rite. It must be supposed that a proper word was used—one which exactly defines the nature of the ordinance. If, then, the meaning of that word can be ascertained, all doubt ought to be removed.

The word is baptizo, which has been merely transferred to our language, by changing the Greek for Roman letters, and altering the termination.

What, then, is the meaning of the Greek word? It is natural to refer, in the first place, to the lexicons; but these all give, as the primary meaning of the word, to dip, to plunge, to immerse. Professor Stuart, in his learned article in the Biblical Repository for April 1833, admits, respecting the Greek words bapto and baptizo, that they both "mean to dip, plunge, or immerse into any thing liquid. All lexicographers and critics of any note are agreed in this."

The next resort is to the classical Greek writers, to ascertain how they use the word. Professor Stuart has quoted passages from Homer, Pindar, Aristotle, Aristophanes, Herodotus, Heraclides Ponticus, Aratus, Xenophon, Phtarch, Lucian, Diodorus Siculus, Plato, Epictetus, Hippocrates, Strabo, Polybius, and Josephus,—all of whom use the words bapto and baptizo to signify immersion.

In the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, and in the Apocrypha, the word baptizo is used to signify, "1. To plunge, immerse, dip in; 2. To overwhelm; 3. To wash, or cleanse, by bathing the person in water."

In the New Testament, the word baptizo and its derivatives are repeatedly used in cases where the ordinance of baptism is not referred to. Mark vii. 3, 4; Luke xi. 38; Mark vii. 4, 8; Heb. ix. 10. All these cases, however, are shown by Professor Ripley to include the original proper meaning, to immerse.

In all this extended range of examination, while numberless examples of the use of the word baptizo to signify immersion are found, Professor Stuart himself has been unable to produce a single instance from the classical Greek writers, from the Septuagint and Apocrypha, or from the New Testament, where the word plainly and undeniably signifies something inconsistent with immersion. Professor Stuart acknowledges himself to be "philologically compelled" to conclude, "that the probability that baptizo implies immersion is very considerable, and, on the whole, a predominant one; but it does not still amount to certainty." There are few points on which "certainty" is attainable; and if, in religious concerns, we refuse to believe and act till this "certainty" is reached, where is the office of faith? Reasonable probability is the highest evidence which can be obtained on most subjects; and if, after ascertaining the almost unanimous concurrence of all Greek writers respecting the meaning of the word baptizo, its meaning is not to be received as settled, it seems impossible to determine the signification of any word whatever.

It would be easy to fill many pages with quotations from the most distinguished Pædobaptist writers, of various countries and ages, who confess that baptism means immersion. Mr Booth, in his learned work, 'Pædobaptism Examined,' has collected more than eighty testimonies of this kind. A single quotation from Calvin is the only one which our limits allow: "The very word baptize signifies to immerse, and it is certain that immersion was the practice of the ancient Church."

2. The figurative use of the word is a second argument. A figure is used for illustration or emphasis, and in either case, its force depends on the literal signification. In this figurative sense baptizo is used in the New Testament to signify overwhelming. Thus in Luke xii. 50: "I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened until it be accomplished!" That is, as Professor Stuart rightly paraphrases it, "I am about to be overwhelmed with sufferings, and I am greatly distressed with the prospect of them." Similar examples are found in Mark x. 38, 39; Matt. iii. 11.

The word is used figuratively to signify burial, in Rom. vi. 3, 4: "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." In Col. ii. 12, the same figure occurs: "Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead." It seems too plain for argument, that baptism is here compared to a burial, in which the believer, being "dead to sin" (Rom. vi. 2), is "buried" in baptism, and from this emblematic grave he rises again to a new and spiritual life. The figure is apt, beautiful, and impressive, if baptism is immersion; but it has no apparent pertinency if anything else is baptism.

3. The places selected for the administration of baptism furnish an argument. The accounts of the baptisms by John would probably convey to the minds of all men who should read the Bible for the first time, without any knowledge of the controversies on this subject, a right idea concerning baptism. We find John baptizing the people "in Jordan." Matt. iii. 5, 6; Mark i. 5, 6. If the idea that the preposition "in" might mean "at" were correct, the fact would still remain, that he repaired, for the purpose of baptizing, to the river Jordan, "the average breadth of which, between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, is from sixty to eighty feet, and its depth about ten or twelve." The reason expressly assigned for selecting a spot at Ænon, near Salim, is, "because there was much water there." John iii. 23. If the words translated "much water" were susceptible of the translation which Beza and others have contended for,—i.e., "many streams or rivulets,"—it would nevertheless be a fact, that the place was chosen for baptism with an express reference to an abundant supply of water; and "many streams or rivulets" would afford accommodations for the act of immersion. But it is highly improbable, in itself, that there were many streams or rivulets in the neighbourhood of the Jordan; and Professor Ripley has shown, with a clearness and force which ought to settle the question, that the phrase translated "much water," is a Hebrew expression, which is repeatedly applied in the Old Testament to the sea, and which, therefore, signifies a great quantity of water. Can there be any reasonable doubt that John selected this spot because it was a convenient place for immersing the candidates? Is it a probable interpretation, that he chose the spot because the multitude needed many streams to supply themselves and their cattle with drink?

The case of the Ethiopian may be cited: "And as they went on their way, they came unto a certain water, and the eunuch said, See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?—And they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch, and he baptized him. And when they were come up out of the water," &c. Acts viii. 36, 38, 39. Whatever ingenious critics may say, is not the impression which this account naturally makes upon the mind of a plain man the true one?—i.e., that the travellers had been conversing on the truths of the gospel, and on the ordinance of baptism; that when they arrived at a body of water, the Ethiopian proposed to be baptized; and that Philip, having led him into the water, immersed him. Do not all the circumstances lead to this conclusion?

Though in many other cases of baptism mentioned in the New Testament, no reference is made to the place where the ceremony was performed, yet nothing is said inconsistent with the idea of immersion. Oriental countries abound with large baths, and other collections of water, where baptism could be, and where, in modern times, it often has been, performed. It is a settled rule of criticism, that a defective or obscure passage must be explained by those which are clear; and as we know that large bodies of water were in some cases selected, we are bound to conclude, that in other cases the practice was similar, though nothing may be said on the subject.

4. The practice of the Christian world, for many centuries, affords important testimony.

On this point there is overwhelming evidence. The best ecclesiastical historians,—Mosheim, Waddington, Neander, &c.,—affirm that the practice of the primitive Churches was immersion. Professor Stuart, after citing the testimony of many ancient writers, says: "But enough. 'It is,' says Augusti, 'a thing made out,' viz., the ancient practice of immersion. So, indeed, all the writers who have thoroughly investigated the subject conclude. I know of no one usage of ancient times which seems to be more clearly and certainly made out. I cannot see how it is possible for any candid man who examines the subject to deny this."

F. Brenner, a Roman Catholic writer, states, "that for thirteen hundred years was baptism generally and ordinarily performed by the immersion of a man under water; and only on extraordinary occasions was sprinkling or affusion permitted. These latter methods of baptism were called in question, and even prohibited."

In the Greek Church, it is well known, the practice of immersion is continued, without variation, till the present day.

In the English Episcopal Church, immersion was practised until the beginning of the seventeenth century. In many old houses of worship large baptisteries now exist, which were once used in baptism. The first Liturgy, in 1547, enjoins a true immersion, in case the child is not sickly. The present Liturgy permits, though it does not require, immersion.

Luther would have introduced immersion into his Church, if he had followed his own opinions. He says, after speaking of baptism as a symbol of death and resurrection, "On this account, I could wish that such as are to be baptized should be completely immersed into water, according to the meaning of the word and the signification of the ordinance; not because I think it necessary, but because it would be beautiful to have a full and perfect sign of so perfect and full a thing; as also, without doubt, it was instituted by Christ."

It may be added here, that the Jews early practised the baptism of proselytes. It is not necessary to enter into the controversy respecting the origin of this practice. It is sufficient for the present purpose to say, that this baptism, as Professor Stuart acknowledges, was performed by immersion. If, then, the Jews borrowed the practice from the Christians, or if the Saviour adopted a ceremony already known, it is, in either case, a strong proof that Christian baptism is immersion.

Other arguments might be adduced; but the limits of this article forbid us to proceed. Those which have been mentioned are, however, sufficient. If "all lexicographers and critics of any note" confess that baptizo means to immerse; if the usage, in the classics, in the Septuagint and Apocrypha, and in the New Testament, on other topics than baptism, clearly, and in numberless passages, refers to immersion, while not one passage undeniably means something else; if the figurative meaning of the word clearly includes the idea of overwhelming and burying; if the places selected for baptizing, in repeated instances mentioned in the New Testament, were large bodies of water; if it is "a thing made out," that the ancient Churches practised immersion, and if the usage has been continued by all professed Christians till a recent period, and by large bodies of professed Christians till the present day;—the Baptists may well ask, If the real nature of baptism is not ascertained to be immersion, is it possible to ascertain the meaning of any word or ceremony whatever? They think the case perfectly clear, and they believe that all Christians are bound, on the simplest principles of evidence, to come to the same conclusion.

The Subjects of Baptism.—The second point which requires to be considered is of still greater importance,—Who are the proper subjects of baptism?

The Baptists maintain, that true believers in the Lord Jesus Christ are the only proper subjects of baptism. Their reasons for this opinion are numerous. A few of them we will now state:—

1. The first argument is drawn from the commission which the Saviour gave to his ministers. As our authority to baptize is derived from the Saviour alone, we must be governed by his will in determining who are to be admitted to the sacred rite. It is his prerogative to decide this point; and we are bound to follow implicitly his directions. What, then, is the commission?—"Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be damned." Mark xvi. 15, 16. Here the qualifications of the persons to be baptized are clearly defined. They are first to be taught the truths of the gospel, and then those who believe are to be baptized. The language is plain,—the condition is exactly specified,—the relation between faith and baptism is unalterably established. What right have the ministers of Christ to depart from the plain letter of his commission, and admit to baptism those who do not and cannot believe?

2. Another argument is drawn from the instances of baptism in the Scriptures. John the Baptist required repentance and faith in the coming Messiah as qualifications for baptism. Matt. iii. 5-12; Luke iii. 3-9; Acts xix. 4. On the day of Pentecost, after Peter had preached the gospel to the multitude, "they that gladly received his word were baptized." Acts ii. 41. At Samaria, "when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women." Acts viii. 12. To the question of the eunuch, "What doth hinder me to be baptized?" Philip replied, "If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest." Acts viii. 37. Peter said, respecting Cornelius and his friends, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" Acts x. 47. To the question of the Philippian jailer, "What must I do to be saved?" Paul and Silas answered, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." The subsequent verses state, that he and all his household were taught the truths of the gospel, that they all believed, and were all baptized. Acts xvi. 30-34. It is asserted of Lydia, that before she was baptized, "the Lord opened her heart, that she attended unto the things which were spoken of Paul." Acts xvi. 14. At Corinth, "Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord, with all his house; and many of the Corinthians, hearing, believed, and were baptized." Acts xviii. 8. Such was the practical construction which the apostles placed on the commission of their Lord. In every case of baptism recorded in the Scriptures, some facts are stated which assert or imply that the persons baptized were believers.

There is, on the other hand, not a single example in the New Testament of the baptism of an infant, nor one word which fairly implies it. "There is no example of baptism recorded in the Scriptures," says Mr T. Boston, a Pædobaptist writer, "where any were baptized but such as appeared to have a saving interest in Christ." The cases of the baptism of households do not form an exception; for it is expressly said of the Philippian jailer and his household, and of Crispus and his house, that they all believed (Acts xvi. 34, xviii. 8); and though the same assertion is not made respecting the households of Lydia and Stephanas, yet other circumstances are stated, which imply that none of the members of those families were infants. Many households are now baptized by Baptist ministers, which contain no infants. While, therefore, there is so much evidence that the apostles baptized none but believers, it is evident, as Neander admits, that "from the examples of the baptism of whole families, we can by no means infer the existence of infant baptism."

In the Epistles, in which numerous questions respecting the discipline of the Churches and the duties of different classes of persons are discussed, there is not a word which implies that infants were regarded as in any sense members of the visible family of Christ, as they would have been if they had been baptized. Children are repeatedly charged to obey their parents, and parents are commanded to train up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; but there is no hint at infant baptism. The passage 1 Cor. vii. 14, "The unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband: else were your children unclean; but now are they holy," has no bearing on the subject. It is plain that a pious wife cannot so "sanctify" an unbelieving husband, as that he can be entitled to baptism without personal faith. Neither can pious parents so make their children "holy," as that they can be entitled to baptism without personal faith. The meaning of the apostle is thus stated by the Rev. John L. Dagg, in a note to Pengilly's Guide to Baptism, as published by the Baptist General Tract Society: "The unbelieving husband is not unclean, so that his wife may not lawfully dwell with him; the unbelieving wife is not unclean, so that her husband may not lawfully dwell with her. If they are unclean, then your children are unclean, and not one parent in the whole Church must dwell with, or touch his children, until God shall convert them." If this interpretation is correct, this verse is a decided proof that infant baptism did not exist in the days of the apostles.

The passage in Matt. xix. 13, 14, and the parallel passages in Mark x. 13, 14; Luke xviii. 15, 16, are sometimes quoted as sanctioning infant baptism: "Then were there brought unto Jesus little children, that he should put his hands on them, and pray: and the disciples rebuked them. But Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven. And he laid his hands on them." This passage has no bearing on infant baptism. It cannot be proved that the children referred to were infants. The same word is used (Mark ix. 36) to designate a child twelve years old. The object for which the children were brought to the Saviour is distinctly stated,—"that he should put his hands on them, and pray," in accordance with a Jewish custom, which attributed high value to the blessing of a person distinguished for age or piety. See Gen. xxvii., and xlviii. 14. We are told what the Saviour actually did,—"he laid his hands on them." There is no allusion to baptism. The expression, "for of such is the kingdom of heaven," manifestly refers to the dispositions of those who shall enter heaven, as in the verse which immediately succeeds in Luke: "Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein."

3. Since, then, the commission and the practice of the apostles both confine baptism to believers, the Baptists require, that those who consider infants as proper subjects of baptism should produce from the Bible some plain precept which commands or permits infant baptism. The Saviour alone can so modify his commission as to admit to baptism persons who do not believe. If he has modified it, the evidence must be produced from the Scriptures. If such evidence cannot be produced, the Baptists argue that we have no more right to baptize persons who do not profess faith in Christ, than we have to neglect baptism altogether.

Can such evidence be furnished? Let us hear the confessions of Pædobaptists themselves. Dr Woods, in his Lectures on Infant Baptism, says: "It is a plain case that there is no express precept respecting infant baptism in our Sacred Writings. The proof, then, that infant baptism is a Divine institution, must be made out in another way." Professor Stuart makes the same acknowledgment in stronger terms: "Commands, or plain and certain examples, in the New Testament, relative to it (infant baptism), I do not find."

Other Pædobaptists have made the same concession. Bishop Burnet says, "There is no express precept or rule given in the New Testament for baptism of infants."

If this is so, the Baptists think the case settled. They cannot believe any institution to be Divine, for which there is in the Bible "no express precept," and of which there are "no plain and certain examples in the New Testament." To "make out the proof in another way," they consider to be unauthorised and dangerous. If a license be given to mere inference, the worst errors of Popery may be sanctioned. The Papist does not pretend to produce an "express precept," or "plain and certain examples," for many of his corrupt and pernicious doctrines and practices; but he can "make out the proof in another way," to his own satisfaction, at least. He does not justify his practice of infant baptism by Scriptural evidence only, but by the authority of the Church ; and he justly accuses the Protestant of inconsistency, who practises infant baptism, and yet pretends to take the Scriptures as his only guide.

Among the other ways by which the practice is defended, the only one which can now be alluded to, and the one on which the greatest stress has been laid, is, that the covenant with Abraham was a spiritual covenant, and that as such it included infants ; that they were accordingly circumcised under the old dispensation ; that baptism is a substitute for circumcision, and that, consequently, infants are to be baptized." The Baptists deny the truth of every part of this argument. They deny that there was any such thing as a Church among the Jews,—that is, a separate body of true saints. The whole nation were considered as one political body, and the rite of circumcision was a national mark of distinction, which all male Jews, whether pious or wicked, were required to possess. Male infants were, accordingly, circumcised, not because their parents were pious, but because they were Jews ; and the Jews were required to circumcise their male servants, whether born in their houses or bought with their money, on precisely the same principle that they circumcised their children, viz., because those servants and children were now members of the Jewish nation. The Baptists deny that there is any proof that baptism is a substitute for circumcision. Not a word is said in the New Testament which justifies such a conclusion ; and to infer such a substitution is a dangerous license, which virtually overthrows the authority of the Bible. Multitudes who had already been circumcised, were baptized by John and by the apostles. Why so, if baptism was merely a substitute for circumcision ? We learn, from Acts xxi., that Paul was censured by many of the believing Jews, because he taught the Jews which were among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying, "that they ought not to circumcise their children." Ver. 21. How natural would it have been for Paul to appease the clamour and conciliate the prejudices of the Jews, by replying that baptism was a substitute for circumcision. Had this been the case, he ought to have taught the doctrine. We may be sure that he would have taught it. But we hear not a word from his lips on the subject.

In the 15th chapter of Acts we are informed that a council was held at Jerusalem by the apostles and elders, to determine the important question, how far the Gentile converts were to be required to conform to Jewish usages. The decision was : "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things ; that ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication." Ver. 28, 29. "Thus," says Dr Baldwin, "by the unanimous voice of a council, comprising most, if not all, the apostles and elders of the whole Christian Church, and by the approbation of the 'Holy Ghost,' we see circumcision put down, and no SUBSTITUTE proposed in its room! In this whole account there is not the most distant hint that baptism was to be practised in the room of circumcision. If these apostles and elders had understood the subject as our Pædobaptist brethren do, is it not perfectly unaccountable that they should not have mentioned it on this perplexing occasion ? To me, I confess, the supposition is too unreasonable to be admitted."

If, however, baptism is a substitute for circumcision, then the Jewish example must be followed out, and male infants only must be baptized ; all male infants must be baptized, and all male servants must be baptized, whatever may be their age or character. If the example is authoritative in one point, why not in all ?

3. Another argument which proves that infant baptism was unknown to the apostles, is, that there is no evidence that it was practised in the Churches for the first two centuries. No clear and undeniable allusion is made to it by any writer earlier than Tertullian ; and there is some doubt whether even he has reference to mere infants.

Venema, in his Ecclesiastical History, says : "Tertullian has nowhere mentioned Pædobaptism among the traditions or customs of the Church that were publicly received and usually observed ; for in his book, De Baptismo [supposed to be written A.D. 204], he dissuades from baptizing infants, and proves the delay of it to a more mature age to be preferred. Nothing is to be affirmed with certainty concerning the custom of the Church before Tertullian, seeing there is not anywhere, in more ancient writers that I know of, undoubted mention of infant baptism."

But it is sufficient to adduce the testimony of one of the most recent and most able ecclesiastical historians,—Neander, late professor of theology at Berlin, and himself a Pædobaptist. After stating that baptism was, in the days of the apostles, performed by immersion, "as best adapted to express that which Christ intended to express by this symbol,—the merging of the whole man into a new spirit and life," he says : "Since baptism was thus immediately connected with a conscious and voluntary accession to the Christian fellowship, and faith and baptism were always united, it is highly probable that baptism took place only in those cases where both could meet together, and that the custom of infant baptism was not practised in this age." "The lateness of the time when the first distinct mention of infant baptism is made, and the long-continued opposition made to it, lead us to infer its non-apostolic origin."

Infant baptism was probably introduced into the Church about the commencement of the third century, in connection with other corruptions, which even then began to prepare the way for Popery. A superstitious idea respecting the necessity of baptism to salvation, led to the baptism of sick persons, and finally to the baptism of infants. Sponsors, holy water, anointing with oil, the sign of the cross, and a multitude of similar ceremonies, equally unauthorised by the Scriptures, were soon introduced. The Church lost her simplicity and purity, her ministers became ambitious, and the darkness gradually deepened into the long and dismal night of Papal despotism.

4. One other argument has great weight with the Baptists. They consider infant baptism as inconsistent with one of the fundamental principles of Christianity, viz., that every man is held responsible for his own conduct, and must be justified by his own individual faith. The piety of the parent cannot save the child, and the piety of the child cannot avail for the salvation of the parent. John the Baptist told the Jews that even their connection with Abraham was an insufficient plea. Matt. iii. 9. The same principle is stated in Ezek. xviii. Repentance and faith are required of every individual, as the indispensable conditions of salvation. But infant baptism is founded on another principle. It supposes that the faith of the parent so far extends its benefit to the child as to entitle him to become a visible member of the family of Christ. The child, then, owes this privilege, not to his own faith, but to that of his parent. Here is a very dangerous doctrine, the true result of which is seen in the Popish indulgences, which are granted on the ground that the merits of one man can be transferred to another.

Neander, in the article already quoted, argues the improbability that Paul taught and practised infant baptism; because it would have seemed to contradict his great principle of justification by faith. This objection has not less importance now; and those who wish to maintain in all its purity the doctrine of justification by faith, and to preserve the Church from the prevalence of Popish errors, ought to renounce every thing which is not authorised by the plain and unperverted Word of God. The Baptists stand on the firm Protestant principle,—the principle of the Reformation,—that the Bible alone is the standard and the guide for all Christians. Since, therefore, the commission of the Saviour requires faith as a qualification for baptism; since the apostles, so far as we can ascertain their practice, baptized none but believers; since Pædobaptists themselves acknowledge that there is no express precept nor plain example in the Scriptures on the subject; since there is strong evidence that infant baptism was unknown in the apostolic age; and since it is inconsistent with the fundamental principle of justification by faith,—the Baptists are constrained to view infant baptism as an unscriptural corruption, and to maintain that true believers are the only proper subjects of baptism.

Having thus briefly presented a few of the reasons for the doctrines maintained by the Baptists, we may add, that they cannot conscientiously regard any persons as baptized who have not been immersed on a profession of their faith. Viewing, as most other Christians view, baptism as a prerequisite to the participation of the Lord's Supper, they cannot consistently consider those whom they are compelled to regard as unbaptized, to be qualified to partake of the Supper. They do not deny nor question the piety of their Pædobaptist brethren; but they must, as honest men, refuse to recognise as baptism what they view as an unauthorised ceremony. They desire the union of all Christians, and they believe that they are labouring the most effectually to promote that union, by endeavouring to uphold in love the pure principles of the Bible. May the God of peace enable all his people to ascertain, and love, and practise the truth, that they may be one indeed.

[Such being the views of the Pædobaptists on the one hand, and the Baptists on the other, we shall now make some remarks on the subject of baptism generally, without reference to the opinions of peculiar sects.]

Design of Baptism.—A due regard to the doctrinal import and design of this New Testament ordinance would probably go further than all the learning and ingenuity which have been employed in managing the controversy on either side, to establish the mind of an inquirer, both as to the proper subjects and mode of administration; for it is plain that the value of signs depends chiefly upon the importance of the things signified; and, as Dr Owen observes, “there is nothing in religion that hath any efficacy for compassing an end, but it hath it from God's appointment of it to that purpose. God may, in his wisdom, appoint and accept of ordinances and duties unto one end, which he will refuse and reject when they are applied to another. To do any thing appointed unto an end, without aiming at that end, is no better than the not doing it at all,—in some cases much worse.” The design of baptism, therefore, as taught in the New Testament, and the practical uses to which it is there applied, ought to be thoroughly investigated by both ministers and people; in order that they may know and comply with the revealed intention of God in its appointment.

“It is generally agreed among divines,” says the learned Venema, “that the communion of a believer with Christ, and the effects of his obedience, by which the guilt, the pollution, and the punishment of sin are taken away, and so the remission of sin, sanctification, and glorification are conferred, are presented to view in baptism; yet they do not sufficiently show the way and manner in which that representation is made, and frequently speak with but little consistency. If, in baptism, the appearance of nothing but washing presented itself to our consideration, the thing would be easy. For, seeing we are delivered from sin by the obedience of Christ, that would be readily understood by every one as the cause of our purification, and as represented by water, in which there is a cleansing virtue; especially as the Scripture usually comprehends it under the emblem of water. But washing is neither the only idea, nor, as I think, the principal one, of this institution.”

The principal and most comprehensive design of this ordinance appears from the Scriptures to be, A SOLEMN, PUBLIC, AND PRACTICAL PROFESSION OF CHRISTIANITY. Thus Paul sums up the baptism of John in Acts xix. 4: “John verily baptized with the baptism of REPENTANCE, saying unto the people, that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on CHRIST JESUS.” And thus he describes his own: “As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, HAVE PUT ON CHRIST.” Gal. iii. 27. To the same purpose are the words of Peter on the day of Pentecost: “Repent, and be baptized every one of you IN THE NAME OF JESUS CHRIST.” Hence also a rejection of baptism is by our Lord called a REJECTION OF THE COUNSEL OF GOD; that is, of Christianity. Luke vii. 30; Acts xx. 27. And the reception of baptism is represented as the act by which we JUSTIFY GOD; that is, practically approve his method of salvation by faith in the Messiah. Luke vii. 29. Hence, whatever may be said of baptism as it is now generally understood and practised, and of the personal religion of those who practise it, it is certain that it was originally appointed to be the boundary of visible Christianity.

But this general design of baptism comprehends many particulars. Christianity consists partly of truths to be believed, partly of precepts to be obeyed, and partly of promises to be hoped for; and this, its initiatory ordinance, is rich in significancy in relation to them all. We are taught to regard it,—1. As THE SOLEMN PROFESSION OF OUR FAITH IN THE TRINITY. John i. 33; Matt. iii. 16, 17, xxviii. 19; Eph. ii. 18; Tit. iii. 4–7. Particularly,—Of our adoption by the Father. Gal. iii. 26–29, iv. 1–7; John i. 12, 13; 2 Cor. vi. 17, 18; 1 John iii. 1–3. Of our union to the Son. Acts viii. 35–39; Rom. vi. 3–14; Col. ii. 12, 13, 20, iii. 1–11; Matt. xx. 22, 23; 1 Pet. iii. 18–22; 1 Cor. i. 30. Of our sanctification by the Spirit. John iii. 5–8, vii. 37–39, xiv. 15–17, 26, 27, xvi. 12–15; Acts ii. 38, 39; Rom. viii. 1–27; 2 Cor. i. 21, 22; Gal. iii. 2, 3

iv. 6, 7, v. 22-25; Eph. i. 11-14, iv. 30, v. 9. 2. AS THE PUBLIC PLEDGE OF THE RENUNCIATION AND REMISSION OF SINS. Mark i. 4, 5; Acts ii. 38, xxii. 16; Rom. vi. 4. 3. AS THE EXPRESSION OF OUR HOPE OF A FUTURE AND GLORIOUS RESURRECTION. Rom. vi. 5; Col. iii. 1-4; 1 Cor. xv. 29. 4. AS A VISIBLE BOND OF UNION AMONG CHRISTIANS. 1 Cor. xii. 3-31; Eph. iv. 5. Baptism, therefore, is designed to give a sort of visible epitome of Christianity.

Perpetuity of the Law of Baptism.—Although Christians have been generally agreed that baptism was delivered to the primitive Churches as an ordinance of universal and perpetual obligation, yet there have been some, and two bodies of Christians in particular, who have on different grounds denied or questioned its perpetuity. (See QUAKERS—ANABAPTISTS.) The first class consider all external forms, in which they include baptism and the Lord's Supper, rather as obstructions than aids to spiritual worship; and hence interpret the apostolic commission, either of baptism with the Holy Ghost, or limit its duration to the close of the Jewish economy, as being rather a part of the baptism of John than of Christ. They quote in favour of these views, Matt. iii. 11; John iii. 30; 1 Cor. xii. 13; Eph. iv. 5; 1 Cor. i. 17. The second class derive their opinion chiefly from the supposition that Christian baptism is a continuation of Jewish proselyte baptism; from which they argue that it ought not to be administered to any but converted Pagans, Mohammedans, and others, who did not previously receive Christianity as the true religion.

Both of these classes of Christians ought to consider,—1. That the apostles themselves understood their commission of baptizing in water; as is clear from their practice, recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. 2. That to baptize with the Holy Ghost, or bring the soul under his Divine influence, is the prerogative of Christ alone. John i. 33, viii. 37-39; Acts i. 4-8, ii. 1-4. 3. That so far from regarding the baptism of the Spirit as superseding the baptism of water, Peter, in the house of Cornelius, urges it as a Divine argument in favour of the propriety of the latter: "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord." Acts x. 47, 48. 4. That this, therefore, is "the one baptism" to which the apostle refers as being a visible bond of union among Christians; the baptism of the Holy Ghost (superior as it is in importance) being so called, not literally, but by a rich and beautiful metaphor, indicating the overwhelming abundance of his holy influences and endowments. "Be ye filled with the Spirit." Eph. v. 18; John vii. 37-39. 5. That the Christian law of baptism could not have been derived from that of Jewish proselytes; because many such proselytes were baptized, as the Ethiopian eunuch, Cornelius, and others,—which proves either that the Christian administrators knew no such custom as proselyte baptism, or that they re-baptized those who had received it. 6. That the apostles in their writings draw from the baptism of their converts the most powerful motives to a life of spiritual holiness. 7. That our Lord himself honoured the ordinance by his own example; and that while it is safe to obey and imitate him, it must be dangerous to set aside or slight even the least of his commandments. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." John xv. 14. "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." John xiv. 21. Lastly, Christians are exhorted to "hold fast the profession of their faith without wavering," and to draw nigh to the throne of grace, "having their hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and their bodies washed with pure water;" which they cannot do unless baptized. Heb. x. 22, 23. Whence it follows that baptism in water, however, and to whomsoever it is to be administered, is a Christian ordinance of perpetual obligation.

Others have stated the argument thus:—We have seen that Christianity and its laws are of perpetual obligation; that baptism is a part of Christianity in its complete form; that the example of Christ in this particular is binding on all his disciples, through all ages; that the perpetuity of baptism is implied in the nature of the ordinance, as an act of worship,—a monument of the Saviour's death, burial, and resurrection,—a symbol of the renunciation of sin, and the new birth to righteousness,—a solemn self-dedication to the Saviour,—a public recognition of our adoption as the children of God, and of our hope of a glorious resurrection; that the promise connected with the institution prophetically declares its perpetuity; that baptism is in-wrought in the law of the institution with some other things which are acknowledged to be of perpetual obligation, as teaching and believing; and that the apostles understood it to be perpetual, and derived from it motives to holiness, which are now powerless upon any other supposition than that the ordinance is still to be regarded. Now, in view of all these things, what shall we say? Can further evidence be necessary? If there be any who still doubt the perpetual obligation of the ordinance, we would respectfully put to them the following questions:—Is there in the law of the institution any thing which appears to limit the obligation of obedience to time, or place, or nation? Is not the language of the commission as exempt as language can be from all such limitations? Was this law ever repealed by the same authority which enacted it? If it were, it can certainly be shown when, and where, and how; and we ask for the evidence. We ask, again, has it (as the seventh-day Sabbath has) been virtually repealed, by being superseded by another ordinance? If so, what is its name? and whence its origin? and where its authority? We ask once more, Do not the same reasons exist for its continuance as did exist for its appointment? Miraculous gifts were a seal to the commission,—they accredited the apostles as messengers of God; but now the proof of the Divine origin of Christianity is complete, and the miraculous powers have ceased. They have ceased, because the same reason for which they were given does not continue. But the same doctrinal and the same practical uses of baptism continue; and why should the ordinance be laid aside? Why should it be regarded by any disciple of the crucified Saviour as antiquated or obsolete? "Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into his death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." Rom. vi. 4, 5.

Baptism in the early Christian Church.—Among the primitive Christians baptism was regarded with the highest reverence. Before their baptism they were scarcely recognised as Christians; but no sooner was the rite administered, than the subject of it was received into the ranks of the faithful, and viewed as invested with all the privileges of Christian society. At first baptism was dispensed in any situation that was convenient and suitable; but afterwards it was usual to administer the ordinance in a font (see BAPTISTERY) belonging to the church. The mode in which this initiatory ceremony was performed in the early Christian Church, is thus graphically described by the Rev. Dr Jamieson, in his valuable work, 'The Manners and Trials of the Primitive Christians':—“The rite of baptism was originally administered in a very simple manner,—the apostles and their contemporaries contenting themselves with an appropriate prayer, and the subsequent application of the element of water. At an early period, however, a variety of ceremonies was introduced, with the pious, though mistaken view, of conveying a deeper and more solemn impression of the ordinance, and affording, by each of them, a sensible representation of the grand truths and spiritual blessings of which it is significant. The baptismal season having arrived, those catechumens who were ripe for baptism, and who were then called competentes, or elect, were brought to the baptistery, at the entrance of which they stopped, and then mounting an elevated platform, where they could be seen and heard by the whole congregation of the faithful, each, with an audible voice, renounced the devil and all his works. The manner in which he did this, was by standing with his face towards the west, and with some bodily gesture, expressive of the greatest abhorrence, declaring his resolution to abandon the service of Satan, and all the sinful works and pleasures of which he is the patron and the author. This renunciation being thrice repeated, the candidate-elect turned towards the east,—the region of natural light, and therefore fit emblem of the Sun of Righteousness,—made three times a solemn promise and engagement to become the servant of Christ, and submit to all his laws. After this he repeated the Creed deliberately, clause by clause, in answer to appropriate questions of the minister, as the profession of his faith. It was deemed an indispensable part of the ceremony, that this confession should be made audibly, and before many witnesses; and in those rare and unfortunate instances where the applicants for baptism possessed not the power of oral communication, this duty was performed through the kind offices of a friend, who, testifying their desire to receive the ordinance, acted as their substitute. In ancient history, an anecdote is told of an African negro slave, who, after having passed satisfactorily through the state of catechumen, and been entered on the lists for baptism, suddenly fell into a violent fever, which deprived him of the faculty of speech. Having recovered his health, but not the use of his tongue, on the approach of the baptismal season, his master bore public testimony to his principles, and the Christian consistency of his conduct; in consequence of which he was baptized, along with the class of catechumens to which he belonged. The profession of faith being ended, and a prayer being offered, that as much of the element of water as should be employed might be sanctified, and that all who were about to be baptized might receive, along with the outward sign, the inward invisible grace, the minister breathed on them, symbolically conveying to them the influences of the Holy Spirit,—an act which, in later times, was followed by anointing them with oil, to indicate that they were ready, like the wrestlers in the ancient games, to fight the fight of faith. The preliminary ceremonies were brought to a close by his tracing on the foreheads of all the sign of the cross,—an observance which, as we formerly remarked, was frequently used on the most common as well as sacred occasions by the primitive Christians,—and to which they attached a purely Christian meaning, that of living by faith on the Son of God. All things being prepared, and the person about to be baptized having stripped off his garments, the minister took each by the hand, and plunged him thrice under the water, pronouncing each time the name of the three persons in the Godhead. The newly baptized having come out of the water, was immediately dressed by some attendants in a pure white garment, which signified, that having put off his old corrupt nature, and his former bad principles and practices, he had become a new man. A very remarkable example of this ceremony occurs in the history of the celebrated Chrysostom. The conspirators who had combined to ruin that great and good man in Constantinople, resolved on striking the first blow on the eve of an annual festival, at the hour when they knew he would be alone in his vestry, preparing for his duty to the candidates for baptism. By mistake, they did not arrive till he had begun the service in the church. Heated with wine, and goaded on by their malignant passions, they burst into the midst of the assembly, most of whom were young persons, in the act of making the usual profession of their faith, and some of whom had already entered the waters of the baptistery. The whole congregation were struck with consternation. The catechumens fled away naked and wounded to the neighbouring woods, fields, or any places that promised them shelter from the massacre that was perpetrating in the city. And next morning, as soon as it had dawned, an immense meadow was seen covered all over with white,—on examining which, it was found to be filled with catechumens who had been baptized the night before, and who were then, according to custom, dressed in their garments, amounting in number to three thousand. Those white garments, after being worn a week, were thrown aside, and deposited in the antechamber of the church, where, with the name of the owner inscribed on each, they were carefully preserved as memorials of baptism, ready to be produced against them in the event of their violating its vows. A memorable instance of this use of them occurs in the history of the primitive age. A Carthaginian, who had long been connected with the Christian Church of his native city, at length apostatised, and joining the ranks of its enemies, became one of the most violent persecutors of all who named the name of Christ. Through the influence of friends, he was elevated to a high civil station, the powers of which he prostituted to the cruel and bloody purpose of persecuting his former friends. Among those who were dragged to his tribunal, was a deacon, once an intimate friend of his own, and who had been present at his baptism. On being put to the rack, he produced the white garments of the apostate, and in words that went to the heart of all the bystanders, solemnly declared that these would testify against his unrighteousness at the last day.

“Immediately after the baptism, the new-made members, in their snow-white dress, took their place among the body of the faithful, each of whom that was near welcomed them as brethren with the kiss of peace; and, as being admitted into the family of God, whose adopted children alone are entitled to address him as ‘Our Father,’ they were permitted, for the first time, publicly to use the Lord’s Prayer and to partake of the communion.

"Besides, at this period, they generally assumed a new name. Many of the names in familiar use among the heathens being borrowed from those of the objects of their worship, the converts to Christianity deemed it becoming, and consistent with their new principles, to change their family name for others that had been borne by some distinguished personage in the history of their faith, or that was significant of some virtue recommended by it. Hence we find many in the primitive ages bearing the name of prophets and apostles, and even of the Christian graces; such as, in Greek, Eusebius, Eustachius, Gregory, Athanasius; and, in Latin, Pius, Fidus, Speratius. An example may be given from the interesting history of the Martyrs of Palestine:—"When the governor," says the historian, "had made trial of their invincible fortitude by tortures in every form, he asked the chief person among them 'who he was,' and heard in answer, not a real or common name, but that of some one of the prophets; for it happened, that those men, having laid aside the name by which, as received by their parents, they were called, as being the appellations of idols, had assumed unto themselves other names; and one might have observed them using the names of Elias or Jeremiah, Samuel or Daniel; and thus showing themselves to be, not in deeds alone, but even in their very appellations, as 'that Jew who is such inwardly,' and as that Israel of God, who is such really and in sincerity."

BAPTISMAL REGENERATION. In a very early period of the history of the Christian Church, the most erroneous views as to the nature and necessity of baptism began to be entertained. From the perverted interpretation of a few figurative expressions of Sacred Scripture, it was supposed by many, that in the very act of administering this ordinance, grace was in all cases conveyed to the heart, and that change of state and character took place which is termed the new birth, or regeneration. Nay, even it was often imagined, that, in receiving baptism, the catechumen received a plenary remission of all past sins. Hence the practice, in many cases, of deferring baptism till the latest period of life. Thus we are informed by Eusebius, that the Emperor Constantine, "finding his end fast approaching, judged it a fit season for purifying himself from his offences, and cleansing his soul from that guilt which, in common with other mortals, he had contracted; which he believed was to be effected by the power of mysterious words and the saving laver." "This," said he, addressing the surrounding bishops, "is the period I have so long hoped and prayed for,—the period of obtaining the salvation of God." And no sooner was he baptized than he arrayed himself in white garments, and laid aside the imperial purple, in token of his bidding adieu to all secular concerns. Even long before the age of Constantine, we find Justin Martyr thus confounding baptism with regeneration: "Whoever," says he, "believe the things which are affirmed by us to be true, and promise to live accordingly, are afterwards conducted by us to a place where there is water, and are regenerated by the same method of regeneration which we have experienced." It were easy to adduce numerous passages from writers of the first three centuries supporting the doctrine of baptismal regeneration,—a doctrine so plainly opposed to reason as well as to Scripture, that we should scarcely have conceived ourselves warranted in occupying our space with the subject, had it not been revived in all its grossness in our own day. In the 'Tracts for the Times,' which have lately issued from Oxford, there is a plain avowal of the doctrine to which we refer, in such passages as these, which we extract from Dr Pusey's Treatise on Baptism:—"Our justification is imputed to us, not through our feelings, but through baptism." Baptism "takes us out of our relation to Adam, and makes us actual members of his Son." "All the baptized have put on Christ." "Whosoever of us has been baptized, was thereby incorporated into Christ." "God has, in a wonderful manner, for his own glory, made baptism effectual, when administered in mockery by heathens, on a heathen stage." Baptism is, no doubt, often mentioned in Scripture in connection with regeneration, as being the divinely appointed sign by which that all-important change is emblematically represented; but nowhere is our salvation made dependent exclusively upon baptism. Thus it is said: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." And in the last commission which our Lord gave to his apostles, he charges them to "go and teach (disciple) all nations, baptizing them." The discipling is here made to precede the baptism, just as in another passage we find the Apostle Peter, on the day of Pentecost, exhorting the multitudes to "repent and be baptized;" implying, that repentance must precede baptism,—the latter being the ceremonial rite by which the former was signified and sealed. The jailer at Philippi first believed, and then was baptized. So it was with Lydia and her household. And in the house of Cornelius, Peter asks, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" They had received the Holy Ghost; and therefore the apostle urges that the visible sign may be administered. No doubt Peter uses the expression which at first sight might seem to indicate that baptism is essential to salvation, when he says, "The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us;" but, lest it should be imagined that the mere outward administration of the rite is alone sufficient for salvation, he immediately adds the explanation, "Not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God." One of the passages which Dr Pusey adduces in support of the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, is: "Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." John iii. 5. Now it is evident that our Lord does not here say that water alone, and without the Spirit, will regenerate; nor does he say that the application of water will secure the operation of the Spirit upon the heart. Another passage adverted to by Dr Pusey, as affording a direct testimony of the necessary connection between baptism and regeneration, is Tit. iii. 5, which he translates as affirming that God saves us "according to his mercy, by the washing of regeneration, and of renewing of the Holy Ghost." Even adopting this rendering of the passage, the apostle is plainly teaching no other doctrine than that we are saved by the regenerating and renewing washing of the Holy Spirit, which, of course, has no immediate reference to outward baptism. And finally, had Paul ranked baptism as high as the Tractarians of the Oxford school are accustomed to rank it, is it likely that he would have used such language as he does in writing to the Corinthians?—"I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius; lest any should say that I had baptized in mine own name. And I baptized also the household of Stephanas : besides, I know not whether I baptized any other. For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel : not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect." 1 Cor. i. 14-17. "Is this," to quote the words of Dr Alexander, in his 'Anglo-Catholicism not Apostolical,' "the language of one who believed that it was by baptism that men were to be united to Christ, and to receive through him the remission of sins? Can we suppose for a moment, that had the apostle really believed that doctrine, he would have refrained from administering baptism,—that is, would have refused to convey to men salvation, lest some evil-minded persons should make a sinister use of his doing so? that he would have thanked God that he had only baptized two persons during his long residence at Corinth? that he would have affirmed that, commissioned as he was to teach men all that Christ had enjoined, he had been sent not to baptize, but to preach the gospel? and that he would have thought so little about the matter as really to be at a loss to remember how many he had baptized in the Church at Corinth? What a contrast is there in this respect between Paul and the clergy of the Anglo-Catholic Church! While they make baptism everything, and the preaching of the gospel next to nothing, he elevates the preaching of the gospel to the first place, and allows to baptism only a very subordinate rank among the means of grace. While they think themselves successful as ministers of Christ in proportion to the number of persons they baptize, he thanks God that, in a large city, and out of a large Church, he had only baptized one or two. And whilst they claim 'religious veneration' from their flock, on the ground of the mysterious virtue they are supposed to convey in baptism, he abstained from administering the rite altogether, except in a few instances, lest he should seem to be seeking honour for himself. Would that all who call themselves Paul's successors had the same high views of the spiritual nature of Christianity, and the power of the preaching of the gospel which dwelt in him!"

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD. The argument of Paul, "If the dead rise not at all, why are they then baptized for the dead?"—(1 Cor. xv. 29)—has excited many different ideas in the minds of interpreters. Bochart has collected no less than fifteen senses in which it has been understood, or rather, in which learned men have confessed that they did not understand it. Yet, doubtless, it was clear and cogent, not only in the view of the apostle, but of the Corinthian Church whom he addressed. The three senses most prominent are,—1. It is an appeal founded on the conduct of those who were converted and baptized in view of the martyrdom of Christians; thus fearlessly filling up the ranks of the dead, from a confidence in their glorious resurrection. This sense is adopted by Doddridge. 2. It is an appeal founded on the figurative sense of the word baptize,—that is, to overwhelm with sufferings; as in Matt. xx. 22, 23. This sense is preferred by Professors Stuart and Robinson. Yet it seems to leave the phrase obscure; for what is the meaning of "overwhelmed in sufferings for the dead?" 3. It is an appeal to the Corinthians, founded on the usual symbolic sense of the ordinance of Christian baptism; as in Rom. vi. 4; Col. ii. 12, where the apostle explains it to signify, not only a death and burial, but also a resurrection from the dead. The meaning of the apostle, then, is this: "If there be no resurrection, why express such a belief in the use of the ordinance of baptism? What shall they do who have made this solemn profession of their faith and hope, if there be no corresponding reality?" This last sense is preferred by the learned Neander.

The opinion adopted by De Dieu and Michaelis, and countenanced by Tertullian and Ambrose, is, that it was the custom then at Corinth for dead persons to be baptized vicariously. And Grotius, who adopts this interpretation, compares this with some other superstitious customs of the early ages, as that of administering the eucharist to the dead, and he thinks that this custom was introduced, of admitting the vicarious baptism of a dead person, in order that prayers might be offered up for his soul. That such was the custom of some of the early heretics, as the Marcionites, we learn from the information of Epiphanius, Chrysostom, and others; but it is very improbable, that the apostle would make any reference to a superstition so foolish and absurd.

BAPTISM OF BLOOD. Tertullian gave this name to martyrdom before baptism, and to the death of martyrs in general. By him, and other fathers after him, it was thought to have a peculiar efficacy to purify from sins; from which mistaken notion it was urgently recommended to believers. But the blood of Christ alone cleanseth us from all sin. 1 John i. 7; Rev. i. 5, vii. 14.

BAPTISM OF FIRE. The words of John, in describing the baptism of Christ, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire" (Matt. iii. 11), have been variously interpreted. Some have referred the words, "with fire," to a purgatory after death; others, to the unquenchable fire of hell, into which the wicked shall be plunged after the final judgment; others, to the descent of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, in the form of fiery tongues. Others still, consider the words, "and with fire," as exegetical, and interpret them of that celestial fervour and zeal which the baptism of the Holy Ghost conferred upon those who received it;—and the structure of the original favours this sense, as do also the facts of the case; though, perhaps, not to the exclusion of the external sign, mentioned in Acts ii. 3.

BAPTISM OF THE HOLY GHOST, that overwhelming abundance of the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, which our Saviour, after his ascension, poured forth upon his disciples. The basis of this beautiful metaphor is found in the literal signification of baptism,—which is, to cover one completely with any kind of element, particularly water. So the apostles and primitive believers are said to have been not only in a degree subjected to the influence of the Holy Spirit, but filled with it, immersed in it, as in a new element of existence, life, perception, feeling, and action. A measure of the same Divine influence they had received before; but this was a far more copious and ample communication of it, to qualify them for their public labours, as well as to elevate their personal character, and to promote their spiritual enjoyment. Nor does this rich donation of spiritual blessings appear to have been restricted to miraculous gifts on the one hand, or to the primitive believers on the other; for it is represented,—1. As the prerogative of Christ's personal dignity. Matt. iii. 11; Mark i. 8; Luke iii. 16; John i. 15-17, 32, 33. 2. As the grand distinction of his glorious reign. John vii. 37-39, xvi. 7. 3. As the special promise of the new covenant. Luke xxiv. 49; Acts i. 4-8, ii. 1-4, 16-21, 33, 38, 39; Heb. viii. 6-12. 4. As the privilege and seal of every believer. Eph. i. 13, 14, iv. 30, v. 18; Gal. iv. 6, v. 16, 25. 5. As the proper object of expectation and prayer. Isa. xxxii. 15-17, xlv. 3-5; Luke xi. 5-13; Phil. i. 19. 6. As comprehending gifts and graces, varied in kind and degree, to supply the necessities of the Church, according to the will and wisdom of the Spirit himself. 1 Cor. xii. 1-13, 31, xiv. 1; Eph. v. 9, iv. 30; Rom. viii. 9, 13, 14, xiv. 17, xv. 13.

From these passages it appears that the baptism of the Holy Ghost is not to be confounded, on the one hand, with regeneration, as it sometimes has been; nor, on the other, restricted to miraculous powers, and, of course, to the primitive age; but is to be sought in the more copious communication of such gifts and graces as are needed, in the present condition of the Christian Church, by ourselves and others. Whatever of superior illumination, sanctity, or fervour,—whatever of heavenly purity of motive, clearness of perception, tenderness of affection, strength of purpose, or energy of character,—whatever of divine peace and consolation, and hope and joy, drawn from the things eternal and unseen, we at any time need,—whatever is necessary to make the gospel effectual to its end among men, is to be sought and expected of God through Christ, the great Dispenser of spiritual blessings. “Of his fulness have all we received, and grace for grace. The same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost.” “Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full.” John i. 16, 33, xvi. 24.

BAPTISTERIES. It would seem that the primitive Christians were under a necessity of baptizing in open waters, or, where they had not private baths of their own, of constructing baptisteries for the express purpose of administering baptism. Authors are not agreed about the time when the first baptisteries were built. All agree that the first were, like the manners and condition of the people, simple, and merely for use; and that in the end, they rose to as high a degree of elegant superstition as enthusiasm could invent.

Baptisteries are to be first sought for where they were first wanted,—in towns and cities; for writers of unquestionable authority assert, that the primitive Christians continued to baptize in rivers, pools, and baths, till about the middle of the third century. Justin Martyr says that they went with the catechumens to a place where there was water; and Tertullian adds, that candidates for baptism made a profession of faith twice, once in the Church,—that is, before the congregation, in the place where they assembled to worship,—and then again when they came to the water; and it was quite indifferent whether it were the sea, or a pool, a lake, a river, or a bath. About the middle of the third century, baptisteries began to be built; but there were none within the churches until the sixth century; and it is remarkable, that though there were many churches in one city, yet (with a few exceptions) there was but one baptistery. This simple circumstance, as Popery advanced, was perverted into a title to dominion; and the congregation nearest the baptistery, or to whom in some places it belonged, and by whom it was lent to the other Churches, pretended that all the others ought to consider themselves dependent on them.

By a baptistery of the fourth century (which must not be confounded with a modern font), is to be understood an octagon building, with a cupola roof, resembling the dome of a cathedral, adjacent to a church, but no part of it. All the middle part of this building was one large hall, capable of containing a great multitude of people. The sides were parted off, and divided into rooms; and in some, rooms were added without-side, in the fashion of cloisters. In the middle of the great hall was an octagon bath, which, strictly speaking, was the baptistery, and from which the whole building received its name. Some had been natural rivulets before the buildings were erected over them, and the pool was contrived to retain water sufficient for dipping, and to discharge the rest. Others were supplied by pipes; and where baptism was performed on naked subjects (as from the fourth to the sixteenth century was the common practice of the Catholic as well as the Greek Churches, a practice founded on certain fanciful notions of the fathers), the water was conveyed into one or more of the side rooms, that the baptism of the women might be performed apart from that of the men. Some of the surrounding rooms were vestries; others, school-rooms, both for the instruction of youth, and for transacting the affairs of the Church. Councils have been held in the great halls of these buildings. It was necessary they should be capacious; for as baptism was now administered only twice a year, the candidates were numerous, and the spectators of each sex more numerous than they. It is an opinion generally received, and very probable, that some of the names given to these buildings were borrowed from the memorable pool of Bethesda. The Syriac and Persic versions call Bethesda a place of baptistery.

The most ancient baptistery is that of St John Lateran. At Rome, there were many; in other Italian cities, only one at first; in the middle ages two,—a Unitarian and Trinitarian; in modern times, only one,—the Trinitarian. Some are yet standing. The memory of others is preserved in records and monumental fragments. The place of others is now supplied by fonts within the churches. At Constantinople, the baptistery of St Sophia was one of the appendages of that splendid church erected by Constantine, and rebuilt by Justinian with unrivalled magnificence. And it is worthy of notice, that the canon laws, the officers, the established rituals, the sermons of the prelates, and the baptism of the archbishops themselves, prove that baptism was here administered, by trine immersion, indeed, but only to instructed persons, whether Pagans or the descendants of Christians. It would be easy, says Mr Robinson, to make similar remarks on the Churches at Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem, and many more; for their baptisteries resembled that of St Sophia, and their baptism was that of believers, by trine immersion.

BAPTISTS, a denomination of Christians deriving their name from the circumstance that their distinguishing tenet has a reference to baptism, holding as they do that adults are the only proper subjects of the ordinance, and that the only proper mode is, not as generally practised, by a sprinkling or affusion of water on the person, but by a total immersion of the party in the water. The whole body may be considered as comprised in—1. The General (Unitarian) Baptists. 2. The General (New Connection) Baptists. 3. The Particular Baptists. 4. The Seventh Day Baptists. 5. The Scotch Baptists.

There is a marked difference in England between the General and the Particular Baptists. THE PARTICULAR BAPTISTS are so denominated, from their embracing the Calvinistic system, which includes in it, as a leading article, the doctrine of particular redemption, though there are many among them who admit the universality of the atonement. The Calvinistic or Particular Baptists are by far the most numerous; their congregations in England and Wales amounting at the last census in 1851 to 1947. They have five public academies for the education of young men for the ministry, at Bristol, Stepney, Bradford, Pontypool, and Haverfordwest, and they have long enjoyed two exhibitions for students, to be educated for four years at one of the universities in Scotland, given them by Dr Ward, of Gresham College. In 1792, they established the important mission to India, which promises so much good to all the nations of the East, and which has been liberally assisted by the contributions of other denominations. Other missions, at home, in Africa, the West Indies, Ireland, and France, are also supported by this body.

THE GENERAL BAPTISTS maintain the doctrine of general redemption, and the other points of the Arminian system; and are agreed with the Particular Baptists only on the subject of baptism, worship, and church discipline. Towards the close of the seventeenth century, the General Baptists seem to have become extensively impregnated with anti-Trinitarian sentiments, so that an actual secession took place from the body, of those who held orthodox views on the subject of the Trinity. This led to the Old and New Connection, the latter having been originated by the Rev. Daniel Taylor in 1770.

THE NEW CONNECTION is a body of General Baptists, which arose chiefly in the midland counties, and which reverted to the doctrinal principles originally espoused by that denomination. These, as they are more orthodox than the others, are also much more zealous, more numerous, and more flourishing. They are quite distinct from the Old General Baptists, and are known by the name of "the New Connection." Their congregations amount to one hundred and eighty-two, and their annual association is held at different places by rotation. In the year 1798, an evangelical academy was opened, and placed under the care of the Rev. Daniel Taylor; but its patronage was very small. In 1843 it was removed to Leicester, where its prospects are encouraging, though the Connection yet experiences the want of able ministers. This society also has established a mission in India.

THE SEVENTH DAY BAPTISTS differ from the other General Baptist Churches simply on the ground that the seventh, not the first day of the week, should be the one still celebrated as the Sabbath. At present they have only two places of worship in England and Wales.

THE SCOTTISH BAPTISTS are of a more recent date, and differ in various respects from the English Baptists. Excepting one which appears to have been formed out of the soldiers of Cromwell's army, no trace can be found of a Baptist Church in Scotland, previous to 1765, when a church was settled at Edinburgh, under the pastoral care of Mr Carmichael and Mr Archibald McLean. Others have since been formed at Dundee, Glasgow, Paisley, Perth, Largo, Dunfermline, and in most of the principal towns of Scotland. There are also fifteen churches in England and Wales holding the principles of the Scottish Baptists, and connected with them, particularly in London, Nottingham, Liverpool, Manchester, Preston, Carlisle, Beverley, &c.

They think that the order of public worship which uniformly obtained in the Apostolic Churches is clearly set forth in Acts ii. 42-47; and therefore they endeavour to follow it out to the utmost of their power. They require a plurality of elders in every Church; administer the Lord's Supper, and make contributions for the poor, every first day of the week. The prayers and exhortations of the brethren form a part of their Church order, under the direction and control of the elders, to whom it exclusively belongs to preside in conducting the worship, to rule in cases of discipline, and to labour in the word and doctrine, in distinction from the brethren exhorting one another. The elders are all laymen, generally chosen from among the brethren; but when circumstances require, are supported by their contributions. They approve also of persons who are properly qualified for it, being appointed by the Church to preach the gospel and baptize, though not vested with any pastoral charge.

For several years after their first setting out, the Baptist Churches in Scotland were all of one faith and order, owned each other as sister Churches, and had fellowship one with another in the institutions of the gospel, as did also the different societies in England that stood connected with them. But of late years, numerous Baptist societies have started up in different parts of Scotland, which, though they retain much of the doctrinal sentiments and of the social practices of the original Churches, yet are unhappily divided on some points of minor importance,—chiefly respecting the administration of the Lord's Supper. These latter have sprung up chiefly out of what, in Scotland, is termed the Tabernacle Connection; that is, from the societies gathered by the ministry and means of Messrs James and Robert Haldane. Setting out upon the principle of Pædobaptism, numbers of them, in process of time, changed their views on the article of baptism, and formed themselves into Churches of that denomination, independent of the parent stock. Hence much confusion has arisen among the Scottish Baptist Churches. This evil has also been greatly heightened in consequence of divisions which have taken place among the original Scotch Baptist Churches themselves, occasioned by a sentiment getting in among them, that the Lord's Supper is not peculiarly a Church ordinance, nor the administration of it a matter which belongs exclusively to the pastoral office; but that, on the contrary, it is the duty of any two or three persons, who may come together to worship God on the first day of the week, to take the Lord's Supper, though none of them be a pastor. The adoption of this principle has occasioned considerable separations from the parent societies, and introduced many divisions and subdivisions among them; an evil which time and further experience, it is hoped, will rectify.

BAR. This word occurs in Scripture chiefly in the following senses:—1. That whereby a door is bolted and made fast. Neh. iii. 3, 6. 2. A narrow cross-board, or rafter, to fasten other boards to. Exod. xxvi. 26-29. 3. A rock in the sea that runs across its bottom. Jonah ii. 6. 4. The bank or shore of the sea, which as a bar shuts up its waves in their own place. Job. xxxviii. 10. 5. Strong fortifications and powerful impediments are called bars, or bars of iron. Amos i. 5; Isa. xlv. 2.

BARABBAS, a notorious robber, guilty also of sedition and murder; yet preferred before Jesus Christ by the Jews. John xviii. 40. Origen says, that in many copies, Barabbas was called JESUS likewise. The Armenian has the same reading: "Whom will ye that I deliver unto you; Jesus Barabbas, or Jesus, who is called Christ?" This gives additional spirit to the history, and well deserves notice.

BARACHEL (blessing, or bowing the knee to God), the father of Elihu. Job xxxii. 2.

BARACHIAS, the father of Zacharias, mentioned Matt. xxiii. 35. Various opinions have been put forth in reference to the Barachias here mentioned. Kuinöel agrees with those who maintain, that as many of the Jews had two names, this individual is the same with Joiada, the high priest, who, because he had reproved the vices of the Jewish people, was, by the command of King Joaz, stoned in the court of the temple. By many he is thought to have been Baruch, father of Zechariah, who is mentioned by Josephus, in his books concerning the Jewish war, as having been killed between the porch and the altar by the zealots, a little before the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans.

BARAK, the son of Abinoam, a native of Kedesh-Naphtali. Deborah, in virtue of the authority with which she was invested as prophetess, sent to Kedesh for Barak, that he might take the command of the Israelitish army in opposition to the army of Jabin, king of the Canaanites, which was headed by Sisera. Barak obeyed the summons, and taking the field along with Deborah, he defeated the hostile army, in commemoration of which he and Deborah composed a hymn of thanksgiving.

BARBARIAN, a term used in the New Testament to denote a stranger, or one who belonged to any other nation but the Greek. Thus (Rom. i. 14):—"I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians, both to the wise and the unwise." Col. iii. 11:—"Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all and in all." Luke calls the inhabitants of Melita Barbarians, because they were originally a Carthaginian colony. The term, as now employed, usually indicates a savage and uncivilized people, and we are liable, though erroneously, to associate the same ideas with the word when we meet with it in the sacred writings. In 1 Cor. xiv. 11, the stranger is said to be known by his speaking an unknown language:—"Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me." Strabo supposes, indeed, that the word itself is an imitation of the harshness of a foreign tongue.

BARBED, having points like hooks or prickles of thorns. Job xli. 7.

BARBER. This word occurs in Ezek. v. 1: "And thou, son of man, take thee a sharp knife, take thee a barber's razor, and cause it to pass upon thine head and upon thy beard: then take thee balances to weigh, and divide the hair." Shaving the head and beard was customary among the Jews, as a token of mourning. The operation of shaving the head was probably performed much in the same way as at present in the East. After the head has been gently rubbed with the hand and moistened with water, the razor is applied from the top downwards.

BAR-CHOCHAB, a famous impostor. It is said, he assumed the name of Bar-chocheba,—that is, Son of the Star, from the words of Balaam, which he applied to himself as the Messiah: "There shall come a STAR (cocab) out of Jacob, and a sceptre out of Israel."

Bar-chochab engaged the Jews to revolt (A.D. 136) under the reign of Adrian, who sent Julius Severus against him. This impostor inflicted the most cruel tortures on the Christians who refused to recognise his character as a prophet, or unite with him against the Romans. Little is known of his previous history. According to report, he had been at one time a robber; and his conduct shows that he must have been a man thoroughly conversant with scenes of blood and rapine; while the devotedness of his followers, and the vigorous, and, for a time, successful resistance he made to the Romans, evince him a man of talent and energy. His followers actually amounted to two hundred thousand men. The Romans shut him up in Bethar, the siege of which was long and obstinate. The town, however, was at length taken, and the war finished. Bar-chochab perished, and the multitude of Jews put to death, or sold during the war, and in consequence of it, was almost innumerable. After this, Adrian published an edict, forbidding the Jews, on pain of death, to visit Jerusalem; and guards were placed at the gates, to prevent their entering.

BARDESANES, one of the ancient heretics. He flourished about the year 160, and was a native of Edessa, in Mesopotamia. According to Eusebius, he was intimately acquainted with the Chaldean philosophy, and is said also to have been well skilled in the Greek and Syrian languages. He wrote against Marcion, and other heretics, but afterwards fell into some of the errors of the Valentinian school. Yet though this was the case, it would be unjust to class his tenets indiscriminately with those of Valentinus. He received the whole of the Old Testament. He believed that God, who was the Father of Jesus Christ, was the Creator of the world; and he even held that the Word of God, or his Son, co-operated in this creation. He held, however, that the body of Jesus was a delusive image which came down from heaven; in which point, and that of the denial of the resurrection of the body, he agreed with Valentinus. It is also stated to have been one of his opinions, that the devil was not created by God. He represented matter as the primitive element of evil, and Satan as a spiritual manifestation of matter. In the same way as the Abyss of Goodness was the father, and produced Intelligence, and thereby a succession of emanations, all manifesting himself under different aspects; so the Abyss of Evil, matter indeterminate, was the mother, and brought forth her son, Satan, and through him a series of analogous emanations. There was thus between the good and the evil creation, considered in their source and their development, a parallelism which reduced this dualistic system to a sort of hostile harmony, the unity of a grand and eternal antinomy. Bardesanes, in so far as he conceived matter as producing its own manifestation, fell in with the Hindu idea of Kapila; according to which, matter engendered the Intelligence, and thereby began to reveal itself. He appears to have lived to retract some of his errors, and to abjure the doctrines of Valentinus. His followers were called Bardesanists.

BAREFOOT. Isaiah the prophet is commanded by God (Isa. xx. 3) to walk naked and barefoot for three years, in token of deep anguish of mind, and as a sign that Jehovah was about to bring all the horrors and privations of a painful captivity upon Egypt and Ethiopia. In the account of David's flight from Jerusalem, in consequence of the rebellion of Absalom, the affecting statement is given by the inspired historian: "And David went up by the ascent of Mount Olivet, and wept as he went up, and had his head covered, and he went barefoot." 2 Sam. xv. 30. Such passages plainly indicate, that to walk barefoot was a common practice in the East, on occasions of deep, heartfelt sadness.

BARGAINS. Among the Hebrews bargains and sales were generally effected, in regard to all articles of importance, at the gate of the city, as being the most public place. There is a singular custom mentioned in Ruth iv. 7, as having been an early mode of transferring alienable property: "A man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbour." The origin of this custom it is impossible to trace; but it had become antiquated in the time of David. Joining, or striking of hands, was the usual mode of bargaining, or concluding a sale. Job speaks of it (xvii. 3), and Solomon often alludes to it. The earliest written instrument, ratifying the transfer or sale of property, occurs in Jer. xxxii. 10-12; which the prophet commanded Baruch to bury in an earthen vessel, in order to be preserved for production at a future period, as evidence of the purchase. Written obligations seem to have been cancelled in different ways; one was by blotting them out, or drawing a line across them; and another, by striking them through with a nail; in both cases the bond was rendered useless, and ceased to be valid. To these customs the apostle alludes, in Col. ii. 14: "Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross."

BAR-JESUS, or, according to some copies, BAR-JEU, was a Jewish magician in the Island of Crete. Acts xiii. 6. This itinerant soothsayer, or goëts, was violently opposed to the progress of the gospel, and accordingly used his utmost endeavours to prejudice the proconsul, Sergius Paulus, against it. But Paul, filled with holy indignation, declared, that God would punish this wicked man with the loss of his eyesight. The threatening was fulfilled, and the proconsul, when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord. Origen and Chrysostom think that Elymas, or Bar-jesus, was converted, and that Paul speedily restored his sight.

BAR-JONA, a name by which our Saviour sometimes calls Peter (Matt. xvi. 17); and which, as some think, is put for Bar-johanna, son of John, or perhaps, son of Jonah, a fisherman of Bethsaida,—of whom, however, we have no account.

BARK,—1. to utter a cry, as a dog; to give an alarm of danger. Ministers that, as dumb dogs, cannot bark, are such as have neither conscience nor courage to reprove men's sins, and publish the alarming truths revealed by God in his Word. Isa. lvi. 10. Also, 2. To peel the bark or rind off a tree. Joel i. 7.

BARLEY (Exod. ix. 31; Lev. xxvii. 16, &c.), a well-known kind of grain, often mentioned in Scripture. It is the plant known to botanists as the Hordeum vulgare, or spring barley. Pliny, on the testimony of Menander, says that barley was the most ancient aliment of mankind. In Palestine, the barley was sown about October, and reaped in the end of March, just after the passover. In Egypt, the barley harvest was later; for when the hail fell there (Exod. ix. 31), a few days before the passover, the flax and barley were bruised and destroyed; for the flax was at its full growth, and the barley began to form its green ears; but the wheat, and more backward grain, were not damaged, because they were only in the blade, and the hail bruised the young shoots which produce the ears. In the Book of Ruth, we have nearly the whole process of the barley harvest minutely described,—the reaping, the gleanings, the winnowing, and even the meting it out in certain fixed measures.

The Rabbins sometimes called barley the food of beasts, because in reality they fed their cattle with it (1 Kings iv. 28), and from Homer and other ancient writers we learn, that barley was given to horses. Solomon, who had "forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots," seems also to have fed them with barley, for it is expressly stated, that the officers "brought barley and straw for the horses." It seems to have been considered a very nourishing diet, even for men, in ancient times; for the gladiators among the Romans were termed Hordearii, because they chiefly fed upon this grain. The Hebrews, however, frequently used barley bread, as we find by several passages of Scripture; for example, David's friends brought to him, in his flight, wheat, barley, flour, &c. 2 Sam. xvii. 28. Solomon sent wheat, barley, oil, and wine, to the labourers King Hiram had furnished him. 2 Chron. ii. 15. Elijah had a present made him of twenty barley loaves, and corn in the husk. 2 Kings iv. 42. And, by miraculously increasing the five barley loaves, Christ fed a multitude of about five thousand. John vi. 8-10. The jealousy-offering, in the Levitical institution, was to be barley meal. Numb. v. 15. The common mincha, or offering, was of fine wheat flour (Lev. ii. 1), but this was of barley, a meaner grain, probably to denote the vile condition of the person in whose behalf it was offered; for which reason, also, there was no oil or frankincense permitted to be offered with it. Sometimes barley is put for a low, contemptible reward or price. So the false prophets are charged with seducing the people for handfuls of barley, and morsels of bread. Ezek. xiii. 19. Hosea bought his emblematic bride for fifteen pieces of silver, and a homer and a half of barley. Hos. iii. 2. Barley was one of the principal grains which was paid as tithe to the priests and Levites. Minute directions are given in the Book of Leviticus for this purpose, and also in the Book of Numbers. It would appear that barley was much more common in Judea than any other grain, and that it was only half the value of flour. In 2 Kings vii. 1, Elisha says: "To-morrow about this time shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria." This, as nearly as can be estimated, is at the rate of one peck of barley for one shilling and threepence sterling. The peck of fine flour, however, was two shillings and sixpence.

BARN. It has always been customary for the Oriental husbandmen to deposit their grain for safety in subterraneous magazines. Sometimes these magazines are found in the midst of a ploughed field, or in the highway. "These grottos," says Professor Paxton, "are dug in the form of an oven, gradually enlarging towards the bottom, with one round opening at top, covered over with earth, so as to remain perfectly concealed from the enemy." The same practice still prevails among the Arabs, as well as in other Eastern countries.

BARNABAS, a disciple of Jesus Christ, and companion of Paul in his labours. He was a Levite, born in the Isle of Cyprus. His proper name was Joses, to which the apostles added Barnabas, signifying, the son of consolation. Barnabas is generally supposed to have been one of the seventy disciples. He studied along with Paul at the feet of Gamaliel, and accompanied him in several of his journeyings, as recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. Some have asserted that, after he separated from Paul, he went into Italy, and afterwards founded a church at Milan. It is generally believed that he suffered martyrdom at Salamis, where some Jews having come out of Syria, set upon him as he was disputing in the synagogue, and stoned him to death. He was buried by his kinsman, Mark, whom he had taken along with him, in a cave near that city.

Barnabas, according to Jerome, wrote an epistle which was held in great esteem by the early church, as a production breathing a spirit of primitive piety throughout, and is still extant. It is frequently cited by Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. Having been written by a Jew, who is arguing chiefly with Jews, there are many more quotations from the Old Testament than from the New. Eusebius and Jerome reckon it among the apocryphal or uncanonical writings; but neither of them deny that it belongs to Barnabas. It can scarcely be credited, however, that he was the author of a work so full of forced allegories, extravagant and unwarrantable explanations of Scripture, together with stories concerning beasts, and such like conceits, as make up the first part of this epistle. It is uncertain to whom this epistle was addressed, because we have not the superscription; but it seems to have been written to the converted Jews, who were too zealously addicted to the observance of the law of Moses. It is divided into two parts. In the first, he shows the unprofitableness of the old law, and the necessity of the incarnation and death of Jesus Christ. He cites, and explains allegorically, several passages relating to the ceremonies and precepts of the law of Moses, applying them to Jesus Christ and his law. The second part is a moral instruction, handled under the notion of two ways,—the one of light,—the other of darkness; the one under the conduct of the angels of God,—the other under the guidance of the angels of Satan. The way of light is a summary of what a Christian is to do in order to obtain eternal happiness, and the way of darkness is a representation of those particular sins which exclude men from the kingdom of God.

This epistle was first published in Greek, from a copy of father Hugh Menard, a Benedictine monk. An ancient version of it was found in a manuscript of the Abbey of Corbey, near a thousand years old. Vossius published it in the year 1656, together with the epistles of Ignatius. It is recently republished in the Apocryphal New Testament. There is another apocryphal work, termed 'Barnabas's Gospel,' which is ascribed to this apostle, and in which the history of Jesus Christ is related in a manner very different from the account given by the four evangelists. The Mohammedans possess this Gospel in Arabic, and it corresponds very well with the traditions in the Koran. It was probably a forgery of some nominal Christians, and afterwards altered and interpolated by the Mohammedans, the better to serve their purposes.

BARREL, a vessel used for keeping flour, and mentioned 1 Kings xvii. 12, 14, 16. The same word in the original is also translated in other passages, pitcher, as it appears to have been used for carrying water. It was carried by women upon their shoulders, as it is, indeed, at this day.

BARRENNESS. This condition was lamented from the prevailing expectation of the coming Messiah, and the anxious hope of every Jewish mother that he might be born of her.

BARSABAS—I. One of the first disciples of Jesus Christ, and surnamed Justus. 2. The surname of Judas, one of the principal disciples mentioned in Acts xv. 22.

BARTHOLOMEW, one of the twelve apostles (Matt. x. 3), is supposed to be the same person who is called Nathanael, one of the first of Christ's disciples. This opinion is founded on the circumstance, that as the Evangelist John never mentions Bartholomew in the number of the apostles, so the other evangelists never mention Nathanael. And as in John i. 45, Philip and Nathanael are mentioned together as coming to Jesus, so in the other Evangelists, Philip and Bartholomew are constantly associated together. The supposition also acquires additional probability from considering that Nathanael is particularly mentioned among the apostles to whom Christ appeared at the Sea of Tiberias, after his resurrection,—Simon Peter, Thomas, and Nathanael of Cana in Galilee; the sons of Zebedee, namely, James and John; with two other of his disciples, probably Andrew and Philip. John xxi. 2. Besides, Bartholomew can scarcely be considered as a proper name, but rather, like Bar-jona, and other similar words, simply descriptive of his relative or paternal capacity, as being the son of Tolmai, which was a name not uncommon among the Jews. Some have supposed this apostle to have been a Syrian, of noble extract, descended from the Ptolemies of Egypt. If, however, he be identical with Nathanael, it is plainly stated that he was of Cana in Galilee. We have no information as to his trade or occupation, but probably he was a fisherman. It is an early tradition, that Bartholomew propagated the faith as far as India, and also in the more northern and western parts of Asia, and that he finally suffered martyrdom at Albanopolis, in the region of Caucasus. But all the particulars respecting the life and labours of the apostles not mentioned in the New Testament are exceedingly uncertain.

BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY, ST. A religious feast-day, held by the Roman Catholic Church, in commemoration of Bartholomew, who is mentioned by three of the evangelists in the number of the apostles. It is a day ever memorable in history, on account of the horrid massacre of the Huguenots in France by the Papists, on the 24th of August 1572. It is calculated that on that occasion no fewer than thirty thousand unoffending Protestants were slain. Thus does Popery show herself to be drunk with the blood of the saints and of the witnesses for Jesus.

BARTIMÆUS, the son of TIMÆUS, a blind man of Jericho, who was cured by Jesus as he passed on his way to Jerusalem. "And they came to Jericho: and as he went out of Jericho with his disciples and a great number of people, blind Bartimæus, the son of Timæus, sat by the highway side begging. And when he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, and say, Jesus thou Son of David, have mercy on me. And many charged him that he should hold his peace: but he cried the more a great deal," &c. Mark x. 46-52. Two blind men are mentioned by Matthew when relating the same miracle, (xx. 30) but Mark and Luke mention only the most noted. Luke informs us that Jesus said to Bartimæus when he touched him, "Receive thy sight; thy faith hath saved thee." Our Lord seems to have regarded faith as indispensable to the success of a miracle. This faith on the part of Bartimæus was not a mere belief in the power of Christ as able to cure his blindness, but from the very language in which he addressed Jesus, "O Lord, thou son of David," it is plain that they believed on him unto the saving of the soul. It would have been a small matter had he had no other than a faith in miracles. The faith which justifies is that alone which can save the sinner.

BARUCH, the son of Neriah, and the individual to whom Jeremiah dictated his prophecies in the fourth year of the reign of Jehoiakim, king of Judah. The first roll was destroyed by order of the king, but Baruch wrote a second roll, containing all that was in the first roll, with the addition of the prophecy respecting the overthrow of the house of Jehoiakim. After the death of Jeremiah, the Rabbins allege that Baruch removed to Babylon, where he died, in the twelfth year of the captivity. Jer. xxxvi. 4. The Book of Baruch is justly placed among the apocryphal writings. Grotius thinks it a fiction, written by some Hellenistic Jew; and St Jerome gives as the reason why he did not write a commentary upon it, that the Jews themselves did not deem it canonical. It is not extant in Hebrew, and only in Greek and Syriac; but in what language it was originally written it is impossible to ascertain. Though bearing the name of Baruch, the very author of the book is uncertain. The principal subject of the book is an epistle pretended to be sent by Jehoiakim and the captive Jews in Babylon to their brethren in Judah and Jerusalem. The last chapter contains an epistle which falsely bears the name of Jeremiah. There are two versions of this book extant, one in Syriac, and one in Arabic; the Latin translation in the Vulgate is prior to the time of Jerome.

BARZILLAI,—1. A native of Rogelim, in Gilead, and one who assisted David when expelled from Jerusalem by Absalom. 2 Sam. xvii. 27-29. When David returned to Jerusalem, Barzillai attended him to the Jordan. 2. A native of Meholath, father of Adriel, who married Michal, formerly wife of David. 2 Sam. xxi. 8. 3. A priest, who married a daughter of Barzillai, the Gileadite. Neh. vii. 63.

BASHAN, or BATANÆA, a most fruitful district in Canaan, which Moses took from Og, and assigned to the half tribe of Manasseh. Num. xxxii. It received its name from a hill which is situated in the middle of it, and which was celebrated for its oaks and for its fine pasturage. The district contained no fewer than sixty walled cities, independently of its villages. The first notice of the country is to be found in Gen. xiv. 5. After the captivity, part of the district received the name of Batanæa, while the other portions were called Trachonitis, Auranitis, and Gaulonitis. Part of the district, as Dr Wilson tells us, is still called Bath-anizah. Allusions to this district of country are very frequent in the sacred writings, more especially as being distinguished by the loftiness of its hills, the strength and beauty of its oaks, and the fertility of its pastures. Thus in Psalm lxxviii. 15: "The hill of God is as the hill of Bashan; an high hill as the hill of Bashan;" and in Zech. xi. 2: "Howl, fir tree; for the cedar is fallen; because the mighty are spoiled: howl, O ye oaks of Bashan; for the forest of the vintage is coming down."

The following description of this region is by Mr

Buckingham:—"We continued our way over this elevated tract, continuing to behold, with surprise and admiration, a beautiful country on all sides of us; its plains covered with a fertile soil, its hills clothed with forests, and at every new turn presenting the most magnificent landscapes that could be imagined. Amongst the trees the oak was frequently seen; and we know that this territory presented them of old. In enumerating the sources from which the supplies of Tyre were drawn in the time of her great wealth and naval splendour, the prophet says, 'Of the oaks of Bashan have they made thine oars.' Ezek. xxvii. 6. Some learned commentators, indeed, believing that no oaks grew in these supposed desert regions, have translated the word by alders, to prevent the appearance of inaccuracy in the inspired writer. The expression of 'the fat bulls of Bashan,' which occurs more than once in the Scriptures, seemed to us equally inconsistent, as applied to the beasts of a country generally thought to be a desert, in common with the whole tract which is laid down in the modern maps as such, between the Jordan and the Euphrates; but we could now fully comprehend not only that the bulls of this luxuriant country might be proverbially fat, but that its possessors, too, might be a race renowned for strength and comeliness of person. . . . The general face of this region improved as we advanced further in it; and every new direction of our path opened upon us views which surprised and charmed us by their grandeur and beauty. Lofty mountains gave an outline of the most magnificent character; flowing beds of secondary hills softened the romantic wildness of the picture; gentle slopes clothed with wood, gave a rich variety of tints, hardly to be imitated by the pencil; deep valleys, filled with murmuring streams and verdant meadows, offered all the luxuriance of cultivation, and herds and flocks gave life and animation to scenes as grand, as beautiful, and as highly picturesque as the genius or taste of a Claude could either invent or desire."

BASILIAN MONKS, brethren of the order of Basil, in the fourth century, who, having retired into a desert in the province of Pontus, founded a monastery, and drew up rules to the amount of some hundreds, for his disciples. This new society soon spread all over the East; nor was it long before it passed into the West. Some pretend that Basil saw himself the spiritual father of more than ninety thousand monks in the East only; but this order, which flourished for more than three centuries, was considerably diminished by heresy, schism, and a change of empire; and yet the order still survives, though much reduced in numbers. The historians of this order say that it has produced fourteen popes, one thousand eight hundred and five bishops, three thousand and ten abbots, and eleven thousand and eighty-five martyrs, besides an infinite number of confessors and virgins. This order likewise boasts of several emperors, kings, and princes, who have embraced its rule.

BASILICA. This word, though originally in Greek, meaning a palace, applies in ancient architecture to a public hall or court of judicature, where the princes or magistrates sat to administer justice. In after times, the word came to be used when speaking of other public buildings. And, as in the days of Constantine, the Christians were often permitted to make use of such places for their worship, Basilica came to be employed by ecclesiastical writers to designate a church; and more especially, as in building the early Christian churches the shape of the ancient Basilica was often retained.

BASILIDES. This heretic, who lived towards the beginning of the second century, was by birth a Syrian, but taught his doctrines at Alexandria, in Egypt. He held that the beings emanating from the principle of darkness, smitten with love for the light, rise, and rush towards the bosom of the Pleroma. According to other Gnostics, the Pleroma, on the contrary, overflows, and descends to the kingdom of darkness. In the first hypothesis, the mixture of good and evil is the product of the attractive power of the good; in the second, it results from its expansive force. Basilides asserted, that the actions of men are necessary; that faith is a natural gift; and that whatever be their characters, all men will be saved. Thus early did the most absurd and unscriptural opinions begin to manifest themselves among the professors of Christianity.

BASKET (kophinos), a wicker-basket. The Jews appear to have been in the habit of using these wicker-baskets, which were probably of a certain measure, for carrying about with them their daily provision; and as the chief baker of Pharaoh, in his dream, carried three baskets on his head with all manner of baked meats for Pharaoh, we may thus infer the connection between the image of the basket and the event of which it was the emblem,—that when three days' provision should be expended, the event predicted should happen; and hence the basket which contains the daily provision becomes the emblem of a day,—the time for which the provision would last. The kophinoi were the baskets of which twelve were filled with the fragments remaining after the five loaves and two small fishes had been blessed and increased to the supply of five thousand persons by our Lord (Matt. xiv. 20, xvi. 9), and it is probable, from the number of these baskets, that they were those belonging to the twelve disciples, and used by them for the purpose of containing their daily supply of food, thus rendering the miracle, if possible, more impressive; for not only were the wants of the multitude supplied, but also the disciples themselves obtained their next day's provision from the five barley loaves and two small fishes. Their subsequent mistake of the words of our blessed Lord, when he speaks of the leaven of the Pharisees,—“It is because we have taken no bread,”—was thus brought home to themselves personally, when their unbelief and want of understanding upon that occasion were reproved. The white baskets which the chief baker saw in his dream, appear, from the Hebrew words employed to express them, to have been made of wickerwork, reticulated like nets. Jarchi explains their being called white from the circumstance that the bark was peeled off. Considerable attention seems to have been paid to this article of manufacture. They were constructed of a variety of shapes. Some were made from the leaves, and others from the fibres of the palm-tree, while several of them were of a simple frame-work of rushes. The Egyptian baskets represented on the monuments are sometimes so large that they are suspended from a pole which is borne on the shoulders of two men.

BASTARD, an illegitimate child. The law of Moses was explicit in reference to such persons. Deut. xxiii. 2. The only other passage in which the word occurs in the Old Testament is in Zech. ix. 6. Jephthah, the Israelitish judge, is said to have been the son of a harlot, and therefore a bastard. On this account, he was incapable of receiving the paternal inheritance. The Jewish father bestowed as little attention, says Paxton, on his natural children as the Greek: he seems to have resigned them, in a great measure, to their own inclinations; he neither checked their passions, nor corrected their faults, nor stored their minds with useful knowledge. This is evidently implied in these words of the apostle: “If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not? But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons.” Heb. xii. 7, 8. To restrain the licentious desires of the heart, Jehovah, by an express law, fixed a stigma upon the bastard, which was not to be removed till the tenth generation; and to show that the precept was on no account to be violated, or suffered to fall into disuse, it is emphatically repeated: “A bastard shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord; even to his tenth generation shall he not enter into the congregation of the Lord.” Deut. xxiii. 2. The same word which, in the passage now quoted, is translated bastard, is rendered in Zech. ix. 6, a stranger or foreigner, by Dr Blayney, Michaelis, and others, and is understood by them as referring to the conquest of Ashdod by the Jews; an event which occurred under the Maccabees.

BASTINADO. See SCOURGING.

BAT. This singular creature, which possesses properties that connect it with both beasts and birds, has been variously placed in systems of natural history. The editor of Calmet says, “It is too much a bird to be properly a beast, and too much a beast to be properly a bird.” Doubts as to its nature, however, no longer exist. The bat is now universally made to take its place among the animal tribes, to which the bringing forth its young alive, its hair, its teeth, as well as the rest of its habitudes and conformation, evidently entitle it. In no particular scarcely does it resemble a bird, except in its power of sustaining itself in the air, which circumstance is scarcely enough to balance the weight of those particulars which we have noticed as placing it among quadrupeds.

The Hebrew name of the bat denotes “the fierier duskiness;” that is, the evening. It was similarly named by the Greeks and the Latins. In Deut. xiv. 18, 19, it is well described: “The bat, and every creeping thing that flieth, is unclean to you: they shall not be eaten.”

The legs of the bat are formed in a very particular manner, and entirely different from any other animal. It creeps with the instruments of its flight. During the entire winter it conceals itself in its hole, as it does also during the day-time even in summer, never venturing out, except for an hour or two in the evening, in order to supply itself with food. The usual place in which it takes up its abode is the hollow of a tree, a dark cavern, or the chink of some ruined building, of which it seems particularly fond. This illustrates Isa. ii. 20: “In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, to the moles and to the bats;” that is, he shall carry his idols into the dark caverns, old ruins, or desolate places, to which he himself shall flee for refuge; and so shall give them up, and relinquish them to the filthy animals that frequent such places, and have taken possession of them as their proper habitation.

BATH, a measure of capacity for things liquid, as of wine and oil, being the same with the ephah in dry measure. Ezek. xlv. 11. Ten baths made one homer. Most modern writers consider the bath as containing seven gallons and a half English measure.

BATH. Homer mentions the use of the bath as an old custom. The bath at this period was the first refreshment offered to the guest. In later times, rooms, both public and private, were built expressly for the purpose of bathing. The public baths of the Greeks were mostly connected with the gymnasia, because they were taken immediately after the athletic exercises. The Romans, in the period of their luxury, imitated the Greeks in this point, and built magnificent baths. The following description applies both to the Greek and Roman baths:—The building which contained them was oblong, and had two divisions,—the one for males, the other for females. In both, warm or cold baths could be taken. The warm baths, in both divisions, were adjacent to each other, for the sake of being easily heated. In the midst of the building, on the ground floor, was the heating room, by which not only the water for bathing, but sometimes also the floors of the adjacent rooms, were warmed. Above the heating room was an apartment in which three copper kettles were walled in, one above another, so that the lowest was immediately over the fire, the second over the first, and the third over the second. In this way, either boiling, lukewarm, or cold water could be obtained. The water was carried, by separate pipes, from these kettles into the bathing rooms, and a fresh supply was immediately poured into the kettles from a reservoir. Close to the heating room were three separate rooms on each side, for the hot, the lukewarm, and the cold bath. The bathing rooms had, on the floor, a basin of mason-work, in which there were seats, and round it a gallery, where the bathers remained before they descended into the bath, and where also the attendants were. There was also a sweating room, which was heated by means of flues, and was called laconicum. This room had an opening in the ceiling, through which the light fell, and from which was suspended a brazen plate, that could be raised and let down at pleasure, to increase or lessen the heat. For undressing, for receiving the garments, and for anointing after bathing, there were different rooms; and connected with the bath were walks, covered race grounds, tennis courts, and gardens. These buildings, together with a number of bathing rooms, were necessary for a public bath, which was adorned with splendid furniture, and all the requisites for recreation, and resembled, in its exterior appearance, an extensive palace. Roman luxury, always in search of means for rendering sensual enjoyments more exquisite, in later times built particular conduits for conducting sea water to the baths, used mountain snow, and enlarged these establishments in such a way, that even their ruins excite admiration. Among the Europeans, the Russians have peculiar establishments for bathing, which are visited by all classes of the people during the whole year. The people regard these baths as a necessary of life, and they are to be found in every village. They are also met with in Finland. Among the Asiatics, baths are in general use. The Turks are, by their religion, obliged to make repeated ablutions daily; besides these, men and women must bathe in particular circumstances, and at certain times. For this purpose, there is in every city a public bath connected with a mosque; and rich private persons possess private bath-houses, adorned with all the objects of Asiatic luxury.

In the 'Narrative of a Mission of Inquiry to the Jews,' by Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne, we find the following very graphic description of the mode of using an Eastern bath:—"In the afternoon we tried the Turkish bath. The attendants first laid aside our clothes, and put a towel, wrapt like a turban, round our head, and another round our waist. Then we were conducted into the inner apartment, the atmosphere of which we could scarcely breathe at first, on account of the heat and vapour. Our feet, shod with wooden sandals, slid on the smooth marble floors. Then they laid us down on our back upon the smooth marble divan in the centre of the apartment, washed us with soap, and poured hot water over our heads. All this was done by an Egyptian almost naked, armed with a rough glove of camel's hair. It was not without a shudder that we felt ourselves in such hands, amidst about twenty others, all Mohammedans, with shaved heads and black skins. We were then led to one of the side baths, where the hot water was allowed to pour upon us. The pores being abundantly opened under the operation of so many causes, we were conducted back to the room where we had undressed, laid upon our backs, covered over with a warm quilt, and shampooed,—the soles of our feet being scraped with an instrument for the purpose, and every joint in our hands and feet made to crack. Lastly, they offered us coffee, and a glass of sherbet; after which we were allowed to dress, and come away, not a little amused, as well as refreshed. The custom of passing from the bath to the dressing-room, during which the feet might easily be soiled, reminded us of the true rendering of the precious words of our Lord, 'He that has been in the bath needeth not, save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit.'" See ABLUTION.

BATH-KOL (daughter of the voice). This, according to the Jewish Rabbins, was a kind of oracular voice, which was supposed to supply the place of oral prophecy during the time of the second temple, and after prophecy had ceased in Israel. To this species of revelation they trace their traditions and customs, pretending that their elders received them by the Bath-Kol. It is a matter of great difference of opinion among Jewish writers what was the precise nature of the Bath-Kol, whether it was a distinct audible voice from heaven, or merely the daughter or echo of a voice. Maimonides explains the Bath-Kol by alleging it to be the offspring of a heated imagination, which thinks that it hears a voice speaking from heaven. Dr Prideaux, however, likens it to the Sortes Virgilianæ of the heathen, a mode of divination much practised among the Romans. Even the Christians were not free from this superstition, often making the same use of the Scriptures as the Romans did of the writings of Virgil; and it descended through them to later times. In France it was the practice, for several ages, to use this kind of divination at the consecration of a bishop, in order to discover his life, manners, and future behaviour: and the usage came into England with the Norman conquest; for we are told that at the consecration of William, the second Norman bishop of the diocese of Norwich, the words which first occurred on dipping into the Bible were, "Not this man, but Barabbas." William died soon after, and was succeeded by Herbert de Lozinga, chief simony broker to King William Rufus, on whose consecration the Bible opened at the words in which Jesus accosted Judas Iscariot: "Friend, wherefore art thou come?" This circumstance so affected Herbert, that he repented of his crime, in expiation of which he built the cathedral church of Norwich, the first stone of which he laid in the year 1096. With some, it is probable that bath-kol, the daughter of the voice, was only an elegant personification of tradition. Others, however, more bold, said that it was a voice from heaven, sometimes attended by a clap of thunder.

BATH-RABBIM, the name of one of the gates of Heshbon—once the capital of Sihon, king of the Amorites. Cant. vii. 4.

BATTLE. See ARMY.

BATTLE-AXE. The battle-axe is mentioned by Homer, as having been much used in battle by the Greeks. It was wielded with tremendous force, and often hewed in pieces both the armour and the antagonist. The axe was also used by the Persians, in the early period of their history. The chief use of this weapon in the field of battle is referred to by Jeremiah (li. 20, 21.) See ARMS.

BALILEMENT, a ledge or parapet round the top of flat-roofed houses; as were those of the Jews, and other Eastern people. (See HOUSE.) The Jews were enjoined to adopt this precaution against accidents, under the penalty of death. Deut. xxii. 8.

BAXTERIANISM, so called from the learned and pious nonconformist divine, Richard Baxter. His design was to reconcile Calvin and Arminius. He taught that God had elected some, whom he is determined to save, without any foresight of antecedent faith; and that others, to whom the gospel is preached, have common grace, which, if they improve, they shall obtain saving grace, according to the doctrine of Arminius. He owns, with Calvin, that the merits of Christ's death are to be applied to believers only; but he also asserts, that all men are in a state capable of salvation.

In order to prove that the death of Christ has put all in a state capable of salvation, the following arguments are alleged by this learned author:—1. It was the nature of all mankind which Christ assumed at his incarnation, and the sins of all mankind were the occasion of his suffering. 2. It was to Adam, as the common father of lapsed mankind, that God made the promise. Gen. iii. 15. The conditional new covenant does equally give Christ, pardon, and life, to all mankind, on condition of acceptance. The conditional grant is universal:—"Whosoever believeth shall be saved." 3. It is not to the elect only, but to all mankind, that Christ has commanded his ministers to proclaim his gospel, and offer the benefits of his purchase.

There are, Mr Baxter allows, certain fruits of Christ's death, which are proper to the elect only:—1. Grace eventually worketh in them true faith, repentance, conversion, and union with Christ, as his living members. 2. The actual forgiveness of sin, as to the spiritual and eternal punishment. 3. Our reconciliation with God, and adoption and right to the heavenly inheritance. 4. The Spirit of Christ to dwell in us, and sanctify us, by a habit of Divine love. Rom. viii. 9–13; Gal. iv. 6. 5. Employment in holy, acceptable service, and access in prayer, with a promise of being heard through Christ. Heb. ii. 5, 6;

John xiv. 13. 6. Well-grounded hopes of salvation, peace of conscience, and spiritual communion with the Church mystical in heaven and earth. Rom. v. 11; Heb. xii. 22. 7. A special interest in Christ, and intercession with the Father. Rom. viii. 32, 33. 8. Resurrection unto life, and justification in judgment; glorification of the soul at death, and of the body at the resurrection. Phil. iii. 20, 21; 2 Cor. v. 1–3.

Christ has made a conditional deed of gift of these benefits to all mankind; but the elect only accept and possess them. Hence he infers, that though Christ never absolutely intended or decreed that his death should eventually put all men in possession of those benefits, yet he did intend and decree that all men should have a conditional gift of them by his death.

Baxter's celebrated 'Aphorisms of Justification,' published in 1649, afforded employment to himself and his theological critics till near the close of his life; and in the many modifications, concessions, and alterations, which were extorted from him by men of different religious tenets, he sometimes incautiously proved himself to be more Calvinistic than Calvin, and at others more Arminian than Arminius. The following observations from 'Orme's Life of Baxter,' are, on the whole, just and instructive:—"Thus did Baxter, at a very early period of his life, launch into the ocean of controversy, on some of the most interesting subjects that can engage the human mind. The manner in which he began to treat them was little favourable to arriving at correct and satisfactory conclusions. Possessed of a mind uncommonly penetrating, he yet seems not to have had the faculty of compressing within narrow limits his own views, or the accounts he was disposed to give of the views of others. All this arose, not from any indisposition to be explicit, but from the peculiar character of his mind. He is perpetually distinguishing things into physical and moral, real and nominal, material and formal. However important these distinctions are they often render his writings tiresome to the reader, and his reasonings more frequently perplexing than satisfactory. Baxter is generally understood to have pursued a middle course between Calvinism and Arminianism. That he tried to hold and adjust the balance between the two parties, and that he was most anxious to reconcile them, are very certain. But it seems scarcely less evident, that he was much more a Calvinist than he was an Arminian. While this seems to me very apparent, it must be acknowledged, that if certain views which have often been given of Calvinism are necessary to constitute a Calvinist, Richard Baxter was no believer in that creed.

"While satisfied that among Baxter's sentiments no important or vital error will be found, yet in the style and method in which he too generally advocated or defended them, there is much to censure. The wrangling and disputatious manner in which he presented many of his views, was calculated to gender an unsanctified state of mind in persons who either abetted or opposed his sentiments. His scholastic and metaphysical style of arguing is unbefitting the simplicity of the gospel, and cannot fail to injure it wherever such is employed. It not only savours too much of the spirit of the schools, and the philosophy of this world, but places the truths of revelation on a level with the rudiments of human science.

"In illustration of the influence now adverted to, it must be remarked, that the first stage in that process of deterioration which took place among the Presbyterian Dissenters, was generally characterised by the term Baxterianism; a word to which it is difficult to attach a definite meaning. It denotes no separate sect or party, but rather a system of opinions on doctrinal points, verging towards Arminianism, and which ultimately passed to Arianism and Socinianism. Even during Baxter's own life, while the Presbyterians taxed the Independents with Antinomianism, the latter retorted the charge of Socinianism, or at least a tendency towards it, in some of the opinions maintained both by Baxter and others of that party. To whatever cause it is to be attributed, it is a melancholy fact, that the declension which began even at this early period in the Presbyterian body, went on slowly, but surely, till, from the most fervid orthodoxy, it finally arrived in England at the frigid zone of Unitarianism.

"I wish not to be understood as stating that Baxter either held any opinions of this description, or was conscious of a tendency in his sentiments towards such a fearful consummation, but, that there was an injurious tendency in his manner of discussing certain important subjects. It was subtle, and full of logomachy; it tended to unsettle, rather than to fix and determine; it gendered strife, rather than godly edifying. It is not possible to study such books as his Methodus, and his Catholic Theology, without experiencing that we are brought into a different region from apostolic Christianity,—a region of fierce debate and altercation about words, and names, and opinions; in which all that can be said for error is largely dwelt upon, as well as what can be said for truth. The ambiguities of language, the diversities of sects, the uncertainties of human perception and argument, are urged, till the force of revealed truth is considerably weakened, and confidence in our own judgment of its meaning greatly impaired. Erroneous language is maintained to be capable of sound meaning, and the most scriptural phrases to be susceptible of unscriptural interpretation, till truth and error almost change places, and the mind is bewildered, confounded, and paralysed. Into this mode of discussing such subjects was this most excellent man led, partly by the natural constitution of his mind, which has often been adverted to,—partly by his ardent desire of putting an end to the divisions of the Christian world, and producing universal concord and harmony. He failed where success was impossible, however plausible might have been the means which he employed. He understood the causes of difference and contention better than their remedies; hence the measures which he used frequently aggravated, instead of curing the disease. While a portion of evil, however, probably resulted from Baxter's mode of conducting controversy, and no great light was thrown by him on some of the dark and difficult subjects which he so keenly discussed, I have no doubt he contributed considerably to produce a more moderate spirit towards each other between Calvinists and Arminians, than had long prevailed. Though he satisfied neither party, he must have convinced both that great difficulties exist on the subjects in debate, if pursued beyond a certain length; that allowance ought to be made by each for the weakness or prejudices of the other; and that genuine religion is compatible with some diversity of opinion respecting one or all of the five points." A similar effect to that which Mr Orme ascribes to Baxter's writings on the English Presbyterians, followed also on the Continent among the reformed Churches. It was the same middle system, with its philosophical subtleties, which Cameron and Amyraut taught abroad; and which produced in them those effects that have been justly ascribed, both in England and other parts of the world, to Arminianism.

BAY TREE. This tree is mentioned only in Psal. xxxvii. 35, 36: "I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree. Yet he passed away, and lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found." But the original word, azrach, merely signifies a native tree—a tree growing in its native soil, not having suffered by transplantation, and therefore spreading itself luxuriantly. Many critics, however, think that azrach is the laurel. The Septuagint and Vulgate have translated it Cedar. The bay tree is the Laurus nobilis of botanists, a native of Italy and various places in Asia, and is of the same family as the cinnamon and camphor tree. It is of the class Enneandria, order, Monogynia, and was the true laurel of the ancients. It is the daphne of the Greeks, and the laurus of the Latins.

BDELLIUM occurs in Gen. ii. 12; Numb. xi. 7. Interpreters seem at a loss to know what to do with this word, and have rendered it variously. Many suppose it a mineral production. The Septuagint translates in the first place, a carbuncle; and in the second, a crystal. The bedolah in Genesis is undoubtedly some precious stone; and its colour, mentioned in Numbers, where the manna is spoken of as of the colour of bdellium, is explained by a reference to Exod. xvi. 14, 31, where it is likened to hoar-frost, which, being like little fragments of ice, may confirm the opinion, that the bdellium is the beryl, perhaps that pellucid kind called by Dr Hill the ellipomocrostyla, or beryl crystal. In the Arabic version of the Pentateuch, the bdellium of Moses is rendered a pearl; and many modern writers are of the same opinion. It has sometimes been supposed, however, that the bdellium of antiquity was a sort of gum resin, famous for its medicinal virtues; and in the opinion of many eminent Oriental scholars, it is the resin obtained from the Borassus flabelliformis of Linnæus. This was one of the products of the land of Havilah, which, it is said, abounded in "gold, bdellium, and onyx-stone." The position of the word here, as conjoined with two mineral productions, renders it probable that some precious stone is referred to.

BEACON, a signal erected on a rising ground, or top of a hill, to give warning of the approach of an enemy; or on a place of danger, to warn passengers to avoid it. The Jews are likened by the Prophet Isaiah (xxx. 17) to a beacon and ensign on a hill, when the judgments of God had rendered them few in number, and laid on them such alarming distress as loudly warned others to avoid the like sins.

BEAM. This word occurs in Matt. vii. 3: "And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?" Doddridge supposes that the words "beam" and "mote" may be no more than names of diseases of the eye, because it is impossible that a beam in its literal sense could be lodged in the eye. Dr Campbell, too, stumbling at the same difficulty, renders the word "thorn," instead of "beam," without any sufficient authority. Not the slightest necessity exists for any such changes in the translation, the language being plainly figurative, and referring, as the Rabbis inform us, to a proverbial saying very common among the Jews.

BEAN. This word occurs only twice in the Sacred Volume, viz., 2 Sam. xvii. 28, and Ezek. iv. 9. In the first passage, it is spoken of as sent up to the camp of David at Mahanaim along with "wheat, and barley, and flour, and parched corn, and lentiles, and parched pulse." The language of Ezekiel (iv. 9) describes it as an ingredient in the bread which was to be used in the time of a siege: "Take thou also unto thee wheat, and barley, and beans, and lentiles, and millet, and fitches, and put them in one vessel, and make thee bread thereof, according to the number of the days that thou shalt lie upon thy side, three hundred and ninety days shalt thou eat thereof." In the Hebrew the name of this plant is pol, and it is the Vicia faba of Linnæus. The kinds of bean most common in Syria at present are, the white horse bean and the kidney bean. The bean is of the class Diadelphia, order, Decandria. Boiled beans stewed with garlic form at this day in the East a favourite dish at the tables of people of rank. They are often eaten parched, but then they are only sprinkled over other more substantial dishes, or used as an accompaniment to cheese, and as a desert.

BEAR. In the Hebrew, this animal is very expressively called the grumbler, or growler.

There are three kinds of the bear known; the white, the black, and the brown. Of the two former the Scripture does not speak, the latter kind being the only one known in the Eastern regions. The brown bear, says Buffon, is not only savage, but solitary; he takes refuge in the most unfrequented parts, and the most dangerous precipices and uninhabited mountains. He chooses his den in the most gloomy parts of the forest, in some cavern that has been hollowed by time, or in the hollow of some old enormous tree. The disposition of this animal is most surly and rapacious, and his mischievousness has passed into a proverb. His appearance corresponds with his temper. His coat is rugged, his limbs strong and thick, and his countenance, covered with a dark and sullen scowl, indicates the settled moroseness of his disposition. The sacred writers frequently associate this formidable enemy with the king of the forest, as being equally dangerous and destructive. Thus Amos, setting before his incorrigible countrymen the succession of calamities which, under the just judgment of God, was about to befall them, declares that the removal of one would but leave another equally grievous: "Wo unto you that desire the day of the Lord! to what end is it for you? the day of the Lord is darkness, and not light. As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him." Amos v. 18, 19. And Solomon, who had closely studied the character of the several individuals of the animal kingdom, compares an unprincipled and wicked ruler to these creatures: "As a roaring lion, and a ranging bear; so is a wicked ruler over the poor people." Prov. xxviii. 15.

The sacred writers lead us to suppose that the bear was a severe scourge to the inhabitants of Canaan. When David was a young man he watched his father's flocks, and he killed both a lion and a bear, which had taken a lamb out of the flock. From 2 Kings ii. 24, we learn that two she-bears were employed as instruments of punishment for insulting Elisha. As he went up from Bethel, children came out of the town and mocked him; and when he cursed them in the name of the Lord, two she-bears came out of the wood and tore forty and two of them. It is thought that these children belonged to idolatrous parents, who had instigated them to this outrage towards the prophet of God.

The she-bear is said to be even more fierce and terrible than the male, especially after she has cubbed. So strong is her attachment to her young, and so extreme the jealousy with which she protects them, that no stranger, whether man or beast, is suffered to intrude on her solitude with impunity. This circumstance finely illustrates the beautiful imagery of the prophet, employed to delineate the amazing change which the gospel of Christ will be the instrument of effecting in the human heart, and the delightful harmony which will follow in its train: "And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together." Isa. xi. 7.

To the fury of the female bear, when she happens to be robbed of her young, there are several striking allusions in Scripture. Those persons who have witnessed her under such circumstances, describe her rage to be most violent and frantic, and as only to be diverted from the object of her vengeance with the loss of her life. How terrible, then, was the threatening of the incensed JEHOVAH, in consequence of the numerous and aggravated iniquities of the kingdom of Israel, as uttered by the Prophet Hosea (xiii. 8): "I will meet them as a bear that is bereaved of her whelps, and will rend the caul of their heart!" The execution of this terrible denunciation, in the invasion of the land by the Assyrian armies, and the utter subversion of the kingdom, is well known to every reader of Scripture.

The bear is not more ferocious than he is cunning and deceitful. To this the prophet evidently refers, in his complaint of the suddenness and severity of the Divine judgments: "He was unto me as a bear lying in wait, and as a lion in secret places." Lam. iii. 10.

In the vision of Daniel, where the four great monarchies of antiquity are symbolized by different beasts of prey, whose qualities resembled the character of these several states, the Medo-Persian empire is represented by a bear, which raised itself up on one side, and had between its teeth three ribs; and they said thus unto it: "Arise, devour much flesh." Dan. vii. 5.

BEARD. The Hebrews wore their beards very long. In the East it is an insult to touch the beard, unless to kiss it, which was a frequent mode of salutation. To shave off the beard was a gross affront; and it was not unusual to swear by the beard. "So essential an attribute of manhood is this hairy appendage considered, that it is frequently used as the symbol of liberty and power, and the want of it is the universal badge of servitude. Belzoni relates, that one of the buffoons of the Bashaw of Egypt took it into his head one day, for a frolic, to shave his beard, but no sooner did he make his appearance in that predicament, than his women actually thrust him out of the door; and such was his disgrace, that even his fellow buffoons would not eat with him till his beard was grown again. And Niebuhr mentions an inhabitant of Basra, who having shaved himself in a drunken fit, fled to India, and never durst return, for fear of the disgrace and punishment he merited, both by his shaving and intemperance. The beard is reckoned the greatest ornament of the person, inasmuch, that the loss of it would be considered a greater deformity than the want of a nose; and the possession of it is invariably associated in their minds with feelings of truth and honesty. To be deprived of their beard as a punishment, is looked upon as a greater mark of infamy, than exposure on the pillory is amongst us: to take one by the beard, is a token of the highest respect and affection; to swear by it, is a vow which it would be the height of impiety to violate; and the strongest language which they use to express the value of any thing, is to say that it is worth more than one's beard. From this Oriental mode of thinking, we can form some estimate of the magnitude of the insult which the ill-advised king of the Ammonites put upon the messengers of David. Niebuhr relates, that Bender Righ, an Arab prince, who was of a brutal and imperious temper, committed this indignity on a Persian envoy, which brought a powerful army upon him in the year 1765. And Shah Abbas himself, king of Persia, as we are told by Maurice, enraged that the emperor of Hindostan had, through inadvertency, addressed him by a title far inferior to that of the great Shah-in-Shah, or king of kings, commanded the beards of the ambassadors to be shaved off, and sent them home to their master."

Nothing has been more fluctuating in different ages and countries than the fashion of wearing the beard. Some have cultivated one part, and some another; some have endeavoured to extirpate it entirely, whilst others have almost idolized it: the revolutions of countries have scarcely been more famous than the revolutions of beards. It is a great mark of infamy among the Arabs to cut off the beard. Many people would prefer death to this kind of treatment. As they would think it a grievous punishment to lose it, they carry things so far as to beg for the sake of it: "By your beard!—By the life of your beard!—God preserve your blessed beard!"—When they would express their value for anything, they say, "It is worth more than a man's beard." And hence we may easily learn the magnitude of the offence of the Ammonites, in their treatment of David's ambassadors, as above mentioned; and also the force of the emblem used Ezek. v. 1–5, where the inhabitants of Jerusalem are compared to the hair of his head and beard. Though they had been dear to God as the hair of an Eastern beard to its owner, they should be taken away and consumed,—one part by pestilence and famine,—another by the sword,—another by the calamities incident on exile. Such is the importance which Orientalists attach to the beard, that the utmost care is taken to dress and trim it in a becoming manner. Morier the traveller describes the process of dyeing it:—"It is almost universally dyed black, by an operation not very pleasant, and necessary to be repeated generally once a fortnight. It is always performed in the hot bath, where the hair being well saturated, takes the colour better. A thick paste is first made, which is loosely plastered over the beard, and which, after remaining an hour, is all completely washed off, and leaves the hair of a very strong orange colour. After this a thick paste is made of the leaf of the indigo, which has previously been pounded to a very fine powder, and of this also a layer is put upon the beard; but this second process, to be successful, requires two hours. When the indigo is at last washed off, the beard is of very dark bottle green, and becomes a jet only when it has met the air for twenty-four hours. Some, indeed, are content with the orange colour; others, more fastidious, prefer a beard quite blue. The people of Bokhara are famous for their blue beard." Even to talk disrespectfully of a Persian's beard, is the greatest insult that can be offered to him, and an attempt to touch it would probably be followed by the instant death of the offender. Plucking off the beard was accounted still more degrading than shaving off the beard, implying, as it did, cruelty added to insult. Hence the cruel treatment which the Saviour experienced, when "he gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair." Ezra (ix. 3) speaks of this as the mode in which he gave expression to the violence of his sorrow: "And when I heard this thing, I rent my garment and my mantle, and plucked off the hair of my head and of my beard, and sat down astonished." The Greeks, and other nations around them, expressed their sorrow on particular occasions in the same way. The beards of criminals, especially those charged with capital crimes among the Romans, were permitted to grow long without being dressed.

BEASTS. When this word is used in opposition to man, as Psal. xxxvi. 6, any brute creature is signified; when to creeping things, as Lev. xi. 2–7, four-footed animals, from the size of the hare and upwards, are intended; and when to wild creatures, as Gen. i. 25, cattle or tame animals are spoken of. Paul (1 Cor. xv. 32) speaks of fighting with beasts, by which he does not mean his having been exposed in the amphitheatre to fight as a gladiator, as some have conjectured, but that he had to contend at Ephesus with the fierce uproar of Demetrius and his associates. Ignatius uses the same figure, in his Epistle to the Romans: "From Syria even unto Rome I fight with wild beasts, both by sea and land, both night and day, being bound to ten leopards;" that is, to a band of soldiers. So Lucian, in like manner, says, "For I am not to fight with ordinary wild beasts, but with men, insolent and hard to be convinced." Though the expression of Paul, however, is in all probability figurative, it has a manifest allusion to the mode in which the Romans sometimes punished their criminals. The early Christians were often subjected to this cruel death; so customary was it, that, in the time of Nero, it became a common saying, "The Christians to the lions." This mode of punishment is thus minutely described by the Rev. Dr Jamieson, in his 'Manners and Trials of the Primitive Christians':—"Of all modes of punishment, the most popular with the ancient Roman people was that of setting men to fight with wild beasts; and as it was the kind of death reserved for the most heinous offences, and inflicted on the vilest and most noted criminals, the Christians, who were regarded as the worst and guiltiest of men, were very frequently disposed of in that barbarous manner. This horrid spectacle, which, of all the shows in the amphitheatre, was the most acceptable to the taste of the degenerate Romans in the first three centuries, always formed, on festive occasions, the concluding sport of the day; and those who were made to engage in it were those felons only to whom no hope of life was left. The Bestiarii, who in the earlier part of the day entered the lists with wild beasts, were allowed all sorts of defensive and offensive armour, and in the event of their slaying their savage antagonist, were rewarded by the applauding spectators with liberty and life. But those who were brought last on the sands of the amphitheatre were naked and defenceless, with the certain prospect before them of an inevitable and horrid death. They were frequently tied to a wooden pillar, or clothed in the skins of dogs, goats, asses, and such like animals, in order to whet the monster's appetite, or else persons were employed in goading his sides with red-hot iron rods, to provoke him to greater fury, and thus afford better sport to the blood-thirsty spectators. The exhibition of such revolting shows, was a common way by which governors and magistrates sought to gain popularity; and although the prisons might not contain criminals of atrocity great enough to justify their execution in this barbarous manner, they were never at a loss, when they had the unfortunate Christians to pitch against the wild tenants of the kennels of the circus. The rabble in a Roman or Grecian city could receive no more grateful intelligence, than that of a supply of victims for the wild beasts; and the exhibitors of the bloody games required only to raise the cry,—‘The Christians! away with the Christians! let the Christians be thrown to the lions!’—to hear their shout rapturously responded to by the populace, and to see their object easily, and without expense or trouble, attained. This most frequently happened at those public and festive occasions, which, being graced with the presence of the emperor, it was endeavoured to signalise with the utmost pomp and magnificence, and to give a greater zest to the entertainment by introducing a variety of strange and spirit-stirring sights. Among these, the most extraordinary and universally called for, was an exhibition of Christians set to contend with wild bulls, bears, leopards, tigers, and lions. On an announcement of such an entertainment, the expectations of the people were raised to the highest pitch; and never were the benches of the amphitheatre filled with a denser crowd of men, women, and children,—never did the walls of the circus resound with more deafening shouts, than when a hungry lion, or a ravenous tiger, starved for the occasion, leaped from his den, and with a tremendous roar, heard even amid acclamations loud as from numbers without number, made an impetuous dash against the poor believer, laying bare his flesh in ghastly wounds, and crushing his bones as easily as if they were straw. The famous Ignatius died in this manner, at Rome, 20th December 108, during the celebration of the feast Saturnalia. Brought into the arena of the amphitheatre, the holy man—universally odious to the populace as the great leader of the Christians,—was assailed with the most savage yells, during which the lions being let loose upon him, quickly despatched the work of destruction, and left nothing of the venerable saint but a few of the harder and larger bones. Agapius, one of the martyrs of Palestine, was another conspicuous victim of this barbarous custom. Several times he had been conducted to the place of execution, in company with the most despicable malefactors; but as often the judge, from irresolution or sympathy, deferred his part in the combat. On a grand occasion, when the bloodthirsty Maximin was present, he was dragged from his cell, along with a base murderer, as the chief among the Christian prisoners. The assassin, guilty as he was, became, like Barabbas of old, an object of the popular clemency and favour, and was dismissed amid thunders of applause, while the confessor of Christ, reckoned more odious and guilty than the criminal, was detained, without the smallest hope of deliverance from the hands of man. Having, to every call to abjure his religion, firmly replied in the negative, and to every inquiry as to his faith in Christ, confessed that ‘he was God over all, blessed for ever,’ he was hooted and condemned, as an irreclaimable Christian. The signal was given, and in an instant Agapius was in the jaws of a famishing bear.”

In Rev. iv. 6, mention is made of four beasts, or rather, as the word zoa signifies, living ones, as in Ezek. i.; and so the word might have been more justly translated. Various opinions have been entertained as to the precise signification of these “living creatures.” Some have supposed them to represent the angels, but this idea is refuted by the consideration, that they are spoken of as adoring “the Lamb that was slain, who had redeemed them to God with his blood.” From the expressions here used, it is obvious that they must represent some portion of the human race. Some expositors, accordingly, have supposed them to denote the whole Church, and the twenty-four elders to represent its rulers and pastors. It is far more probable, however, that the four living creatures are emblems of the ministers of the Christian Church, while the twenty-four elders are emblematic of the whole Church. Wild beasts are used in Scripture as emblems of tyrannical and persecuting powers. The most illustrious conquerors of antiquity, also, have not a more honourable emblem.

BEATIFICATION, in the Roman Catholic Church an act by which the pope declares a person beatified or blessed after death. It is the first step to canonization (which see). No person can be beatified till fifty years after his death. All certificates or attestations of virtues and miracles, the necessary qualifications for saintship, are examined by the Congregation of Rites. This examination often continues for several years; after which, his holiness decrees the beatification. The corpse and relics of the future saint are thenceforth exposed to the veneration of the superstitious; his image is crowned with rays, and a particular office is set apart for him; but his body and relics are not carried in procession. Indulgences, likewise, and remissions of sins, are granted on the day of his beatification; which, though not so pompous as that of canonization, is, however, very splendid. Beatification differs from canonization in this, that the pope does not act as a judge in determining the state of the beatified, but only grants a privilege to certain persons to honour him by a particular religious worship, without incurring the penalty of superstitious worshippers; but in canonization, the pope speaks as a judge, and determines, ex cathedra, upon the state of the person canonized. Beatification was introduced when it was thought proper to delay the canonization of saints, for the greater assurance of the truth of the steps taken in the procedure. Some particular orders of monks have assumed to themselves the power of beatification; thus, Octavia Melchiorica was beatified by the Dominicans.

BEATITUDE imports the highest degree of happiness at which human nature can arrive,—the fruition of God in a future life to all eternity. It is also used when speaking of the theses contained in Christ’s sermon on the mount, whereby he pronounces the several characters there mentioned blessed.

BEATITUDES, THE MOUNT OF, situated a little to the west of Tiberias, now known as the heights or horns of Huttin, a rocky hill with two conical tops. It is supposed to be the scene of the sermon on the mount, for which reason it is also sometimes called the Hill of Toubat, or Blessings. Another tradition supposes it to be the place where Jesus fed the five thousand with five barley loaves and two fishes. It is not impossible that one or both of these traditions may be true, but there is no positive evidence of their truth; and it seems too probable that they arose from the hill being so prominently marked by two peaks. It rises from two to three hundred feet, and consists entirely of limestone. Mr Carne, in his 'Letters from the East,' thus describes it:—"It is a verdant hill, rising gradually on every side towards the summit, on which small masses of rock are scattered. It is admirably calculated for the purpose, as a multitude of people might stand on the gently sloping sides of the mount, even to the bottom, and hear distinctly every word of the speaker. The prospect of the lake beneath, of the mountains of Gilboa, and that of Bethulia to the north, is extremely beautiful."

BEAUTIFUL. We find a particular gate of the temple at Jerusalem bearing this name: "And a certain man came from his mother's womb was carried, whom they laid daily at the gate of the temple which is called Beautiful, to ask alms of them that entered into the temple." Acts iii. 2. Considerable difference of opinion has existed among commentators as to the precise gate which bore this name. Most of them hold the opinion of Wetstein, that it was the eastern gate, called Nicanor's, by which there was an entrance from the court of the women to that of the Israelites. This gate they conjecture to have been called Beautiful because, as we learn from Josephus, it was formed of Corinthian brass, a material accounted very valuable, and was wrought with consummate skill. Others, as Wagenseil, Lund, Bengel, and Walch in his dissertation on this subject, contend that the gate here mentioned was the same with that elsewhere called Susan. Others, as Lightfoot and Bolten, think that it was a gate of the court of the Gentiles, called Chalda, from the Hebrew word for time. "One thing," says Dr Bloomfield, "seems certain, that by the gate named Beautiful is not to be understood a gate which led from the court of the women into that of the Israelites; for the context compels us to fix on a space inside of Mount Moriah, which was separated by a wall from the gate of the Gentiles. Besides, it is improbable that the Jews should have given a name of Greek origin to a gate of their temple. But whether the gate Beautiful was called Susan or Chalda cannot with certainty be determined, though the latter conjecture seems the more simple and probable."

BED. This article of furniture has not so much importance attached to it in the East as with us. "It is at best," as Dr Jamieson well describes it, "like a very small and narrow sofa, so light as to be easily carried, and by the occupier himself, from place to place and from room to room, according as the caprice of the owner or the change of the seasons may require. In general, however, it is nothing more than a mattress, which is spread in a moment on the floor, and which, when not used, is carelessly flung into a corner of the room. Morier saw the Persians, and Carne the people of Palestine, rising from their beds on the flat roofs of their houses, and after finishing their simple toilet, throwing their couches aside; and Captain Hall shows, by an interesting anecdote, that the same practice obtains in India. 'On the morning after my arrival at Bombay, I got up with the first blush of the dawn, and proceeded alone in quest of adventures. I had not gone far, before I saw a native sleeping on a mat, spread in the little verandah extending along the front of his house, which was made up of basket-work, plastered over with mud. He was wrapped up in a long web of white linen or cotton cloth. As soon as the first rays of the sun peeped into his rude sleeping chamber, he "arose, took up his bed, and went into his house." I saw immediately an explanation of this expression, which, with slight variations, occurs frequently in the Gospels."

BEDAN. This name occurs in 1 Sam. xii. 11, along with several others, namely Jerubbaal, Jephthah, and Samuel. This has led to considerable discussion as to the real position of Bedan. Nowhere is he mentioned as holding office in Israel; but the Targum, interpreting the name as meaning "in Dan," suppose him to be Samson who was of the tribe of Dan. The Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic, instead of Bedan read Barak. Some, with considerable probability, consider Bedan to be identical with Jair of Manasseh, who judged Israel twenty-three years; and in confirmation of this, it may be remarked, that in Chron. vii. 17, the name of Bedan is found among the descendants of Manasseh.

BEE, a well-known small industrious insect which abounded in the East, and hence Canaan is described as a land flowing with milk and honey. The bee is frequently mentioned in the Sacred Writings. Thus in Judg. xiv. 8, we are informed that Samson, on inspecting the carcass of a lion which he had some time previously killed, found that a swarm of bees had taken up their residence in it. We notice the circumstance, because it has been supposed to contradict the statement of Aristotle and other eminent naturalists, who affirm that bees will not alight upon a dead carcass, nor taste the flesh; that they will never sit down in an unclean place, nor upon anything which emits an unpleasant smell. The variance between this statement and that of the sacred writer is, however, only apparent. The frequently occurring phrase introduced into this text, "after a time," shows that the circumstance referred to was long posterior to the death of the animal, whose body, from an exposure to beasts and birds of prey, and the violent heat of the sun, was reduced to a mere skeleton, and divested of all effluvia. That bees have swarmed in dry bones, we have the testimony of Herodotus, of Seranus, and of Aldrovandus. Indeed, as bones in their nature, when dry, are exceedingly dry, there is no more to be said against such a place of residence, than against the same among rocks and stones.

Some writers have contended that bees are destitute of the sense of hearing; but their opinion is entirely without foundation. This will appear, if any proof were necessary, from the following prediction:—"And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost parts of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria." Isa. vii. 18. The allusion which this text involves, is to the practice of calling out the bees from their hives, by a hissing or whistling sound, to their labour in the fields, and summoning them again to return when the heavens begin to lower, or the shadows of evening to fall. In this manner, Jehovah threatens to arouse the enemies of Judah, and lead them to the prey. However widely scattered, or far remote from the scene of action, they should hear his voice, and with as much promptitude as the bee, that has been taught to recognise the signal of its owner, and obey his call, they should assemble their forces; and although weak and insignificant as a swarm of bees in the estimation of a proud and infatuated people, they should come with irresistible might, and take possession of the rich and beautiful region that had been abandoned by its terrified inhabitants.

The allusion of Moses to the attack of the Amorites, which involves a reference to the irritable and revengeful disposition of the bee, is both just and beautiful: "And the Amorites, which dwelt in that mountain, came out against you, and chased you, as bees do, and destroyed you in Seir, even unto Hormah." Deut. i. 44. Every person who has seen a swarm of disturbed bees, will easily conceive the fierce hostility and implacable fury of the enemies of Israel, which this expression is intended to denote. The same remarks will apply to Psal. xviii. 12, in which there is a similar allusion.

The surprising industry of the bee has, from the earliest times, furnished man with a delicious and useful article, in the honey which it produces.

This was very common in Palestine. In Exod. iii. 8, the circumstance of its flowing with milk and honey is selected as a striking proof of its being the glory of all lands; and in Deut. xxxii. 13, and Psal. lxxxi. 16, the inhabitants are said to have sucked honey out of the rocks, as the wild bees are well known in the East to form their comb in the crevices of the rocks, and in the hollows of decayed trees. With this agree 1 Sam. xiv. 25, 26; Matt. iii. 4, &c., and the testimony of intelligent travellers. Hasselquist says, that between Acra and Nazareth great numbers of wild bees breed, to the advantage of the inhabitants; and Maundrel observes, that when in the great plain near Jericho, he perceived in many places a smell of honey and wax, as strong as if he had been in an apiary.

It is reasonably supposed, however, that the honey mentioned in some of these passages was not the produce of bees, but a sweet syrup produced by the date tree, which was common in Palestine, and which is known to have furnished an article of this description. There is also in some parts of the East a kind of honey which collects upon the leaves of the trees, something like dew, and which is gathered by the inhabitants in considerable quantities. It is very sweet when fresh, but turns sour after being kept two days. The Arabs eat it with butter; they also put it into their gruel, and use it in rubbing their water-skins, for the purpose of excluding the air. It is collected in the months of May and June; and some persons assured our traveller that the same substance was likewise produced by the thorny tree Tereshresh, at the same time of the year.

Honey was prohibited as an offering on the altar, under the Levitical dispensation (Lev. ii. 11); but its first fruits were to be presented for the support of the priests. Some writers have supposed that these first fruits were of the honey of the date; but such an interpretation is forced and unnatural,—the articles intended in verse 12 are obviously the same as those which are specified in the preceding verse.

Honey newly taken out of the comb has a peculiar delicacy of flavour, which will in vain be sought for after it has been for any length of time expressed or clarified. This will help to explain the energy of expression adopted by the Psalmist, when speaking of the Divine laws: "More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb." Psal. xix. 10.

A fine lesson on the necessity of moderation is taught by Solomon: "Hast thou found honey? eat so much as is sufficient for thee, lest thou be filled therewith, and vomit it." Prov. xxv. 16. Upon this passage Harris has cited the following observations of Dr Knox:—"Man, indeed, may be called a bee in a figurative style. In search of sweets he roams in various regions, and ransacks every inviting flower. Whatever displays a beautiful appearance solicits his notice, and conciliates his favour, if not his affection. He is often deceived by the vivid colour and attractive form, which, instead of supplying honey, produce the rankest poison; but he perseveres in his researches, and if he is often disappointed, he is also often successful. The misfortune is, that when he has found honey, he enters upon the feast with an appetite so voracious, that he usually destroys his own delight by excess and satiety."

BEELZEBUB, or BELZEBUB, the idol or god of Ekron. In Scripture he is called the Prince of Devils. His name is usually rendered, lord of flies; which is by some understood to be a mock appellation given him by the Jews. Others think that this name is derived from his power of driving flies away. Scaliger translates the name lord of sacrifices. How, or under what form he was represented, is uncertain. Some place him on a throne and attire him like a king; others paint him as a fly. However this may be, it appears that he became an oracle of the highest repute for omniscience and veracity; that he had priests of his own; and that, in the middle times, at least, he was much sought after by those who were anxious about futurity. In the New Testament, as in Matt. x. 25, xii. 24, and other places, the word is properly Beelzebub, lord of dung, or of a dunghill. Lightfoot and Buxtorf, however, translate it lord of idolatry. The connection between the two names, Beelzebub and Beelzebub, is thus pointed out by the Rev. Mr Brodie of Monimail:—"The 'shardborn beetle,' as an English author graphically terms it, and almost every other species of fly, however beautiful their colours, or active their movements, are bred in corruption; and as in these instances the Creator brings life out of death, so does he bring immortality out of the tomb. And as the worm which, in the earlier stages of its being, draws a loathsome length along, and finds its nourishment in decaying vegetables and putrefying flesh, when the season of its change has come, casts off the slough of its infancy, and mounts on wings of delight, to bask in the sunshine, and sip the fragrance of the flowers; so, from the dissolution of the body does the spirit of man arise to a new and better state,—the mortal puts on immortality, and the grovelling pursuits of earth are exchanged for the glories of heaven. The Egyptian Lord of Amenthes, with a beetle for his symbol; the Grecian Jupiter Apomuos, with a fly in the field of his medal; and the Ekronite Beelzebub, were one and the same. They are but different names for the Lord of the Grave, the Ruler of Spirits Departed."

"This examination into the meaning and origin of the name Beelzebub, points out the reason why the King of Israel sent to inquire at his shrine if he should recover of his disease; for who could be supposed by a heathenish mind so able to answer his question as the Lord of the Dead? It shows, too, the propriety of its application as a title of Satan, of whom the apostle speaks as 'him that had the power of death, that is, the devil.' Heb. ii. 14. And it explains the change made on the name by the Jews, in the time of our Saviour, who did not call him Beelzebub, or lord of the fly, because they did not acknowledge his dominion over the departed spirit; but who termed him Beelzebul, or lord of corruption, because death was his work, and he had power over the mortal and putrefying remains."

BEER (a well), and in the plural BEEROTH (wells), are words which frequently occur in the Sacred Scriptures, as names of places. BEER, of itself, without being conjoined with any other name, occurs in Numb. xxi. 16-18, and is supposed to be the same with BEER-ELIM (well of firs), mentioned in Isa. xv. 8. It is situated three hours' journey from Jerusalem, on the way to Shechem, and derives its name from a well or spring, at the bottom of the hill on which the village is built. The place is thus noticed by Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne:—"In two hours from Ramah, we reached Beer, the ancient Beeroth. Our servants had gone before us and erected the tent, and now stood at the tent door to welcome us,—Giuseppe helping us to alight with great kindness. It was a fine moonlight evening; the ground was sparkling with the light of the glow-worm, in a manner similar to what we had seen at Hebron, and the fire-flies glittered through the air in great numbers. Our tent was pitched immediately in front of a gushing fountain that emptied its waters into a large trough, above which was a Mohanmedan place of prayer falling into decay. We lay down to rest, with the remembrance that it was here that Jotham took up his abode when he fled from Shechem for fear of his brother Abimelech. Judg. ix. 21. There is a pleasing though fanciful tradition associated with the place, that it was here Joseph and Mary, on their way back to Nazareth, first discovered that the child Jesus was not in their company, and turned back again to Jerusalem seeking him. Luke ii. 44. It was probably near this, too, that Deborah the prophetess 'dwelt under the palm tree of Deborah, between Ramah and Bethel, in Mount Ephraim.' Judg. iv. 5. We were up before the sun, and enjoyed the luxury of washing ourselves at the full flowing fountain of Beer. It is from this fountain that the town receives its name, both now and in ancient times. The Moslem women came out to draw water, and the well soon presented a lively scene. The remains of the town lie on the rising ground to the north-east of the fountain. We wondered how travellers could ever suppose this to be the side of Michmash; for it does not stand near any deep defile, nor are there any such sharp rocks as Bozez and Seneh in the neighbourhood (1 Sam. xiv. 4); besides, it is not on the east of Beth-aven or Bethel, but to the south-west of it. 1 Sam. xiii. 5. Beeroth was one of the cities that belonged to the Gibeonites, and afterwards fell to the lot of Benjamin. Josh. ix. 17; xviii. 25. It was to this place, also, that the murderers of Ishbosheth originally belonged. 2 Sam. iv. 2."

BEER-LAHAI-ROI (the well of life of vision,—meaning, probably, of life after the vision of God), the name of a well on the southern borders of Palestine. Gesenius says, "Neglecting the vowels, one might also conjecture it to be well of the jaw-bone (or rock) of vision; that is, well of the conspicuous rock; or also, well of the far-seen region." It was here that the angel of God appeared to Hagar. Gen. xvi. 14.

BEEROTH. See BEER.

BEER-SHEBA (the well of the oath), a place on the southern frontier of Palestine, where Abraham made an alliance with Abimelech, king of Gerar. Gen. xxi. 32. The Plain of Beer-sheba was exceedingly fertile, and is often mentioned in the history of the patriarchs. Here Isaac pitched his tent, and he "builted an altar, and called upon the name of the Lord." Lord Lindsay, in his 'Travels in Palestine,' says that he could hear nothing of Beer-sheba; but Professor Robinson was so fortunate as to discover the remains of the ancient town of Beer-sheba still bearing the Arabic name of Bir Seba. Near the water-course of the plain are two circular wells of excellent water, surrounded by drinking-troughs of stone, such as the patriarchs might have used for watering their flocks. On the north of the wells are low hills strewed over with the ruins of former habitations, extending over a space half a mile long by a quarter of a mile broad. "Here, then," says Dr Robinson, "is the place where Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob often lived! Here Samuel made his sons judges; and from here Elijah wandered out into the southern desert and sat down under the rethem or shrub of broom, just as our Arabs sat down under it every day and every night."

BEEBLE, a word occurring only in Lev. xi. 22. A winged and edible locust. Goliuz explains the corresponding word in Arabic as a locust without wings. The Egyptians paid a superstitious worship to the beetle; and it is probable that this destructive beetle was that very kind of scarabæus which the Egyptians worshipped. There is at present in the British Museum a colossal figure of the Scarabæus sacer. Besides being worshipped as a divinity, stones cut into the form of the beetle served as talismans among the Egyptians. The Gnostics, among other Egyptian superstitions, adopted this notion regarding the beetle.

BEEVES. This word signifies oxen, black cattle, or horned cattle. Leviticus xxii. 19-21. See HEIFER.

BEFORE THE LORD. To be before God, is to enjoy his favour, and the smiles of his providence. Psal. xxxi. 22. To come before him, is to come to his temple and ordinances, and worship him, and have familiar fellowship with him. Psal. c. 2, lxxv. 4, xlii. 2. To walk before him, is to behave as under his eye, depending on his strength, and aiming at his glory as our chief end. Gen. xvii. 1. To sin before him, is to do it in his view, and with a bold and open contempt of him. Gen. xiii. 13. To have other gods before him, is to have them in his sight, and in opposition to him. Exod. xx. 3. To set the Lord before us, is to make him the object of our trust, the pattern of our conduct; and to intend his glory, and consider him as our witness and judge in all we do.

BEGGARS. See ALMS.

BEGINNING, denotes,—1. The first part of time in general. Gen. i. 1. 2. The first part of a particular period; as of the year,—of the duration of the state or kingdom of the Hebrews. Exod. xii. 2; Isa. i. 26. 3. The first actor, or the cause of a thing. Mic. i. 13. 4. That which is most excellent. Prov. i. 7, ix. 10. From the beginning is,—1. From eternity, ere any creature was made. 2 Thess. ii. 13; Prov. viii. 23. 2. From the very first part of time. 1 John iii. 8. 3. From the beginning of a particular period; as of Christ's public ministry. John viii. 25. Christ is called the beginning, and the beginning of the creation of God; he is from eternity, and gave being to time and every creature. Rev. i. 8, iii. 14; Col. i. 18.

BEHEADING, a capital punishment, in which the head is severed from the body. This mode of death is accomplished in this country by the axe, in Germany by the sword, and in France by the guillotine,—which last corresponds to an instrument formerly used in Scotland, called the maiden. Beheading seems to have been in use before the time of Moses. It existed in Egypt from a very early period (Gen. xl. 19), and it is well known to have been inflicted under the princes of the Herodian family. Thus John the Baptist (Matt. xiv. 8–12) was beheaded by one of Herod's officers, who was despatched to his prison for that purpose. Mark vi. 27.

BEHEMOTH. The animal denoted by this appellation in the Book of Job, has been variously determined by learned men; some of whom, especially the early Christian writers and the Jewish Rabbins, have indulged in sufficiently extravagant notions. To detail these would be useless, and we shall, therefore, pass them over in silence.

Gesenius understands the animal referred to as, in all probability, the hippopotamus or river-horse; and supposes it likely, that under the term behemoth there lies concealed some Egyptian name for the hippopotamus, so modified as to put on the appearance of a Semitic word. Bythner and Reiske, followed by Professor Lee of Cambridge, regard it as simply a plural noun for beasts in general. No doubt, it is to be so understood in various passages. Thus, Psal. l. 10: "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle (behemoth) upon a thousand hills." And again, in Job xxxv. 11: "Who teacheth us more than the beasts (behemoth) of the earth." Critics generally, however, regard it as the name of a quadruped, and they are divided in opinion between the hippopotamus and the elephant. Among those maintaining the former opinion, are Bochart, Seheulzer, Shaw, Calmet, Ludolph, and Herder. Among the advocates for the latter, are Schultens, Scott, Michaelis, and others. The description of the behemoth, in Job xl. 15, to the end, is highly poetical and sublime: "Behold now behemoth, which I made with thee; he eateth grass as an ox. Lo now, his strength is in his loins, and his force is in the navel of his belly. He moveth his tail like a cedar: the sinews of his stones are wrapped together. His bones are as strong pieces of brass; his bones are like bars of iron. He is the chief of the ways of God: he that made him can make his sword to approach unto him. Surely the mountains bring him forth food, where all the beasts of the field play. He lieth under the shady trees, in the covert of the reed, and fens. The shady trees cover him with their shadow; the willows of the brook compass him about. Behold, he drinketh up a river, and hasteth not: he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth. He taketh it with his eyes: his nose pierceth through snares." There is one expression in this description, "he eateth grass like an ox," which can scarcely be considered as applying to the river-horse, that animal never being regarded as graminivorous.

The late editor of Calmet, whose extensive learning and indefatigable industry will always entitle him to respectful attention, notwithstanding his love of fanciful conjecture, has well remarked,—“That the author of the Book of Job has evidently taken great pains in delineating highly finished and poetical pictures of two remarkable animals,—behemoth and leviathan. These he reserves to close his descriptions of animated nature, and with these he terminates the climax of that discourse which he puts into the mouth of the Almighty. He even interrupts that discourse, and separates, as it were, by that interruption, these surprising creatures from those which he had described before; and he descends on them in a manner which demonstrates the poetic animation with which he wrote. The leviathan is described at a still greater length than the behemoth; and the two evidently appear to be presented as companions,—to be reserved as fellows and associates.” Mr Taylor then proceeds to inquire what were the creatures most likely to be companionized and associated in early ages, and in countries bordering on Egypt, where the scene of this poem is placed; and from the ‘Antiquities of Herculaneum,’ the ‘Prænestine Pavement,’ and the famous ‘Statue of the Nile,’ he shows these to have been the crocodile,—now generally admitted to be the leviathan, and the hippopotamus or river-horse.

“After these authorities,” he remarks, “I think we may without hesitation conclude, that this association was not rare or uncommon, but that it really was the customary manner of thinking, and, consequently, of speaking, in ancient times, and in the countries where these creatures were native; we may add, that being well known in Egypt, and being, in some degree, popular objects of Egyptian pride, distinguishing natives of that country, for their magnitude and character, they could not escape the notice of any curious naturalist, or writer on natural history; so that to suppose they were omitted in this part of the Book of Job, would be to suppose a blemish in the book, implying a deficiency in the author; and if they are inserted, the description clearly answers to the hippopotamus.”

Aristotle represents the hippopotamus to be of the size of an ass; Herodotus affirms that in stature he is equal to the largest ox; Diodorus makes his height not less than five cubits, or above seven feet and a half; and Tatius calls him, on account of his prodigious strength, the Egyptian elephant. Captain Beaver thus describes one which he met with in Western Africa: “The animal was not swimming, but standing in the channel, in, I suppose, about five feet water; the body immersed, and the head just above it. It looked steadfastly at the boat till we were within about twenty yards of it, when I lodged a ball half way between its eyes and nostrils; it immediately tumbled down, but instantly rose again, snorted, and walked into shallower water, where I had an opportunity of seeing its whole body, and then discovered that it was an hippopotamus. It afterwards advanced a little towards the boat, then towards the shore, and turned entirely round once or twice, as if at a loss what to do, plunging violently the whole time. At last, it walked into deeper water, and then dived; we watched its rising, and then pursued it; and this we did for nearly three hours, when at length it landed on a narrow neck of sand, and walked over it into fifteen or sixteen fathoms of water. We then gave up the pursuit, having never been able to get a second shot at it. The longest time it was under water during the pursuit was twenty minutes; but immediately after being wounded it rose every three or four minutes. Its body appeared to be somewhat larger than that of the largest buffalo, with shorter but much thicker legs; a head much resembling a horse's, but longer; large, projecting eyes; open and wide distended nostrils; short, erect ears, like a cropped horse when it pricks them up, or those of a well-cropped terrier. I perceived nothing like a mane, and the skin appeared to be without hair; but of this I am not certain, for being totally ignorant whether the animal was ferocious or not, immediately after I fired we rowed from it, expecting it would attack us."

In Job xl. 17, 18, the sacred writer conveys a striking idea of the bulk, vigour, and strength of the behemoth:—

"He moveth his tail like a cedar:
The sinews of his thighs are interwoven together.
His ribs are as strong pieces of copper;
His back bone like bars of iron."

The idea of his prodigious might is increased by the account given of his bones, which are compared to strong pieces of brass, and bars of iron. Such figures are commonly employed by the sacred writers to express great hardness and strength; of which a striking example occurs in the Prophecy of Micah (iv. 13): "Arise and thrash, O daughter of Zion; for I will make thy horn iron, and I will make thy hoofs brass; and thou shalt beat in pieces many people,"—so hard and strong are the bones of the behemoth.

"He is chief of the works of God.
He that made him has fixed his weapon."

Here he is described as one of the noblest animals which the Almighty Creator has produced. The male hippopotamus which Zernighi brought from the Nile to Italy, was sixteen feet nine inches long, from the extremity of the muzzle to the origin of the tail; fifteen feet in circumference; and six feet and a half high; and the legs were about two feet ten inches long. The head was three feet and a half in length, and eight feet and a half in circumference. The opening of the mouth was two feet four inches, and the largest teeth were more than a foot long.

Thus his prodigious strength; his impenetrable skin; and vast opening of his mouth, and his portentous voracity; the whiteness and hardness of his teeth; his manner of life, spent with equal ease in the sea, on the land, or at the bottom of the Nile,—equally claim our admiration, and entitle him, says Paxton, to be considered as the chief of the ways of God. Nor is he less remarkable for his sagacity; of which two instances are recorded by Pliny and Solinus. After he has gorged himself with corn, and begins to return with a distended belly to the deep, with averted steps he traces a great many paths, lest his pursuers, following the lines of one plain track, should overtake and destroy him while he is unable to resist. The second instance is not less remarkable: when he has become fat with too much indulgence, he reduces his obesity by copious bleedings. For this purpose he searches for newly cut reeds, or sharp-pointed rocks, and rubs himself against them till he makes a sufficient aperture for the blood to flow. To promote the discharge, it is said, he agitates his body; and when he thinks he has lost a sufficient quantity, he closes the wound, by rolling himself in the mud.

The remains of such gigantic animals as Job seems to describe under the appellation of behemoth, have been found in great abundance in various parts of the world. In general it would appear that the animals of the ancient world were much larger than those of the existing species which correspond to them. The most striking example of this, which there has been an opportunity of observing, is that of the fossil bones of the sloths, which were found, some years ago, in America, in some of the uppermost strata. The family of the sloths is so remarkable, among those of other animals, that it may be well to notice one of the peculiarities which it presents. Its name arises from the slowness of the animals which compose it, and which are, indisputably, the most miserable of known living beings. The disproportionate dimensions of their anterior members, which are at least twice as long as their hind-legs; the conformation of their pelvis, which does not allow them to throw their knees forward; the disadvantageous manner of the articulation of their feet with their legs, which causes them to spin round as a weathercock upon its pivot—all contribute to impede their progressive motion. Accordingly, they can only drag themselves painfully along upon their elbows, and so slowly, that some travellers assure us they can only make fifty steps in a day. They have neither incisors, nor canine teeth, and subsist only on leaves and fruits, without the power of attack or defence. They stand out as differing from all the animals with which we are conversant. "We find in them," says M. Cuvier, "so few relations with ordinary animals; the general laws of existing organizations apply so little to them; the different parts of their body seem in such contradiction to all the rules of coexistence which we find established throughout the animal kingdom, that we might really believe them to be the remnant of another order of things; the living relics of that nature, for the other ruins of which we are obliged to seek in the bowels of the earth; and that they have escaped, by some miracle, from the catastrophes which destroyed their contemporary species." "Some remarkable peculiarities," says Dr King of Glasgow, in his valuable work entitled 'Geology and Religion,' "of the skeleton of the sloth are found in the megatherium, but with such modifications in the shortening and lengthening of the legs, and the addition of a powerful tail, as to show very considerable difference of habits, along with essential and important resemblance. Its length was about nineteen feet, its breadth across the loins nearly six feet, its height not exceeding nine feet. The trunk of its enormous body was terminated by a pelvis, and hind extremities nearly three times as large as those of the most gigantic elephant. Its food consisted of the roots or of the softer portions of trees; and it was so formed that it might rest its hideous weight securely on the hinder legs and tail, while its fore-legs were freely and powerfully exerted in uprooting trees, or in wrenching off their branches and stripping them of their edible parts. The posterior portion of the skeleton, comprising the lumbar vertebræ, the bones of the pelvis, the tail, and the hinder extremities, exhibit a succession of contrivances suited to bear up against extraordinary bulk and ponderousness. Professor Ansted shows that the anterior portions of the animal are not less in keeping with its nature, and that its organs collectively form a perfect system. Here, then, is a fossil animal, which at first view appears clumsy as well as colossal. If we mistake its calling, and judge of its configuration by uses which it was not intended to fulfil, then we shall be tempted to pronounce its proportions ungraceful and cumbrous. It has no provisions for speed. But what need could it have for rapid locomotion? It required not to pursue after prey, for it was graminivorous. And wanting the feebleness, it required not the swiftness of the roe to escape from predatory enemies; for a stamp of its foot or a stroke of its tail would have pounded into jelly the carcass of a lion, had such a foe then lived, and would have extinguished in a moment the vitality and sovereignty of the king of beasts. But understand that this quadruped of mountain-like dimensions subsisted on the roots and other parts of trees, and needed a support which its weight would not crush when its fore-legs should be engaged in procuring its subsistence, and then we have conditions in its frame harmonising with its destination; and legs, and feet, and ribs, and tail, and claws, and teeth, and all the constituents of its anatomical structure accord with the place assigned it in the range of being. It was devoid of means which some animals, depending on the same kind of sustenance, have for bringing it within their reach. It could not burrow in the ground as the tucotuco, a rodent animal described by Darwin, does to exhume roots, and it wanted the long neck of the giraffe to reach elevated foliage. But it had ample compensation for the absence of these facilities in its simple strength. It might eye with the desire of hope the sturdiest constituent of the forest. When it had poised itself on its hinder legs and columnar tail, thus giving to its enormous weight a pyramidal base, and having clasped with its fore-legs the stately trunk, securely swung itself from side to side—the firmest racine attachments would be loosened by such oscillations—the strongest stems would bend hither and thither under this immense and shifting pressure; till the agitated tree, though it were a monarch of the forest, would be laid prostrate, and its deepest roots and most aspiring branches would become equally the spoil of the monster assailant.”

That the behemoth of Job corresponds to one of those animals which are now extinct, seems almost certain from the description which the sacred writer gives. True, in some respects, the language of the Arabian patriarch recalls to us the hippopotamus or river horse (hippopotamus amphibius), which no doubt might be found in the rivers of Idumea, as it is still found in the rivers of Africa. It is a strictly herbivorous animal; but the strong language in which its size and strength are indicated, seem to point rather to a gigantic monster of kindred species, it might be, but still far larger and more powerful than any existing hippopotamus had ever been found to be. We rather incline, with Dr Clarke, and some other commentators, to seek for the actual type of the behemoth of Job in one of those gigantic fossils of which we have just been speaking. The late Professor Lee of Cambridge argues at great length against the behemoth as indicating any particular animal, but, founding on the plural form of the word as denoting “beasts” in general, he considers Job’s description as applicable to a whole class of animals. Harris, in the first edition of his ‘Natural History of the Bible,’ argued strongly in favour of the elephant as being the behemoth of Job; but on farther examination he adopts the opinion of Bochart, which is all but universally adopted, that it was not the elephant but the hippopotamus. On a careful review, however, of the whole subject, we regard the behemoth as having been probably a monstrous herbivorous animal, which in its actual type no longer exists upon the earth.

BEHOLD, a call for particular attention. It imports sudden excitement, wonder, joy, certainty, momentousness. Isa. vii. 14; John i. 29; Matt. xxi. 5; Rev. xvi. 15; Luke xxiv. 39. To behold, is,—1. To look on; see Gen. xxxi. 51. 2. To consider, know, care for. Lam. i. 12; John xix. 5, 26, 27. God beheld not iniquity in Jacob, nor perverseness in Israel; though his omniscient eye discerns sin in his people on earth, he observes it not as an enemy, wrathfully to punish them for it. But the word may be rendered, He hath not beheld injury against Jacob, nor vexation against Israel; that is, he will not suffer them to be hurt. Numb. xxiii. 21. To behold Christ, is with wonder and attention to know, believe in, and receive him. Isa. lxxv. 1.

BEHOVE, to be necessary, just, and becoming. As it became God, for the honour of his nature, counsels, word, and work, to expose Christ to suffering; so it behoved Christ to suffer, and be in all things like unto his brethren of mankind, that he might display his Father’s perfections, fulfil his purposes, promises, and types, destroy the works of the devil, and sympathize with, and serve us. Heb. ii. 10, 17.

BEKAH, half a shekel. Exod. xxxviii. 26.

BEL. See BAAL.

BEL AND THE DRAGON, HISTORY OF. This history was always rejected by the Jewish church; it is not extant either in the Hebrew or the Chaldean language. Jerome gives it no better title than that of the fable of Bel and the Dragon; nor has it obtained more credit with posterity, except with the divines of the Council of Trent, who determined it to be a part of the Canonical Scriptures. The design of this fiction is to render idolatry ridiculous, and to exalt the true God; but the author has destroyed the illusion of his fiction by transporting to Babylon the worship of animals, which was never practised in that country. This book forms the fourteenth chapter of Daniel in the Latin Vulgate; in the Greek it was called the prophecy of Habakkuk, the son of Jesus, of the tribe of Levi: but this is evidently false, for that prophet lived before the time of Nebuchadnezzar, and the events pretended to have taken place in this fable are assigned to the time of Cyrus. There are two Greek texts of this fragment, that of the Septuagint, and that found in Theodotian’s Greek version of Daniel. The former is the most ancient, and has been translated into Syriac. The Latin and Arabic versions, together with another Syriac translation, have been made from the text of Theodotian. Selden thinks this little history ought rather to be considered as a sacred poem than a true narrative.

BELIAL, a term applied to a vile person. Accordingly the phrase, “Sons of Belial,” signifies persons of a wicked, abandoned character. In one passage in 2 Cor. vi. 15, it is used as a name of Satan, “What concord hath Christ with Belial?”

BELIE, to give one the lie. To belie the Lord, is falsely to ascribe our prosperity or distress to some other principal cause rather than God. Jer. v. 12; Prov. xxx. 9.

BELIEF. The great design for which evidence is brought forward, and arguments adduced, is to produce conviction in the minds of those to whom they are addressed. When the evidence is sufficiently strong, we are said to believe,—when it is less strong, we doubt,—when weak and inefficient, we deny. Belief, then, in all its degrees and modifications, depends upon the strength of the evidence, which, as we know, is not merely different in kind, but varies also in the degree of force with which it operates upon the mind.

In the original structure of our mental constitution, a firm foundation has been laid for the perception of truth. We set out in our intellectual career with believing, and that, too, on the strongest of all evidence, as far as we are concerned,—the evidence of consciousness. Dr Reid, in his 'Inquiry into the Human Mind,' seems to think that we have been endowed with two original principles,—a principle of veracity and a principle of credulity; both of which he regards as original instincts. The first of these is a propensity to speak, and to use the signs of language, so as to convey our real sentiments. "When I reflect upon my actions most attentively," says Dr Reid, "I am not conscious that, in speaking truth, I am influenced, on ordinary occasions, by any motive, moral or political. I find that truth is always at the door of my lips, and goes forth spontaneously, if not held back. It requires neither good nor bad intention to bring it forth, but only that I be artless and undesigning. There may, indeed, be temptations to falsehood which would be too strong for the natural principle of veracity, unaided by principles of honour and virtue; but where there is no such temptation, we speak truth by instinct."

That there is such an original tendency both to speak the truth and to believe, we readily admit; and it is the possession of such a principle which fits us for appreciating evidence and feeling the force of argument. If by the word instinct be meant an original principle of our nature, we are not disposed to object to the use of the expression by Dr Reid, in speaking of our tendency to believe; but there seems no necessity for the assertion of two original principles, the one leading us to speak, and the other to believe, the truth. It is enough, surely, that we set out at first with a tendency to believe dogmatically and firmly, and are thus far unacquainted with doubt or error. If such be the original frame-work of our intellectual constitution, truth will ever, while we retain our nature, be our native element; and, therefore, always more familiar to us than falsehood. There may be temptations to forget this characteristic element of nature, and to transgress the boundary of truth; but, in doing so we are violating the original law of our mental structure, and the moment that the unnatural pressure is removed, the mind will return to its former tendency to speak truth rather than falsehood.

Thus formed, we are prepared to believe, in the first instance, every thing indiscriminately; but, when reluctantly compelled to admit the existence of falsehood, we do not, because we cannot, part with the original tendency to believe. Hesitation and doubt are introduced, not so, however, as to destroy our nature; but still retaining our partiality for the truth, we come precisely into that situation which is the best fitted for balancing probabilities and weighing the evidence for and against any statement which is presented to us. We still incline decidedly towards the truth, and yet we are aware of the existence of falsehood; and to some extent, therefore, guarded against it. There is no necessity, however, for an original principle of credulity in opposition to that of veracity. It is sufficient that truth is the rule, falsehood the exception; and if the inclination preponderates in favour of the rule, we require no more than a simple knowledge that there are exceptions.

Thus it is that man hath been provided by his Creator with a standard, by means of which he may judge of the truth and reality of things. And while, therefore, we define belief to be the agreement or disagreement of objects and qualities with this real state of things, it must be borne in mind that the primary laws of consciousness, the ultimate conditions of thought, are the means according to which this agreement or disagreement is ascertained. The standard of truth lies deep in the constitution of man, and if he fails to judge rightly in reference to any statement, the error is to be found, not in the standard, but in a perverse misapplication of the standard.

And herein lies the difference in the opinions of men. They are each of them provided with an unerring standard, in so far as they are concerned. They do not, because they cannot, disbelieve the primary laws of thought or self-consciousness; but in the application of these, they commence a system of error, and therefore of doubt, leading at length to disbelief. The original belief is certain, because the standard is certain on which it is grounded; and could all other facts and events be brought back to the same standard, the judgment, as to their truth or falsehood, would, as far as we are concerned, be unerring. Now the great design for which, in every case of doubt or disputation, evidence and arguments of every kind are adduced, is, that the appeal may be carried through a variety of different steps to this, the highest, the purest, the most certain of all earthly tribunals,—the reason, not of an individual man, but of humanity. This is the common platform on which men of all characters, of all sects, of all opinions, may meet in cordial agreement. The principles are the common property of the race in general,—they are the conditions in virtue of which they assert their position in the world as rational and intelligent creatures. Without such common principles all evidence would be powerless,—all argument unavailing. Without an original standard of truth in his own breast, this world would have become a scene of universal scepticism; nay, rather, for such a state of things is impossible, there would have been no ground for either belief or doubt, affirmation or denial. Much has been said by moralists of the weakness, and imperfection, and uncertainty of human reason. We have been treated to many a pathetic lamentation on the subject, until we have been almost tempted to think, that surely error must be the rule, and truth the exception. Little do such well-meaning persons imagine that, in thus attempting to depreciate the reason of man with the view of exalting faith, they are playing most effectually into the hand of the sceptic. Is not the conclusion plain, that if man be thus doomed by the necessity of his nature to err, no possible means, short of the reconstruction of the human being, could ever bring him round to a recognition of the truth? The reason of man is fundamentally pure; but in the employment which each man makes of his reason, lies the constant tendency to err. The reason of individuals, then, is weak and imperfect; the reason of humanity dogmatically and indubitably certain. And to this, the fundamental, the essential reason of the human being, all reasoning is designed to appeal, whether addressed to us by our fellow-men, or by a revelation from heaven; it is here that the hope of our restoration and recovery lies. Man hath not lost the reason with which he was originally endowed; it is still, as far as we can know, in its essential elements the same. But beyond these elements, which form the foundation of truth, all is doubt and uncertainty. Hence so familiar are we with error, that we are in the utmost danger of falling into the delusion to which we have referred,—of regarding our minds as destitute of all tendency to truth, in preference to error. Such a tendency there must be, if reasoning could ever be effectual.

Each man proceeds, in all his intercourse with his fellow-man, on the presumption that they are fundamentally agreed; and hence, whenever any difference of opinion exists, he enters readily into argument with him, in the firm persuasion that it is possible for them, however widely separated in sentiment, to come once more into harmony and peace. They have a series of principles which none of them can possibly controvert, and on the faith of this common understanding the argument is entered upon and conducted on both sides. And to what does this keen, and, it may be, long protracted argument tend? To show that to this common standard the point in dispute may ultimately be referred. The exhibition of this agreement may require much careful and acute analysis,—it may demand an evolution of truths in a very lengthened series; but still to this issue it must come at last, that it either agrees or disagrees with the first elements of reason, the only standard of truth which man possesses. If it agrees, it is proved to be true; but if it disagrees, it is proved to be false.

In this article we have limited our investigations to the nature and origin of belief, viewed as an abstract principle of the human mind. There is a view of belief as a moral principle directed to spiritual and divine things, which is of paramount importance in a theological aspect. This, however, more properly falls to be considered under the article FAITH (which see).

BELIEVERS, an appellation given, toward the close of the first century, to those Christians who had been admitted into the Church by baptism, and instructed in all the mysteries of religion. They were thus called in contradistinction to the catechumens who had not been baptized, and were debarred from those privileges. Among us, it is often used synonymously with Christian. See CHRISTIAN.

BELLS appear, in the days of Isaiah, to have formed a part of dress among Hebrew women. Thus: "In that day the Lord shall take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet." Isa. iii. 18. The allusion is probably to those anklets or rings, worn round the ankles by young ladies in various Eastern countries, and to which are attached a number of little bells which are kept ringing by every motion of the feet. Among the Greeks, also, it was customary to put bells about the necks and the legs of their horses. Bells were used in the East to ornament the robes of kings, that their tinkling might give notice of the approach of the royal wearer.

It was enjoined upon the high priest among the Jews that the lower hem of his robe should be adorned with pomegranates and gold bells. In course of time the Jews entertained superstitious notions in reference to those ornaments; so that, Josephus says, while the pomegranates signified lightening, the bells denoted thunder. Bells as a symbol of victory were attached to the trappings of war-horses in ancient times; and hence, Zech. xiv. 20, speaking of the change which should take place when the kingdom of God should come, says, "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD; and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar." The most superstitious notions have been entertained in regard to bells in all European countries, even in England, more particularly before the Reformation.

It is almost incredible—so much had the notion of the sanctity of bells prevailed—that the ordinance of baptism was profanely applied to their consecration, by washing them inside and out with water set apart, in the name of the holy Trinity; the bishop adding holy oil, crosses, and exorcisms,—the then usual forms of baptism; and, withal, appointing godfathers and godmothers, who, as they held the ropes, gave them their names—usually of some saint,—and engaged to answer on their behalf such questions as the bishop might ask the said bells; and besides all this, the bishop, whilst he anointed them, that is, the bells, "prayed God to give his Holy Spirit to them; that they might become sanctified for the expelling of all the power, snares, and illusions of the devil, for the souls of the dead; and especially for the chasing away of storms, thunder, and tempests." The ritual for these ceremonies is contained in the Roman pontifical.

Bells were not, probably, used in churches till the fifth century at latest. The first application of them to this purpose is ascribed by Polydore Virgil and others to Paulinus, bishop of Nola, a city of Campania, about A.D. 400. In Britain bells were applied to church purposes before the close of the seventh century, in the monastic societies of Northumbria, and as early as the sixth, even in those of Caledonia. They were, therefore, used from the first erection of parish churches. Instead of employing bells for convening their assemblies, the Oriental Christians resorted to other methods, such as despatching messengers to announce the time and place of meeting, by sounding the tuba or trumpet,—a kind of wind instrument used for signals,—or by the use of wooden, and sometimes iron rattles.

BELLOWS, a well-known wind instrument, so constructed as to inspire and expire the air by turns, by enlarging and contracting its capacity. The word occurs only in Jer. vi. 29: "The bellows are burned, the lead is consumed of the fire; the founder melteth in vain: for the wicked are not plucked away." The use of this instrument is probably of great antiquity, and, accordingly, it is found on the ancient Egyptian monuments. Anacharsis the Seythian is reputed to be the inventor of bellows.

BELLY is used in Scripture for appetite. Phil. iii. 19; Rom. xvi. 18. Also for the heart, or the secret springs of the mind. Prov. xx. 27, 30, xxii. 18; John vii. 38. The "belly of hell" is a strong phrase to express Jonah's dreadful condition in the deep. Jonah ii. 2; Eccles. iv. 5.

BELOVED, much valued, desired, and delighted in. Deut. xxi. 15. Christ is the beloved of God; God infinitely esteems, loves, and delights in him.

BELSHAZZAR, called by profane historians Nabonnedus or Labynetus, was the last king of Babylon, and grandson of Nebuchadnezzar. Very little information is afforded us in Scripture concerning him. He is described by Xenophon as having been a wicked and cruel prince; and Scripture records the crowning act of his wickedness—an impious and sacrilegious profanation of the vessels of the Temple at Jerusalem. These vessels he caused to be produced at a banquet which he made for the chief men of his kingdom. While engaged at this feast, Belshazzar was warned, by a miraculous handwriting on the wall, that his doom was at hand. That very night the city was taken by surprise, Belshazzar put to death, and the kingdom transferred to Darius the Mede, B.C. 538. The account of the last melancholy scene in the history of this wicked man, as given in Dan. v., is full of painful interest, and well fitted to impress the mind with the conviction that "verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth." Isaiah describes Belshazzar as "a fiery flying serpent," xiv. 4-29; and this character is fully borne out by his history, as related by profane authors.

BELTESHAZZAR, the Chaldaic name given to Daniel at the court of Nebuchadnezzar. Dan. i. 7.

BELUS, the name of an idol; the same with Baal. (See BAAL.) Belus also occurs in profane history, as corresponding to the Eth-baal of Scripture. (See ETH-BAAL.) The name also of a river—now the Kardanah—which takes its rise among the mountains of Galilee, and after flowing in a south-westerly direction through the Plain of Acre, enters the Mediterranean at Akka. It is a small, apparently insignificant, stream; but it was on the banks of the Belus that, as Pliny informs us, the art of making glass was first discovered. The water of this river is of a blood-red colour, occasioned by a red earth, which, after rain, is washed down from the neighbouring heights. The Belus is supposed to be the same with the Sihor or Shihor-libnath, mentioned in Josh. xix. 26.

BELZEBUB. See BEELZEBUB.

BENAIAH, son of Jehoiada, captain of David's guard.

BENEDICTINE FATHERS, celebrated editions of the writings of the Fathers, edited by some of the most learned of the Benedictine monks in France.

BENEDICTINES, an order of monks who followed the rules of Benedict of Nursia, from whom they derived their name. This celebrated monk lived in a monastery on Monte Cassino, in A.D. 529. In the twelfth century the order had increased to such an extent, that it contained two thousand monasteries. The rules of the order were very strict. They were obliged to perform their devotions seven times in twenty-four hours. They were obliged to go always two and two together. Every day in Lent they fasted till six in the evening, and abated of their usual time in sleeping and eating. Every monk had two coats, two cowls, a table-book, a knife, a needle, and a handkerchief; and the furniture of his bed was a mat, a blanket, a rug, and a pillow. The monasteries of the Benedictines were valuable during the dark ages in maintaining and advancing literature and science. They are still found in the Popish countries of the Continent. The Benedictines are called in the canon law Black Friars, from the colour of their dress. They wear a loose black gown, with large wide sleeves, and a capuche or cowl on their heads, ending in a point behind.

BENEDICTION, in a general sense, the act of blessing, or giving praise to God, or returning thanks for his favours. The Jews, it is said, are obliged to rehearse a hundred benedictions every day, of which eighty are to be spoken in the morning. It was usual to give a benediction to travellers on their taking leave; a practice which is still preserved among the monks. Benedictions were likewise given among the ancient Jews, as well as Christians, by imposition of hands; and when, at length, the primitive simplicity of the Christian worship began to give way to ceremony, they added the sign of the cross,—which was made with the same hand as before, only elevated or extended. Hence benediction in the modern Romish Church (benedictio sacerdotalis) is used, in a more particular manner, to denote the sign of the cross made by a bishop or prelate, as conferring some grace on the people.

There are three great occasions on which the Pope goes through the ceremony of blessing the people, or pronouncing a benediction upon them. These are, Maunday Thursday, Easter and Ascension days. It is also customary for the Romish priests to pronounce a benediction upon the sick. The short prayer which is offered by Protestant ministers at the close of divine service, is also called a benediction.

In the early ages it was customary for the father of a family, when on his death-bed, to summon his children around him, and to pronounce, in the name of Jehovah, a solemn benediction upon them. On such occasions the spirit of prophecy was sometimes poured out upon the aged sire, enabling him to foretell the most remarkable events which were to befall his children. Thus Jacob blessed his sons (Gen. xlix.), and Moses blessed the children of Israel. (Deut. xxxiii.) It was a custom among the Jews, that, in their thank-offerings, the master of the feast took a cup of wine in his hand and solemnly blessed God for it, and for the mercies which were then acknowledged, after which he gave it to the guests, every one of whom drank in his turn.

Benediction is also used for an ecclesiastical ceremony in the Church of Rome, and used on innumerable occasions, both as applied to men and things. By pronouncing a form of words anything is blessed. In this sense benediction differs from consecration, as in the latter unction is applied, which it is not in the former; thus the chalice is consecrated and the pix blessed; as the former, not the latter, is anointed, though, in the common usage, these two words are applied promiscuously. The spirit of piety, or rather of superstition, has introduced into the Romish Church benedictions for almost everything: we read of forms of benedictions for wax candles, for boughs, for ashes, for church vessels, for ornaments, for flags or ensigns, arms, first fruits, houses, ships, paschal eggs, cicilium, or the haircloth of penitents, churchyards, &c. In general, these benedictions are performed by aspersions of holy water, signs of the cross, and prayers suitable to the nature of the ceremony. The forms of these benedictions are found in the Roman Pontifical, in the Roman Missal, in the Book of Ecclesiastical Ceremonies, printed in Pope Leo X.'s time, and in the rituals and ceremonies of the different Churches, which are found collected in Father Martene's work on the Rites and Discipline of the Church.

BENEFACTORS, such as do good to others, especially if in important stations, and on an extensive scale. Every Christian is called by his religion to earn this truly glorious name. "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." Rom. xii. 21. "As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith." Gal. vi. 10. Flatterers have often applied the glorious title of benefactors to rulers and princes who have little deserved the name (as to Ptolemy Energetes, the benefactor, king of Egypt), though their office requires them to be such. To this custom our Lord refers in Luke xxii. 25. The word benefactor was, among the Greeks, a title of honour, assigned to all who had deserved well of the monarch or state, defended its liberties, or increased its honour. "It seems," says Dr Campbell, "to be our Lord's view, in these instructions, not only to check in his apostles all ambition of power, everything which savoured of a desire of superiority and dominion over their brethren, but also to restrain that species of vanity which is near akin to it,—the affectation of distinction from titles of respect and dignity. Against this vice particularly the clause under consideration seems to be levelled. The reflection naturally suggested by it is, "How little are any, the most pompous epithets which men can bestow, worthy the regard of a good man, who observes how vilely, through servility and flattery, they are sometimes prostituted on the most undeserving."

BENEFICE. This is a feudal term, and, according to the general acceptation of the word, all church preferments, except bishoprics, are comprehended by it: that is all parochial preferments, such as rectories and vicarages; and likewise all dignities, such as archdeaconries, deaneries, and prebends. The first of these, viz., rectories and vicarages, are benefices with cure of souls. As to parochial benefices with cure, the canon law defines them to be a distinct portion of ecclesiastical rights, set apart from any temporal interest, and joined to the spiritual function; and to these no jurisdiction is annexed; but it is otherwise as to archdeacons and deans, for they have a jurisdiction, because they formerly took the confession of the chapter, and visited them. It is essential to these latter, that they be bestowed freely, reserving nothing to the patron; that they be given as a provision to the clerk, who is only an usufructuary, and has no inheritance in them; and that all contracts concerning them be in their own nature void. See PLURALITIES—RESIDENCE—SIMONY.

BENEFICIARY. This name is applied to a person who is possessed of one or more benefices, the funds of which he administers on his own personal and individual responsibility. He is not the proprietor of the funds, but, as being the beneficiary, he is the administrator.

BENEFIT.—1. The gifts and favours of God. 2 Chron. xxxii. 25. 2. The favours and useful deeds of men one to another. 2 Cor. i. 15; Philem. 14. Salvation from sin and misery to holiness and happiness, is called the benefit; it is the greatest display of God's favour to us, and comprehends all kindness. 1 Tim. vi. 2.

BENEFIT OF CLERGY, a privilege enjoyed by those in holy orders, which originated in a religious regard for the honour of the Church, by which the clergy of Roman Catholic countries were either partially or wholly exempted from the jurisdiction of lay tribunals. It extended, in England, only to cases of felony; and though it was intended to apply only to clerical felons or clerks, yet as every one who could read was, by the laws of England, considered to be a clerk, when the rudiments of learning came to be diffused, almost every man in the community came to be entitled to this privilege. Peers were entitled to it whether they could read or not; and by the statutes of 3 and 4 William and Mary, c. 9, and 4 and 5 William and Mary, c. 24, it was extended to women. In the earlier periods of the Roman Catholic Church in England, the clerk, on being convicted of felony, and claiming the benefit of clergy, was handed over to the ecclesiastical tribunal for a new trial or purgation; the pretty uniform result of which was his acquittal. His pretended trial of purgation gave rise to a great deal of abuse and perjury, so that at length the secular judges, instead of handing over the culprit to the ecclesiastics for purgation, ordered him to be detained in prison until he should be pardoned by the king. By the statute of 18 Elizabeth, c. 7, persons convicted of felony, and entitled to benefit of clergy, were to be discharged from prison, being first branded in the thumb, if laymen,—it being left to the discretion of the judge to detain them in prison, not exceeding one year; and by the statute of 5 Anne, c. 6, it was enacted, that it should no longer be requisite that a person should be able to read in order to be entitled to the privilege; so that, from the passing of this act, a felon was no more liable to be hanged because of his deficiency in learning. The statutes formerly made specific provisions, that, in particular cases, the culprit should not be entitled to benefit of clergy; but the statute of 7 and 8 George IV., c. 28, provides, that "benefit of clergy, with respect to persons convicted of felony, shall be abolished." In North America, this privilege has been formally abolished in some of the States, and allowed only in one or two cases in others; while in others, again, it does not appear to have been known at all. By the act of Congress, of April 30, 1790, it is enacted, that "benefit of clergy shall not be used or allowed, upon conviction of any crime for which, by any statute of the United States, the punishment is or shall be declared to be death."

BENEVOLENCE. There are two master-principles in the human constitution, which carry on an incessant struggle for predominance,—selfishness and benevolence. The former concentrates the whole feelings, and desires, and actions, upon promotion of our own individual good, while the latter seeks to promote the good of our neighbour. So powerfully do these two principles operate, that moralists have been divided in opinion, as to the point whether virtue or moral goodness is resolvable into the one or the other. The selfish and the benevolent systems form two great ethical creeds,—the one proposed by Hobbes, the other by Hutcheson. As in all the contentions which have arisen among the investigators of our moral constitution, there is truth in both systems. Man is at once a selfish, and he is a social being. In one sense, he stands isolated and apart from his fellow-men; in another sense, he is intimately associated with the whole human family. It is as one of a vast brotherhood that we wish to view him in the present article; and we hold that, from the interesting position which every man may be considered as occupying in regard to his fellow-men, may be deduced an ethical principle co-extensive in its operation with the relations subsisting among the individuals of the human family. The fact that a connection so intimate subsists throughout the vast community of mankind, is sufficient to bear us out in our demand, that a principle of benevolence ought to operate in every heart, controlling our conduct in reference to others, and impelling us forward in our endeavours to promote, to the utmost extent of our ability, the best interests of the whole human race. The mode in which the principle is exercised must necessarily depend on the peculiarity of those relations from which it originates. On one occasion it assumes the form of filial affection; on another, of patriotism; and on a third, of general philanthropy, or extended benevolence.

Friend, parent, neighbour, first it will embrace;
Our country next, and then all human race.

From the universality of the relationship we have thus hinted at, we are entitled to expect that the law of benevolence be in universal operation throughout the whole earth; and any defect in this respect must argue either an original defect or a subsequent derangement of the moral constitution or man. The inference from the existence of moral relations to the existence of a corresponding moral principle, which either is, or ought to be, in operation, is warranted by the principles of a sound philosophy, just as the great German philosopher, more celebrated for his profound speculations in mental than in physical science, could with safety announce a priori, from a calculation of the relative motions and distances of a portion of the planetary system, the existence of a planet which was discovered some years after by the telescope. We are far from asserting that benevolence is a characteristic feature in the depraved constitution of man; it is sufficient if we have demonstrated that there lies upon every individual of the human race a paramount obligation to the habitual exercise of this principle.

And this law of benevolence, imposed upon us by the position in which God hath placed us, is not affected in its obligatory force by the character of him towards whom our benevolence is exercised. It derives its binding power from the will of our Creator, as manifested both in his providence and in his Word. The law of benevolence is clear, as drawn from the providential arrangements amid which we have seen man to be placed as a member of one great family, and the same law is equally clear as deduced from the Sacred Scriptures. A single passage may suffice to show the doctrine of the Bible on this subject. In Luke vi. 32–36 it is thus written: “For if ye love them which love you, what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them. And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye? for sinners also do even the same. And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again. But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil. Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful.” Such is the plain statement of the Inspired Writings, and in the gradual development of the mighty plan, which forms the sum and substance of all written revelation, we are presented with innumerable exhibitions of the Divine benevolence, which, when brought to bear with efficacy on the mind of man, are calculated, under the blessing of the Spirit, to effect the renovation of his whole nature; and no sooner has the mind been enlightened to a cordial belief of the truth, and the heart awakened to the experience of its power, than a principle of benevolence is called into exercise. Many are the counterfeit imitations which are every day to be met with in the world, approximating more or less in resemblance to this heaven-born affection; but pure and lovely as its great Original, it knows no dwelling upon earth, save in the bosom of the pious and humble disciple of that religion which not only commands, but inwardly constrains us, to do good to all men as we have opportunity.

BEN-HADAD. The name of an idol of the Syrians, and perhaps of the Edomites, was Hadad or Adad, which, according to Macrobin and Pliny, signified the sun. It was a very common name among the ancient Idumean and Syrian kings. Three kings of this name are mentioned in Scripture,—1. A son of Tabrimon, king of Syria, who came to assist Asa, king of Judah, against Baasha, king of Israel, and obliged him to return and succour his own country, and to abandon Ramah, which he had undertaken to fortify. 1 Kings xv. 18. This Ben-hadad is probably Hadad the Edomite, who rebelled against Solomon. 1 Kings xi. 25. 2. A king of Syria, son of the above Ben-hadad, who made war against Ahab, A.M. 3103. (See AHAB—HAZAEI.) 3. A son of Hazael, above mentioned, from whom Jehoash, king of Israel, recovered all that Hazael had taken from his predecessor. 2 Kings xiii. 3, 24, 25. Jehoash defeated him three times, and compelled him to surrender all the country beyond Jordan, namely, the lands belonging to Gad, Reuben, and Manasseh, which Hazael had taken.

BENI-KHAIBIR. See RECHABITES.

BENJAMIN, the youngest son of Jacob and Rachel. The circumstances attending his birth were very affecting. Thus we are told (Gen. xxxv. 16, 17, 18):—“And they journeyed from Bethel; and there was but a little way to come to Ephrath: and Rachel travailed, and she had hard labour. And it came to pass, when she was in hard labour, that the midwife said unto her, Fear not; thou shalt have this son also. And it came to pass, as her soul was in departing, (for she died) that she called his name Ben-oni: but his father called him Benjamin.” “The words uttered by the midwife seem to have had allusion to what was said by Rachel herself on a former occasion. But they appear to have had no influence upon Rachel. Neither the recollections nor the prospects of worldly blessings avail much to gladden the chamber of sickness and of death. Rachel makes no answer; but, turning her dying eyes towards the child, and calling him Ben-oni, ‘son of my sorrow,’ she expires! The circumstances were similar to those of the death of Phinehas’s wife, 1 Sam. iv. 20, 21:—‘And, about the time of her death, the women that stood by her said unto her, Fear not; for thou hast born a son. But she answered not, neither did she regard it. And she named the child Ichabod, saying, ‘The glory is departed from Israel.’” His father called him Benjamin, “son of the right hand;” implying that he should be peculiarly dear to his father, as is evident from the scriptural usage of the phrase, “right hand.” The tribe of Benjamin was at first the smallest, but speedily increased to a considerable extent. The dying prophecy of Jacob was couched in these words:—“Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf: in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil.” Gen. xlix. 27. “As Judah is likened to a lion, Issachar to a strong ass, Dan to a serpent, and Naphtali to a hind let loose, so Benjamin is here compared to a ravenous wolf, to denote the warlike character of this tribe, their activity, courage, and success in their conflicts with the enemies of Israel. Although the image is not on the whole disparaging, —for the Most High himself, in allusion to his judgments against his enemies, is compared to a leopard and a bear, (Hos. xiii. 7, 8),—yet it probably betokens a degree of fierceness and rapacity, not to say cruelty, which would be a stain upon the memory of this tribe with succeeding generations. This is evinced in the history of the transaction recorded Judges xix. and xx.; in that of Saul, who was of this tribe; and of his descendants, who were so long opposed to the accession of the house of David to the throne.”

Moses, in his last song, says, “The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him; and the Lord shall cover him all the day long, and he shall dwell between his shoulders.” Deut. xxxiii. 12. The words, “Benjamin is a ravening wolf,” are allusively applied to Paul, who was of the tribe of Benjamin, but much more properly to the valour of the tribe. Judg. xx. See CANAAN.

BENTHAM, JEREMY. This distinguished individual was born in London, on the 15th February 1747. In early life he exhibited remarkable proofs of precocity of talent. His education commenced under his father's tuition, after which he was sent to Westminster school, where he speedily distinguished himself by his talents and acquirements. So rapid was his progress, that when he was little more than twelve years of age he became a collegian at Oxford. For a time, in consequence of his tender years, he was not required to subscribe the Thirty-Nine Articles, and when at length he was called upon to do so, he signed with the utmost reluctance; and "by the view," he declares, "I found myself forced to take of the whole business, such an impression was made as will never depart from me but with life." The infidelity which prevailed at Oxford during Mr Bentham's stay there was peculiarly offensive to his mind. In 1763 Bentham took his place as a student in the Court of Queen's Bench, Westminster Hall, and in 1772 he was called to the bar. But the singularly theoretical and speculative tendencies of his mind unfitted him for prosecuting with much prospect of success the active duties of a practising barrister, and, being in easy circumstances, he devoted himself entirely to literary compositions. The study of his life was jurisprudence; but it is more especially as the inventor, or rather the great promulgator, of a peculiar theory in morals that we are disposed to notice this eminent man. He had at an early age acquired a taste for the writings of Helvetius, and more especially for his work on the Mind. Early imbued with the views of that acute, but erroneous, moralist, he maintained throughout life a strong partiality for an ethical system which is entitled to be regarded as a modification of the selfish system of morals originating with Hobbes. The peculiar doctrines of Bentham were published to the world in his 'Principles of Morals and Legislation;' and, under the well-known designation of the UTILITARIAN SYSTEM OF MORALS, his tenets have been zealously propagated by a limited, but ardent, school of disciples. The fundamental principles of the system—that the desire of pleasure and the fear of pain are the only possible motives which can influence the human will—far from being original, were set forth by Hume, and, in fact, maintained by an entire sect of ancient Greek philosophers. In asserting such a principle as that which lies at the foundation of Bentham's philosophy, the evident design is to inculcate that pleasure is the sole end of human existence, and that the lawfulness, justice, goodness, or morality of actions means only their utility, or their property of increasing the sum of happiness or lessening the amount of suffering, in individuals or in the community. This is the principle of utility, or the greatest happiness principle, as it is termed, which, according to Bentham, forms the only test of the morality of actions—the sole ground of approbation or disapprobation—the sole rule for morals as well as legislation. A natural deduction from such a principle is, that the supreme interest of every individual is the attainment of the greatest happiness of which he is capable, and the supreme interest of society is the attainment of the greatest happiness possible to all the individuals of which it is composed. There is no doubt that a regard to our own private interest, as well as a regard to the public advantage,—two principles which Bentham strangely confounds,—are important and strongly operative in our moral nature. But the error lies in making them the sole rules, the supreme guides of our conduct. The outward advantages of virtue are thus held forth, to the entire exclusion of the internal satisfaction which virtue invariably imparts. This is reversing the proper order of things. "The direct object of ethics," to borrow the language of Sir James Mackintosh, "is only mental disposition. It considers actions indirectly as the signs by which such dispositions are manifested. If it were possible for the mere moralist to see that a moral and amiable temper was the mental source of a bad action, he could not cease to approve and love the temper, as we sometimes presume to suppose may be true of the Searcher of hearts. Religion necessarily coincides with morality in this respect; and it is the peculiar distinction of Christianity, that it places the seat of virtue in the heart." Such is a brief sketch of the moral system of Bentham, which is well known as Utilitarianism, which reduces the whole of morality to the one desire of promoting the greatest happiness of the greatest number. The reforms which this eminent writer proposed in the system of jurisprudence were many and important; and his opinions, both on law and morals, have exercised a commanding influence upon the progress of his age. That Christianity has been advanced in its interests by the promulgation of the system of Bentham cannot for a moment be asserted, but, on the contrary, the whole tendency of Utilitarianism has been to cherish a spirit of cold, withering scepticism.

BEREA, a city of Macedonia, now Karavaria, about thirty-five miles west of Thessalonica, where Paul preached the gospel with success. Acts xvii. 10–13. There is a medal of Berea extant, which is remarkable for being inscribed, "Of the second Macedonia," and also for being the only Macedonian medal of the date A.U.C. 706, inscribed with the name of the city where it was struck. Great success attended the preaching of Paul in this city, where there was a synagogue, the members of which are described as "more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so." Acts xvii. 11.

BEREANS, a small sect of Dissenters from the Church of Scotland, who take their title from, and profess to follow the example of, the ancient Bereans (Acts xvii. 11), in building their system of faith and practice upon the Scriptures alone, without regard to any human authority whatever.

Mr Barclay, a Scotch clergyman, was the founder of this denomination. They first assembled as a separate society of Christians in Edinburgh, in 1773.

The Bereans agree with the Established Churches of England and Scotland respecting the Trinity, predestination, and election, though they allege that these doctrines are not consistently taught in either; but they differ from them in various points, particularly,—

1. They reject all natural religion, as undermining the cause of revealed religion, by rendering it unnecessary and superfluous.

2. They consider faith in Christ and assurance of salvation as inseparable; or, rather, as the same thing, because God has said, "He that believeth shall be saved." If we, therefore, credit this testimony

(which is all that they mean by faith), it must be impious to doubt of our salvation. Mr Barclay says, "By whatever evidence I hold the resurrection of Jesus, by the same precise evidence I must hold it for a truth that I am justified,—for God hath equally asserted both." But on this Mr M'Lean remarks: "The resurrection is a truth independent of my believing, and the subject of direct testimony; but my justification is not declared to be a truth until I believe the former; nor is it directly asserted, but promised on that provision, 'If thou shalt believe, thou shalt be saved.'" Rom. x. 9. This seems to be the most dangerous tenet of the Bereans, because it reduces faith to fancy, since it amounts to this,—“If I persuade myself that I am a believer, then I am one.”

3. They say, that the sin against the Holy Ghost is nothing else but unbelief; and that the expression, "It shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, nor that which is to come," means only, that a person dying in unbelief would not be forgiven, neither under the former dispensation by Moses, nor under the gospel dispensation, which, in respect of the Mosaic, was a kind of future world, or world to come. See ÆON.

4. They consider the whole of the Old Testament prophecies, and especially the Book of Psalms, as typical or prophetic of Christ, and never apply them to the experience of private Christians. Under this and the first head, they agree with the followers of Mr Hutchinson. See HUTCHINSONIANS.

5. They maintain the sovereignty of God, and unconditional election, in the strongest language of the Calvinists.

The Bereans practise infant baptism, and administer the Lord's Supper mouthly; but, in admitting to communion, they do not require that account of personal experience which many other Churches do; but, after due admonition, they exclude unworthy members for immoral conduct, though they do not pretend to "deliver them over to Satan," as the apostles did.

The denomination has several congregations in Scotland, and some few in England and America.

BERED, a place in the Wilderness of Shur, to the south of Kadesh-barnea. Gen. xvi. 14. It is the same, probably, as Hazar-addar. Numb. xxxiv. 4.—SEE ADAR.

BERENGARIUS, or BERENGER, a celebrated reformer of the eleventh century. He was a man of most acute genius, extensive learning, and exemplary sanctity of life and manners. He denied the doctrine of the real presence, as it was then commonly termed; and by writing against it, called forth all the learned of the Church of Rome to defend the doctrine of transubstantiation. Berenger was a native of France, educated under Fulbert, bishop of Chartres, a very learned man; and taking orders in the Church, became deacon of St Maurice, and ultimately archbishop of Angiers, in the province of Anjou. He was also principal of the Academy of Tours. The prevalent sentiment of his day relative to the eucharist was, that the bread was the identical body, and the wine the very blood of Christ—not only figuratively, but substantially and properly. Berenger, on the contrary, insisted that the body of Christ is only in the heavens; and that the elements of bread and wine are merely the symbols of his body and blood. Several of the bishops wrote against him, most bitterly complaining of his heresy; but not feeling the force of their arguments, Berenger remained unmoved, and defended his opinions with the utmost pertinacity. He wrote a letter on the subject to Lanfranc, who was at that time at the head of the Convent of St Stephen's at Caen, in Normandy, and called from thence by William the Conqueror to be archbishop of Canterbury; which being opened while the latter was from home, was officiously transmitted by the convent to Pope Leo. The pontiff, shocked at its heretical contents, summoned a council, at which Berenger was commanded to be present. His friends, however, advised him against going, and he consequently sent two persons to attend the council and answer in his behalf. Lanfranc also was present, and pleaded for Berenger; but the latter was condemned, the two persons who appeared for him imprisoned, and Lanfranc commanded by the pope to draw up a refutation of the heresy of Berenger, on pain of being himself reputed a heretic, with which injunction he thought it prudent to comply. This example was followed also by the Council of Paris, summoned the very same year by Henry I., in which Berenger and his numerous adherents were threatened with all sorts of evils, both spiritual and temporal—evils which were in part executed against the heretical prelate, for the monarch deprived him of all his revenues. But neither threatenings nor fines, nor the decrees of synods, could shake the firmness of his mind, or oblige him to retract his sentiments. In the meanwhile, the opinions of Berenger were everywhere spreading rapidly, inasmuch that, if we may credit contemporary writers, "his doctrine had corrupted all the English, Italian, and French nations." Thuanus adds, that "in Germany were many of the same doctrine, and that Bruno, bishop of Treves, banished them all out of his diocese, sparing only their blood." Three times Berenger was compelled to abjure his sentiments at Rome, and as often, on returning to France, avowed and spread them with renewed zeal, until, disgusted with a controversy in which the first principles of reason were so impudently insulted, and exhausted by an opposition which he was unable to overcome, he abandoned all his worldly concerns, and retiring into solitude, passed the remainder of his days in fasting, prayer, and the exercise of piety. In the year 1088 death put a period to the affliction which he suffered in retirement, occasioned by bitter reflection upon his repeated dissimulations at Rome; leaving behind him, in the minds of the people, a deep impression of his extraordinary sanctity. It is not so generally known, that Berengarius also strenuously opposed Papal celibacy, and the baptism of infants. His followers were as numerous as his fame was illustrious.

BERENGARIANS, a denomination in the eleventh century, who adhered to the opinions of Berengarius. His followers were divided in opinion as to the Eucharist. See BERENGARIUS.

BERNICE, the eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I., and sister to Agrippa II. She was first married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, after whose death she became the wife of Polemon, king of Cilicia. This connection being soon dissolved, she returned to the court of her brother. She was beloved by Titus, who would have married her, but that the Roman law did not recognise such an union.

BERODACH-BALADAN, a king of Assyria, mentioned in 2 Kings xx. 12. SEE BALADAN.

BEROSUS, the Babylonish historian, was, by nation, a Chaldean; and by office, a priest of Belus.

He is believed to have lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and to have prepared a history of Babylon, some valuable fragments of which have been preserved by Josephus and Eusebius, which have been of great use in arranging a chronological series of the kings of Babylon. The cosmogony of Berosus, preserved by Syncellus, ascribes the formation of the world out of the first chaos, or dark and humid mass, to Belus or a divine energy, from which, also, was derived the human mind by emanation. It is a curious fact that Berosus records the fable, that a creature, half man and half fish, called Oannes, first taught men the arts of life. A representation of this fabulous creature, which seems to be the Dagon of the Philistines (see DAGON), has been dug up by Layard in his recent subterranean researches in Babylonia. It is deeply interesting to observe how much light, even at this remote age, is being thrown on the Bible narratives.

BEROTHAI, a city of Syria, conquered by David, and one of those from which he took "much brass," the place being famous for its mines. It belonged to the kingdom of Zobat. It is supposed by some to be the modern Bir; and by others, to be Beyrout. The latter was the opinion of Rosenmüller. This city is also called Chun (1 Chron. xviii. 8), from an idol worshipped there, supposed to be the same as the Saturn of the Greeks. Berothah, mentioned by Ezekiel (xlvii. 16), is probably the same place.

BERYL, a pellucid gem of a bluish-green colour, whence it is called by the lapidaries, aqua marina. Its Hebrew name is a word also, for the same reason, given to the sea. Psal. xlviii. 7. It is found in the East Indies, Peru, Siberia, and Tartary. It has a brilliant appearance, and is generally transparent. It was the tenth stone belonging to the high priest's pectoral. Exod. xxviii. 20; Rev. xxi. 20. According to the Septuagint and Josephus, it refers to the chrysolite; that is, the topaz of the moderns, which is still found in Spain. Bochart derives the Hebrew name from Tarshish, whence he imagined the stone was procured.

BERYLLIANS, so called from one Beryllus, a learned Arabian bishop, in the third century. He taught that Christ did not exist before Mary, but that a Spirit from God himself, a portion of the Divine nature, was united to him at his birth. His sentiments, therefore, nearly corresponded with those of the modern Socinians (which see). He is said, however, to have yielded to the arguments of Origen, and to have returned to the bosom of the Christian Church.

BESET, to surround as an army. Judg. xix. 22. God besets men behind and before; he exactly knows, upholds, and governs them, that they can go nowhere but as he permits, and where they are surrounded with his presence. Psal. cxxxix. 5. Men's sinful doings beset them, when they appear charged on them, and with mighty force entangle them in their deserved punishment. Hos. vii. 2. The sin that easily besets men is the sin of their nature and temperament, or their predominant lust, which, being deep rooted in their heart and affections, and connected with their outward circumstances in life, readily and without much opposition instigates, and, as it were, shuts them up to the commission of wicked acts. Heb. xii. 1.

BESOM, a broom, or instrument for sweeping. In Isa. xiv. 23, we find the "besom of destruction" mentioned, to denote the entire destruction of Babylon.

Roberts the traveller tells us, that the same expression is still common in the East.

BESOR, or Bosor, a brook which falls into the Mediterranean, between Gaza and Rhinocorura, or between Rhinocorura and Egypt. Here it was that David overtook and routed the Amalekites, who had made an attack on Ziklag and made prisoners of the women. Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne suppose this stream to be what is now termed the Wady Salga, particularly from the remarkable coincidence of the present aspect of the country around with the description given by the sacred historian.

BETAH, the name of a strong place in Syria, which David took from Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii. 8); called also Tibhath. 1 Chron. xviii. 8.

BETEN, the name of a town in the tribe of Asher, mentioned in Josh. xix. 25, and supposed to be the same as Betah. Reland says it was situated about eight miles from Ptolemais or Acre. Eusebius terms it Batvai, and adds, that it is now called Bethlehem, in the tribe of Asher.

BETH, the second letter of the Hebrew alphabet; literally signifying a house. It forms the prefix to the names of many places in Palestine; and generally, in such a case, indicates that those places at an early period contained houses or temples dedicated to some particular idol.

BETHABARA (or the house of passage), the name of a place situated on a part of the Jordan where there was a ford, and a khan for the entertainment of travellers in their passage to and from the countries which the Jordan separated. Here Gideon stationed the Ephraimites to interrupt the flight of the Midianites, whose princes, Oreb and Zeeb, were overtaken at this place; and at the same point John the Baptist baptized the crowds who flocked to his ministry. In John i. 28, where this latter circumstance is recorded, Dr Campbell prefers the reading Bethany, which is found in many manuscripts, in the Vulgate, Saxon, and both the Syriac versions. There is ground, Dr Campbell says, to think that the change of Bethany into Bethabara took its rise from a conjecture of Origen, who, because its situation mentioned here does not suit what is said of Bethany, where Lazarus and his sisters lived, changed it into Bethabara, the place mentioned in Judg. vii. 24, where our translators have rendered it Beth-barah. This place appears to have been a regular passage or ferry over the Jordan; but it is uncertain whether it was the actual place where the Israelites, under Joshua, passed that river in a miraculous manner. Bethabara is placed by Jerome, Calmet, and others, on the east bank of the Jordan, about thirty miles north-east of Jerusalem; others place it south of the Sea of Tiberias; and Dr Lightfoot argues that it was situated north-east of that sea. It was allotted to the tribe of Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 22.

BETHANY, a small hamlet situated on the eastern base of the Mount of Olives, the well-known residence of Lazarus and his sisters, and, consequently, the scene of several of the most interesting events in the gospel history. It is not more than two miles distant from Jerusalem, and gave name to a district of Mount Olivet adjoining the town. Hence, while Luke says in his Gospel (xxiv. 50), that Christ ascended from Bethany, he tells us, with the most perfect consistency, in the Acts of the Apostles (i. 12), that the ascension took place from the Mount of Olives. The description which Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne give of Bethany is picturesque and beautiful:—"We found this ever-memorable village to be very like what we could have imagined it. It lies almost hidden in a small ravine of Mount Olivet; so much so, that from the height it cannot be seen. It is embosomed in fruit trees, especially figs and almonds, olives and pomegranates. The ravine in which it lies is terraced, and the terraces are covered either with fruit trees or waving grain. There are not many houses, perhaps about twenty inhabited, but there are many marks of ancient ruins. The house of Lazarus was pointed out to us, a substantial building, probably a tower in former days, and selected to bear the name of the House of Lazarus by traditionists, who did not know how else than by his worldly eminence such a man could draw the special regard of the Lord Jesus. They did not know that Christ loveth freely. The sepulchre called the Tomb of Lazarus attracted more of our attention. We lighted our tapers, and descended twenty-six steps cut in the rock to a chamber deep in the rock, having several niches for the dead. Whether this be the very tomb where Lazarus lay four days, and which yielded up its dead at the command of Jesus, it is impossible to say. The common objection that it is too deep, seems entirely groundless; for there is nothing in the narrative to intimate that the tomb was on a level with the ground, and besides, it seems not unlikely that there was another entrance to the tomb further down the slope. A stronger objection is, that the tomb is in the immediate vicinity of the village, or actually in it; but it is possible that the modern village occupies ground a little different from the ancient one. However this may be, there can be no doubt that this is 'Bethany, the town of Mary and her sister Martha, nigh unto Jerusalem, about fifteen furlongs off.' How pleasing are all the associations that cluster around it! Perhaps there was no scene in the Holy Land which afforded us more unmingled enjoyment;—we even fancied that the curse that everywhere rests so visibly upon the land had fallen more lightly here. In point of situation, nothing could have come up more completely to our previous imagination of the place to which Jesus delighted to retire at evening from the bustle of the city, and the vexations of the unbelieving multitudes,—sometimes traversing the road by which we had come, and perhaps oftener still coming up the face of the hill by the footpath that passes on the north of Gethsemane. What a peaceful scene! Amidst these trees, or in that grassy field, he may often have been seen in deep communion with the Father; and in sight of this verdant spot it was that he took his last farewell of the disciples, and went upward to resume the deep, unbroken fellowship of 'his God and our God,' uttering blessings even the moment when he began to be parted from them. And it was here that the two angels stood by them in white apparel, and left us this glorious message, 'This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.'

BETH-ARABAH, a city first allotted to the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 6), and afterwards given to the tribe of Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 22.

BETH-ARAM, or BETH-HARAN, the name of a town fortified by the tribe of Gad (Numb. xxxii. 36), and afterwards allotted to that tribe. Josh. xiii. 27. It was situated on a rivulet called the Nimrim, about five miles east from the Jordan.

BETH-ARBEL, a name mentioned by the Prophet Hosea (x. 14), who alludes to some great military exploit well known in his day, but not recorded in the Scriptures. Jerome inserts Jerubbaal instead of Beth-arbel in this verse, and interprets it as referring to Gideon's victory over Zalmunna. Judg. viii. 12. Other commentators understand the verse as relating to Shalmaneser, who gained a battle at Beth-arbel against Hoshea, king of Israel.

BETH-AVEN, the House of Vanity, or of Idols, a name which, as it identifies the worship of idols with vanity or folly, seems to have been applied in derision to Bethel, after it became the seat of the idolatrous worship of the golden calves set up by Jeroboam, Hosea iv. 15: "Though thou, Israel, play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend; and come not ye unto Gilgal, neither go ye up to Beth-aven, nor swear, The Lord liveth." There is another city bearing this name, mentioned in Josh. vii. 2. It was nearly six miles east of Bethel, and gave name to the wilderness adjoining, which in Josh. xviii. 12 is called the wilderness of Beth-Aven.

BETHEL, a city of Ephraim, twelve miles north of Jerusalem. Originally the place was called Luz, probably from the numerous almond trees in the neighbourhood. It was the scene of a remarkable vision, recorded in the history of Jacob (Gen. xxxviii.), from which he called it Bethel, or the House of God. (See BETH-AVEN.) Messrs Bonar and McCheyne thus speak of it:—"In a little time we approached the district of Beth-aven or Bethel. The hills around, as well as the ruins of the town, are called by the Arabs, Beteen. This name is, in all probability, the remains, not of Bethel, but of Beth-aven. It would seem that, in the days of Joshua, this region was called 'the Wilderness of Beth-aven,' and perhaps the hill on which the town afterwards stood, Beth-aven. When the town was built it was called Luz, but Jacob, grateful for the visit of mercy which he there received, called it Bethel, 'the house of God.' In later days, it became the seat of idolatrous worship; and the indignant prophet of Israel, to awaken the people to a sense of their sin, recalled the ancient name, 'Beth-aven,' or 'house of vanity,' and sometimes only 'Aven.' From this seems to have been formed the present name, Beteen." "I rode among the ruins," says Stephens, "without dismounting. The place was solitary and deserted, and not a human being appeared to dwell in it."

BETHER. We find mention made of the "Mountains of Bether" in Song ii. 17, and viii. 14. In the latter passage the word is translated "mountains of spices." It is uncertain whether there was any place bearing this name, or whether it may not be the same with Bethoron (which see). Eusebius thinks that the place called Bether stood near Jerusalem, others suppose it to have been near Mount Carmel. Dr Gill places it in the land of Gilead. Some consider it as Bethlar, where Barchocab and his followers were destroyed. Bether, wherever it was, is frequently mentioned in the Jewish writings, but all trace of it is now lost, and no mention is ever made by travellers of such a place. Perhaps, after all, it simply denotes mountains of spices in a metaphorical sense. It is remarkable that the name in both passages is connected with the leaping of a roe or young hart, the church praying that Christ may come to her with similar alacrity.

BETHESDA. This word signifies the house of mercy, and was the name of a pool or public bath at Jerusalem, which had five porticos, piazzas, or covered walks, around it. John v. 2-4. This bath was called Bethesda, and is noted for the remarkable miracle which our Lord performed there. The Evangelist John, in relating the miracle, states that an angel descended from heaven at particular seasons and troubled the water, and that whoever first went into the water after this was healed of whatsoever infirmity he had. This account of the descent of the angel is omitted in certain Greek and Latin MSS., and likewise in the Armenian version. But as all the old and authentic Syriac versions contain the passage exactly as it is translated in our version, it is impossible to doubt its authenticity. The agitation of the water, its suddenly healing virtue as to all diseases, and the limitation to the first that should go in, are all miraculous circumstances. Commentators have, however, resorted to various hypotheses to account for the whole without Divine agency. Dr Hammond, Michaelis, Kuinöel, and others, suppose it received medicinal properties from the warm blood of the temple sacrifices; Mead, from metallic salts at the bottom; Mr Taylor, from a cold spring, which flowed only at particular seasons. Doddridge combines the common hypotheses with that of Mead, namely, that the water had at all times more or less of a medicinal property; but at some period not far distant from that in which the transaction here recorded took place, it was endued with a miraculous power; an extraordinary commotion being probably observed in the water, and Providence so ordering it, that the next person who accidentally bathed here, being under some great disorder, found an immediate and unexpected cure. The like phenomenon in some other desperate case was probably observed on a second commotion; and these commotions and cures might happen periodically.

The precise situation of this pool or bath cannot now be accurately determined. There were formerly many baths at Jerusalem, and several are still found there. Josephus mentions a pool situated to the north of the temple, and in that very position. There is still shown a pool said to be that of Bethesda, contiguous to the area of the Temple and Stephen's Gate. The Mohammedans call it Birket-el-Serai, or the Pool of the Palace. It is considered by travellers as the most ancient work in Jerusalem; and Chateaubriand states that he regards it as offering "the only specimen of the primitive architecture of the Jews at Jerusalem." The pool is thus minutely described by Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne:—

"It is 360 feet long by 130 feet broad, and about 70 feet deep. A low parapet of large stones runs along the margin, over which you look into the vast dry basin below. The bottom is partly covered with rubbish, and partly planted with a few flowers and old trees. At the farther end are two arches, forming entrances into dark vaults, which are generally believed to be remains of the five porches. Dr Robinson has conjectured that this very deep pool was part of the trench of the castle of Antonia, which stood on the north-west corner of the ancient temple; and it seems exceedingly probable that this is the case. But is it not possible that when the trench of Antonia was dug, dividing it from the hill Beze-tha, advantage was taken of the Pool of Bethesda previously existing in this place? There can be little doubt, from the manner in which the sides are cemented, that it was anciently a pool, and it bears the name of a pool among the native population to this day. That the Pool of Bethesda was in the immediate vicinity of the temple, and also near one of the gates of the city, there can be no doubt; and that it was a large and important reservoir, seems also probable from the narrative of the gospel. But there is no other pool at present remaining in Jerusalem which answers this description; so that it may really be the case that this large reservoir, though used as part of the trench of Antonia, is still the remains of the interesting Pool of Bethesda."

Some have supposed that the pool received its name from the circumstance that the sheep used for sacrifice in the temple were washed in it; but this is improbable, as the sheep were washed before they left the adjoining market. Dr Pococke, again, imagined that Bethesda formed a kind of reservoir for the reception of the blood of the sacrifices. This, however, could not possibly be the case, as a part of the city lay between the pool and the temple. The interpretation, therefore, "the house of mercy," is more in unison with the design for which the pool or bath was constructed, and the purposes to which it was applied. "Tradition," says the Scripture Gazetteer, "now points out this pool on the east side of the mount on which the temple stood, where there is an empty tank one hundred and twenty feet long, forty broad, and about eight feet deep, walled round with stones, but without water. This agrees with Maundrel's measurement, who surveyed it in 1696, and found at the west end three old arches built or choked up, which are said to be the remains of the five original porches in which sat the lame, blind, and withered of Jerusalem. Sandys was in Jerusalem on Good Friday, A.D. 1611, and says he saw the spring running, but in small quantities. The erection of the Pool of Bethesda is ascribed to King Hezekiah." According to Maundrel, this pool is one hundred and twenty paces long, forty broad, and eight deep, but at present it is entirely destitute of water.

BETH-EZEL, a house that is near, a place mentioned in Micah i. 11, which is supposed to be the same with Bethel (which see.)

BETH-HACCEREM, a city of Judah, situated on a hill not far from Tekoah. Jer. vi. 1. Malchiah, son of Rechab, was prince of this place. Neh. iii. 14. Dr Pococke says that "the hill on which this city appears to have stood is very high, and laid out in terraces. There was a double circular fortification at top; and, at the foot of the hill to the north, there are great ruins of a church and other buildings."

BETH-HARAN, one of the fenced cities of the tribe of Gad. Num. xxii. 36. Called, in Josh. xiii. 27, Beth-aram.

BETH-HOGLAH. There are two cities bearing this name, which are mentioned in Scripture. 1. One in the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 6. 2. Another in the tribe of Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 21.

BETH-HORON. Two cities bearing this name are mentioned as having been built by SHERA, the grand-daughter of Ephraim. 1 Chron. vii. 24. They are called the Upper and Nether Beth-horon. Dr Clarke believes the modern village of Beit-Ur, about twelve miles from Jerusalem, to be the Upper Beth-horon. Between the two cities there was a pass, which was called the descent of Beth-horon, leading from the region of Gibeon towards the western plain. On the hill above Beit-Ur, stands another village, which is recognised by modern travellers, and among others, Dr Robinson, as the other Beth-horon. The modern village of Ainbroot, the love-

THE HISTORY OF THE

liest spot in all Judea, is supposed by some to be the Beth-horon of Scripture. Mr Wylie, in his 'Modern Judea,' thus describes the place:—"It is placed on an eminence, and commands on all sides a prospect of valleys rich and highly cultivated. The hills are covered with the olive and the fig. In the valleys, the corn fields alternate with vineyards; while the patches of waste ground are overgrown with the beautiful prickly oak and wild flowers. 'This spot shines like a gem amid the desolation of Judea.' The houses are of one storey, and arranged in regular rows on the hill-side. Nothing can be more singular or picturesque in the eyes of a European than the spectacle which the village presents at evening. The inhabitants come forth, and seating themselves on the grassy roofs of their houses, enjoy the delicious sun-set, and the cheering sight of the well-cultivated valleys and terraced hills around them. At the foot of the ridge on which Ainbroot is built is a village, supposed to be the Lower Beth-horon; as that which occupies the summit is supposed to be the Upper. The pass between them is a steep and rugged ascent of some fifteen hundred feet, with a deep valley on either side."

BETH-JESHIMOTH, a city in the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 20), afterwards possessed by the Moabites. Ezekiel (xxv. 9) foretold the destruction of this and other cities of Moab. Eusebius places it ten miles from the river Jordan.

BETH-LEBAOTH, a city of the tribe of Simeon (Joshua xix. 6), called simply Lebaath in Joshua xv. 32.

BETHLEHEM, called also Ephrath or Ephratah, remarkable as having been the birthplace of Jesus Christ. It was situated in the tribe of Judah, nearly six miles distant from Jerusalem, on the road to Gaza. In the neighbourhood of this town Rachel, the beloved wife of Jacob, was buried, and a monumental pillar was reared to mark her grave. Though at no time either large or populous, it seems to have been a city of great antiquity. It was fortified by Rehoboam. 2 Chron. xi. 6. It was the "city of David," his birthplace, and the scene of his early life. Seven hundred years before the birth of Christ, Bethlehem was thus spoken of by the prophet Micah, v. 2:—"But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall He come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel: whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting." In accordance with this prediction, the Saviour was born in Bethlehem. The city thus became a place of great renown, though in the outward appearance of the town there is little worthy of notice. From a city it has dwindled into a small village. It is thus described by Mr Wylie:—

"The hill on which the town is placed is arranged into terraces, which are well clothed with figs, pomegranates, and abundance of olives: the inhabitants subsist chiefly on their fruits. The valleys near the town are covered with verdure, and enamelled with flowers: corn is sometimes grown on them; and the bread made from it is said to be of excellent quality. The only building which strikes the eye in Bethlehem is the convent, which stands at the east end of the town. It is a large church, in the form of a cross, surrounded by high walls, which give to it the air of a fortress. It was erected by Helena over what she believed to be the site of the stable in which the Saviour was born. The visitor who comes to Bethlehem, expecting to find the stable and the manger the same as on that night when Mary 'brought forth her first-born son,' will find himself greatly disappointed. Architecture, marble, silver, the wealth of princes, have been profusely lavished to decorate a spot which He who was master of the world chose before every other, because he was naked and destitute. On entering the church, the traveller finds himself in a magnificent chapel, adorned on either side with double rows of columns of white marble, intersected with veins of red. The floor is also of marble. The walls, which were once lined with the same material, have been stripped of their covering by the rulers of Egypt. A flight of steps leads the visitor down into a chapel hewn out of the rock, and similar in its rich garniture to that above: this is affirmed to be the original stable in which Christ was born; 'the credit whereof,' says Sandys, 'I will neither impeach nor enforce.' This chamber is thirty-seven feet long and eleven wide; its floors and walls are covered with white marble. Fourteen silver lamps, the gift of as many Christian kings, are kept burning day and night in it. At the farther end of the chapel, in the floor, appears a star, formed of precious stones of various colours, marking the exact spot of the nativity. Such is the present appearance of a place which, if it be indeed the scene of the mighty event which has given it interest, had been better left in its original state. The simplicity of the evangelist's narrative, which introduces to our first notice the King of Glory in a manger, but ill prepares the visitor for being ushered into a hall decorated with marble, and reflecting the radiance of silver lamps. He feels that art and wealth have aided superstition to deface rather than to adorn this interesting spot."

The town is thus described by Messrs Bonar and McCheyne:—

"The white stone of which the hill is composed, and of which the town is built, makes it very hot, and gives it a dusty appearance. The fig-trees, olives, and pomegranates, and the ripe barley-fields which cover the north side, show that it is still capable of being made what its name signifies, 'The House of Bread.' At present, however, the plague was raging in Bethlehem, and we could not find even bread in the bazaar, so that we had to seek for food at the Latin Convent. This convent is a very substantial building, like a castle. Its outer gate is very low, intended, it is said, in former days, to prevent the Arabs riding in to plunder. Some have supposed that there is reference to this custom in Prov. xvii. 19, "He that exalteth his gate seeketh destruction." But this may more probably refer to the proud and wealthy enlarging their gate after the manner of a palace; for we can hardly imagine that the Arab plunderers entered the houses of Israel in the time of Solomon. The church, generally supposed to have been built by Helena, A.D. 326, is a fine spacious building, and the rows of Corinthian columns are substantial masses of granite. It was delightful to repose a while in the cool atmosphere of this venerable pile; but the monks, who seemed to be ignorant and unpolished men, would have us away to see the secret places of the Nativity. We descended to the grotto, which they call the stable where our Lord was born. Here they showed a marble manger as the place where the heavenly babe was laid; but the monks had the honesty to allow that this was not the original manger, though the spot was the same. They showed the stone where Mary sat, and pointed to a silver star as marking the spot where the Saviour was born. The star is intended to represent that which 'stood over where the young child was.' The grotto is illumined by many handsome lamps, and there are several paintings by the first artists. Yet all is only a miserable profanation, like the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; it called up in our bosoms no other feelings than disgust and indignation. If this cave were really the place of the nativity, then Popery has successfully contrived to remove out of sight the humiliation of the stable and the manger. 'The mystery of iniquity,' which pretends to honour, and yet so effectually conceals both the obedience of Christ which he began at Bethlehem, and the sufferings of Christ which he accomplished at Calvary, has, with no less success, disfigured and concealed the places where these wonders were 'seen of angels.' There is no evidence that the stable of the eastern khan was ever a grotto cut out of the rock.

"We were conducted to another cavern in the rock, farther to the east, where the monks said that the Virgin Mary lived. But we enjoyed far more a visit to the roof of the convent, where we could breathe the pure air, and look up to the deep blue sky, and down upon the fields and valleys around Bethlehem. These are still the same as in the night when the angel of the Lord proclaimed, 'Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.' Luke ii. 10. It filled us with unmingled pleasure to gaze upon the undulating hills and valleys stretched out at our feet, for we were assured that among these David had often wandered with his flock, and in some of these the shepherds had heard the voice that brought the tidings of a Saviour born." Such is the interesting description which these travellers give of the birthplace of our Lord.

Bethlehem has been visited by many modern travellers. The following notice of it by Dr E. D. Clarke will be read with interest:—"After travelling for about an hour from the time of our leaving Jerusalem, we came in view of Bethlehem, and halted to enjoy the interesting sight. The town appeared covering the ridge of a hill, on the southern side of a deep and extensive valley, and reaching from east to west; the most conspicuous object being the monastery, erected over the Cave of the Nativity, in the suburbs, and upon the eastern side. The battlements and walls of this building seemed like those of a vast fortress. The Dead Sea below, upon our left, appeared so near to us that we thought we could have rode thither in a very short space of time. Still nearer stood a mountain upon its western shore, resembling in its form the cone of Vesuvius near Naples, and having also a crater upon its top, which was plainly discernible. The distance, however, is much greater than it appears to be; the magnitude of the objects beheld in this fine prospect causing them to appear less remote than they really are. The atmosphere was remarkably clear and serene; but we saw none of those clouds of smoke which, by some writers, are said to exhale from the surface of the lake nor from any neighbouring mountain. Everything about it was in the highest degree grand and awful. Bethlehem is six miles from Jerusalem. Josephus describes the interval between the two cities as equal only to twenty stadia; and in the passage referred to, he makes an allusion to a celebrated well, which, both from the account given by him of its situation, and more especially from the text of the Sacred Scriptures (2 Sam. xxiii. 15), seems to have contained the identical fountain of whose pure and delicious water we were now drinking. Considered merely in point of interest, the sacred narrative is not likely to be surpassed by any circumstance of pagan history. The well still retains its pristine renown; and many an expatriated Bethlehemite has made it the theme of his longing and regret."

Bethlehem is also the name of a town belonging to the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15), the situation of which is now unknown.

BETHLEHEMITES, a sect also called STAR-BEARERS, because they were distinguished by a red star having five rays, which they wore on their breast, in memory of the star which appeared to the wise men. Several authors have mentioned this order, but none of them have told us their origin, nor where their convents were situated; if we except Matthew Paris, who says that, in 1257, they obtained a settlement in England, which was at Cambridge.

This sect has entirely disappeared, not only from England, but even from Europe; so that, amid all the orders of Romanists which swarm in the various Roman Catholic countries, the Bethlehemites are now unknown.

BETH-MEON, a city of the Moabites, in the territories of the tribe of Reuben, denounced by the prophet Jeremiah, xlviii. 23.

BETH-PEOR, a city in Moab, not far from the Jordan, so called from the worship of Baal-peor. In its neighbourhood was the sepulchre of Moses. Deut. iii. 29, iv. 46, xxxiv. 6.

BETHPHAGE, a village situated on the declivity of the Mount of Olives. The name implies the house of figs, and was probably so called from the abundance of figs which grew there. It appears to have been nearer Jerusalem than Bethany. No trace of Bethphage is now to be found; but Messrs Bouar and M'Cheyne suggest that it may be perhaps Abudis, the remains of an ancient village on the height nearly south from Bethany, and about half a mile distant.

BETHSAIDA. It seems probable that there were two towns of this name, on opposite sides of the Sea of Galilee. One was the town of Philip, Andrew, and Peter, John i. 44; associated with Chorazin and Capernaum, in Matt. xi. 20-24; and belonging to the land of Gennesareth, Mark vi. 45, 53. This town was on the west side of the sea. The other is associated with Cæsarea Philippi, Mark viii. 13, 22, 27, and with the desert place where Christ fed the five thousand. Luke ix. 10. It was on the east side of Jordan, probably an hour north of the lake, where the ruins of a town still remain.

BETH-SHAN, a city on the west of Jordan, in the half-tribe of Manasseh. It was to the wall of this town that the Philistines fixed the body of Saul. "And they put his armour in the house of Ashtaroth; and they fastened his body to the wall of Beth-shan. And when the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead heard of that which the Philistines had done to Saul, all the valiant men arose, and went all night, and took the body of Saul, and the bodies of his sons, from the wall of Beth-shan, and came to Jabesh, and burnt them there." 1 Sam. xxxi. 10-12. It was a considerable town in the fourth century, under the name of Scythopolis; but it is now a poor village, bearing the name of Baisan. Burekhardt describes it as situated on rising ground on the west of the Ghor, or Valley of Jordan.

BETH-SHEMESH, a city of Judah, one of those allotted to the priests. Josh. xxi. 16. It was situated north-west of Jerusalem. At this place, as is recorded in 1 Sam. vi. 12, a number of the people were struck dead as a judgment from the Almighty, for presuming to look into the ark, contrary to the express command of God. Num. iv. 20. In commemoration of the mourning of the Hebrews on this occasion, a great stone was set up, to which the name of Abel was given. Near Beth-shemesh, Jehoash, king of Israel, defeated Amaziah and took him prisoner (2 Chron. xxv. 21); and afterwards we find the Philistines taking the city from king Ahaz. 2 Chron. xxviii. 18. Dr Robinson says, that the place is now called Ain-Shems, though no fountain exists there to give rise to the name. Beth-shemesh implies the house of the sun, being thus identical in name with Heliopolis in Egypt.

Three other places mentioned in Scripture are called Beth-shemesh; these are,—1. A city in the tribe of Issachar (Josh. xix. 22); 2. Another in Naphtali (Josh. xix. 38); and, 3. A city of Egypt, the same as Heliopolis, or On. Jer. xliii. 13. The following account of the last of these places is given by Dr Jamieson, in his additions to Professor Paxton's 'Illustrations of Scripture:—“On, or Aven, stood a little to the west of Bubastis, from which it is separated by the Sebennetic branch of the Nile, while the Pelusiac divided it from Arabia. Its original name was Ain Shems, or Shemesh, ‘the fountain of the sun,’ and afterwards Beth-shemesh, or Heliopolis, the city of the sun, from the splendid temple which was erected in this city to the luminary of day. It is celebrated in Sacred History as the residence of Joseph's father-in-law, who was a priest or prince of this place. It is celebrated also for being the chief residence of the wise men of Egypt, and especially for its college of priests, whither Herodotus, Plato, and others, repaired to investigate the science and institutions of Egypt. It sustained a dreadful blow from the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, and at a period subsequent to this it was so dreadfully ravaged by the troops of Cambyses, the Persian, that from that date it continued rapidly to decline and fall. Ezekiel, in his denunciation of the Divine vengeance upon the land of Egypt, describes this city and its neighbour Bubastis as partners in the common calamity. The names of this city, Beth-aven, as well as Heliopolis, sufficiently indicate the idolatrous worship for which it was famous. ‘Its site is still marked,’ says Dr Robinson, ‘by low mounds, enclosing a space about three quarters of a mile in length, by half a mile in breadth, which was once occupied, partly by houses, and partly by the celebrated Temple of the Sun. This area is now a ploughed field, and the solitary obelisk of red granite, covered with hieroglyphics, which still rises in the midst, is the sole remnant of the ancient worshippers of that luminary.’”

BETH-SHITTAH, a place south-west of the Sea of Tiberias, to which Gideon pursued Midian. Judg. vii. 22.

BETH-TAPPUAH, a city of Judah (Josh. xv. 53), which Eusebius says is the last city of Palestine, in the way to Egypt.

BETHUEL, son of Nahor and Milcah, was Abraham's nephew, and father of Laban, and of Rebecca, Isaac's wife. Gen. xxiv. See LABAN.

BETHUL, or BETHUEL, a city of Simeon (Josh. xix. 4; 1 Chron. iv. 30), the same, probably, as Bethulia, which Sozomen speaks of as a town belonging to the inhabitants of Gaza, well peopled, and having several temples remarkable for their structure and antiquity; particularly a pantheon (or temple dedicated to all the gods), situated on an eminence made of earth, brought thither for the purpose, which commanded the whole city. He conjectures that it was named Bethelia, which signifies the house of God, by reason of this temple. Calmet thinks it the same with Bethulia, which is celebrated for its siege by Holofernes, at which he was killed by Judith. Judith xiii. 6–11. It is at present called Safet, and is a very strong position, answering exactly to the description given in the apocryphal Book of Judith. It was destroyed by an earthquake in January 1837.

BETH-ZUR, a city of Judah, about twenty miles south of Jerusalem. It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 7), and in the time of the Maccabees it was a place of great strength. When it was besieged by Lysias under Antiochus, the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, with an army of 60,000 foot and 5000 cavalry, Judas Maccabæus came to its relief with 10,000 men, and compelled Lysias to raise the siege. 1 Mac. iv. 28. Bryant derives the name Beth-zur from beth, a temple; and zur or zur, a name of the sun, but it more probably implies “the house of the rock,” as having a strong fortress situated on a lofty rock. Its peculiar position rendered it particularly valuable to Rehoboam, as a protection against the Danites, one of the revolted ten tribes. It has long since disappeared, so that not a trace of it is to be found. Josephus calls Beth-zur the strongest fortress in Judea.

BETRAY. In the Last Supper our Lord exclaimed, “He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me.” Matt. xxvi. 23. This person was Judas Iscariot, who covenanted to betray his Lord for thirty pieces of silver. The same word, which in the passage now quoted is rendered betray, is in many other passages translated deliver.

BETROTHMENT, a mutual promise or compact between two parties for a future marriage. The word imports as much as giving one's troth; that is, true faith, or promise. Among the ancient Jews, the betrothing was performed either by a writing, or by a piece of silver given to the bride in the presence of witnesses, as a pledge of their mutual engagements. After the marriage was contracted, the young people had the liberty of seeing each other, which was not allowed them before. If, after the betrothment, the bride should trespass against that fidelity she owed to her bridegroom, she was treated as an adulteress. Hence the address of the angel to Joseph, the betrothed husband of Mary: “But while he thought on these things, behold, the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost.” Matt. i. 20. Ten or twelve months commonly intervened between the ceremony of betrothment and the marriage. During this interval, the betrothed wife remained with her parents, that she might provide herself with nuptial ornaments suitable to her station. From the time of the espousals or betrothment, the bridegroom was at liberty to visit his espoused wife in the house of her father. That it was the practice to betroth the bride some time before the consummation of the marriage, we learn from Deut. xx. 7. Thus we find that Samson's wife remained with her parents a considerable time after espousals. Judg. xiv. 8. Among the early Christians the betrothment was nothing more than a formal agreement between the persons who intended to marry, made in the presence of witnesses, the number of whom was usually not less than ten, and ratified by pledges given by the man, viz., a ring engraven with some figure, emblematic of a Christian virtue, and a solemn kiss, which was a token very much in use among the Christians. The espousals usually lasted about two years, at the end of which the marriage was consummated.

God betroths or espouses his people to himself, when he leads them by faith into union with the Lord Jesus Christ, forming with him a relation so close, tender, and sacred, that they enjoy a saving interest in his person, righteousness, grace, and glory, and he and they may rejoice in one another. He betroths them for ever, by an everlasting covenant, that neither time, sin, nor anything else, can disannul; and in righteousness, consistently with his essential righteousness, and clothed with his imputed righteousness; and in judgment, with great wisdom and prudence; and in faithfulness, in fulfilment of his covenant and promise, and sincerely determined to fulfil the marriage trust towards them; and in loving-kindness and mercies to their persons, so base, wretched, guilty, vile, and rebellious. Song iii. 11; Hos. ii. 19, 20. Of this, ministers, by the preaching of the gospel, are means and instruments. 2 Cor. xi. 2.

BETTER. On the definite understanding of this little word, as used in Scripture, depends much of our right conception, both of the superior excellence of spiritual to providential blessings, and of the Christian dispensation to the Patriarchal and Mosaic, which preceded it. God's love is better than life, is more sweet, pleasant, profitable, sure, and honourable. Psal. lxxiii. 3. Christ's love is better than wine; we cannot sinfully exceed in desire of, and delight in it; it is enjoyed without money and without price; it never loses its sweetness and virtue; our living on it by faith renders us active, holy, and zealous for God, content with our lot, happy in ourselves, and a comfort to all around us. Song i. 2. His obedience and suffering are better sacrifices than the Jewish, in respect of matter, manner of oblation, efficacy, and fruit. Heb. ix. 23. His blood speaks better things than that of Abel; it purchases and procures full remission and eternal salvation to his enemies and murderers; whereas Abel's imprecated vengeance on his murderer. Heb. xii. 24. Christ, his fruit, Word, and saving instruction, are better than gold,—than rubies; are more valuable, delightful, useful, exalting, and durable. Prov. viii. 14–19, iii. 14; Psal. cxix. 72. His priesthood, and the promises of the gospel, are a better hope, a more clear, honourable, and extensive ground of hope, for all the blessings of time and eternity, than the Jewish sacrifices and shadows could be. Heb. vii. 19. The better covenant, established on better promises, is the covenant of grace, which, in respect of its party contracted with, its freedom, firmness, benefits conferred, honour and use, is far preferable to the covenant of works, and is better than the national covenant made with the Hebrews at Sinai; it promises far more valuable blessings than the quiet possession of the earthly Canaan, and is more sure and permanent; and the New Testament dispensation of it is far more spiritual, easy, clear, and extensive, than the Old. Heb. vii. 22, viii. 6. Our revelation is more plain, full, and extensive; our ordinances are more clear, spiritual, and easy; we have the substance of their ceremonies with infinite advantage, in Christ's birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension; have a more abundant and widespread effusion of the Holy Ghost, and a more eminent freedom from the impression of the broken law on our conscience. Heb. xi. 40.

A day in God's courts is better than a thousand elsewhere. Fellowship with him is infinitely more delightful, profitable, and honourable, than any earthly advantage. Psal. lxxxiv. 10. A little that a righteous man hath, his dinner of herbs, or dry morsel, is better than the wealth or delicate provision of the wicked. It springs from God's redeeming love, is blessed of him, is a pledge of glory, and a means of drawing the affections and thoughts to God in Christ. Psal. xxxvii. 16; Prov. xv. 16, 17, xvi. 8, xvii. 1. The saints' resurrection is better, more glorious and happy than a recovery from a state of affliction, or a miraculous restoration to natural life, or the resurrection of the wicked to everlasting damnation. Heb. xi. 35. Heaven is a better country; its inhabitants, exercises, and enjoyments, are far more holy, honoured, and happy, than those on earth; and to be with Christ is far better than to be with saints and ordinances on earth; as one is freed from every stain of sin, every temptation and trouble, and clearly sees, and fully delights in God as his all in all. Heb. xi. 16; Phil. i. 23.

BEULAH (married), a name given to the Jewish Church, importing its marriage with God, as their husband and sovereign Lord: "Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate: but thou shalt be called Hephzibah, and thy land Beulah: for the Lord delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married." Isa. lxii. 4.

BEVERAGE. See DRINK.

BEWARE. To beware of Christ, is to have a due and holy awe of him on our spirit, and carefully guard against everything tending to offend him. Exod. xxiii. 21. To beware of men, is to take heed lest they deceive us. Mark xii. 38. To beware of sin, is to avoid every appearance of it, and temptation to it, and to the utmost of our power watch against and oppose it. Matt. xvi. 6.

BEWITCH, wickedly to deceive and hurt by juggling tricks and diabolic charms. Acts viii. 9. False teachers bewitch men, when, by Satanic methods of guileful reasonings, specious pretences to holiness or learning, apparent miracles, or proud boasting, they deceive their mind, and destroy their soul. Gal. iii. i.

BEYOND. To know the signification of beyond, on the other side, or, on this side, it is necessary to know where the sacred writer was at the time of writing. Thus, beyond, or on the other side of Jordan, with Moses, who gave his finished books to the Hebrews eastward of Jordan, signifies the west side of that river; while such as lived or wrote on the west side of Jordan, call the east side beyond, or the other side. Deut. iii. 25, xi. 30; Josh. ix. 10, xiii. 8. Some critics think the Hebrew word Hheber ought sometimes to be rendered on this side, as Josh. xii. 7; Deut. i. 1. Beyond measure, is exceedingly, or more than is usually expected in the circumstances. Mark vi. 51. To go beyond and defraud, is to exceed the conditions of a bargain, and laws of honesty, or to transgress the rules of chastity and rites of marriage. 1 Thess. iv. 6.

BEZA, THEODORE, one of the most eminent of the reformers. He was born at Vezelai in Burgundy, on the 24th June 1519. Brought up by an uncle, who was counsellor of the Parliament of Paris, his studies were at first directed to the law; but the bent of his mind being towards classical studies, he spent most of his time in reading the Greek and Roman authors, and acquired great celebrity as a writer of Latin poetry. During the whole course of his studies he professed the Roman Catholic faith, and his habits were loose and licentious. At this period of his life the poetical effusions which he published were of an immoral and irreligious tendency. It pleased God, however, to arrest the profligate youth in his career of wickedness; and being laid upon a sick-bed, the Spirit of God aroused him to a sense of his folly, and led him to right views of Divine truth. His mind had been early imbued with the principles of the reformed faith, under the instructions of his Protestant tutor, Melchior Wolmar, and having revolved the subject in his mind during his illness, no sooner had he recovered his wonted health than he repaired to Geneva, and having publicly abjured Popish error, declared his adherence to the Reformed Church. In 1549 he accepted of the Greek professorship at Lausanne, which he held for ten years; and during that time he read lectures in French on the New Testament to the refugees of both sexes who dwelt in that city. From Lausanne he passed to Geneva, where he became the colleague of Calvin, both in the church and in the university. Two years after this he took a prominent part in the conference at Poissy, where he defended the reformed doctrines with great ability and success. In the civil war which followed, Beza had a share, and was present at the battle of Dreux. In 1563 he returned to Geneva, where he succeeded Calvin in his offices and influence, and was from that time considered as the head of the Calvinistic Church. He wrote a Latin translation of the New Testament, with annotations,—a work of peculiar excellence, and which Doddridge describes as an “invaluable treasure.” After an exceedingly active life, he died on the 13th October 1605. His services to the cause of the Reformed Church cannot be estimated at too high a rate.

BEZALEEL, the son of Uri, and a “workman in gold, and silver, and brass, and in cutting of stones to set them, and in carving of timber, to work in all manner of workmanship.” His name signifies “under the shadow of God.” He was the seventh in descent from Judah, and his genealogy is given in 1 Chron. ii. 13–20. No further information concerning him is found in the Sacred Scriptures.

BEZEK, a city where Saul reviewed his army, before he marched against Jabesh-gilead. 1 Sam. xi. 8. It was situated in the tribe of Judah, and is supposed to have been the capital of the kingdom of Adoni-bezek. Judg. i. 4–7. Calmet is of opinion that Bezek was situated near the passage of the Jordan at Beth-shan. Eusebius says there were two cities of this name near one another, seven miles from Sichem, in the way to Scythopolis.

BEZER, a city beyond Jordan, sometimes said to belong to Moab, and sometimes to Edom. It was assigned by Moses to the tribe of Reuben, and was one of the cities of refuge. It is termed “Bezer in the wilderness” by the sacred historians, and was given to the Levites of Gershom’s family. Joshua xx. 8.

BIBLE, the Book, the name applied by Christians, by way of eminence, to the collection of sacred writings of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments.

I. BIBLE, History of.—It is thought that Ezra published the Scriptures in the Chaldee character; for that language being generally used among the Jews, he thought proper to change the old Hebrew character for it, which hath since that time been retained only by the Samaritans, among whom it is preserved to this day. Prideaux is of opinion that Ezra made additions in several parts of the Bible, where anything appeared necessary for illustrating, connecting, or completing the work; in which he appears to have been assisted by the same Spirit in which they were first written. Among such additions are to be reckoned the last chapter of Deuteronomy, wherein Moses seems to give an account of his own death and burial, and the succession of Joshua after him. To the same cause our learned author thinks are to be attributed many other interpolations in the Bible, which created difficulties and objections to the authenticity of the sacred text, noways to be solved without allowing them. Ezra changed the names of several places which were grown obsolete; and, instead of them, put their new names, by which they were then called in the text. Thus it is that Abraham is said to have pursued the kings who carried Lot away captive as far as Dan; whereas that place in Moses’ time was called Laish, the name Dan being unknown till the Danites, long after the death of Moses, possessed themselves of it. The Jewish canon of Scripture was then settled by Ezra, yet not so but that several variations have been made in it. Malachi, for instance, could not be put in the Bible by him, since that prophet is allowed to have lived after Ezra; nor could Nehemiah be there, since that book mentions (xii. 22) Jaddua as high priest, and Darius Codomanus as king of Persia, who were, at least, a hundred years later than Ezra. It may be added, that, in the First Book of Chronicles, the genealogy of the sons of Zerubbabel is carried down for so many generations as must necessarily bring it to the time of Alexander; and consequently this book, or at least this part of it, could not be in the canon in Ezra’s days. It is probable the two Books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and Malachi, were adopted into the Bible in the time of Simon the Just, the last of the men of the great synagogue.

The Jews at first were very reserved in communicating their Scriptures to strangers, not disclosing to them any of the treasures concealed in the Bible. We may add, that the people bordering on the Jews, as the Egyptians, Phœnicians, Arabs, &c., were not very curious to know the laws or history of a people whom in their turn they hated and despised. Their first acquaintance with these books was not till after the several captivities of the Jews, when the singularity of the Hebrew laws and ceremonies induced several to desire a more particular knowledge of them. Josephus seems surprised to find such slight footsteps of the Scripture history interspersed in the Egyptian, Chaldean, Phœnician, and Grecian history; and accounts for it hence, that the sacred books were not as yet translated into Greek or other languages, and consequently not known to the writers of those nations. The first version of the Bible was that of the Septuagint into Greek, by order of that patron of literature, Ptolemy Philadelphus; though some maintain that the whole was not then translated, but only the Pentateuch; between which and the other books in the Septuagint version, the critics find a great diversity in point of style and expression, as well as of accuracy. The Septuagint version is useful, as showing what the Jews of that period understood to be the meaning of the Hebrew expression.

II. BIBLE, Ancient Divisions and Order of.—After the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, Ezra collected as many copies as he could of the Sacred Writings, and out of them all prepared a correct edition, arranging the several books in their proper order. These books he divided into three parts:—I. The Law. II. The Prophets. III. The Hagiographa; that is, the holy writings. I. The Law contains,—1. Genesis; 2. Exodus; 3. Leviticus; 4. Numbers; 5. Deuteronomy. II. The writings of the Prophets are,—1. Joshua; 2. Judges, with Ruth; 3. Samuel; 4. Kings; 5. Isaiah; 6. Jeremiah, with his Lamentations; 7. Ezekiel; 8. Daniel; 9. The twelve minor prophets; 10. Job; 11. Ezra; 12. Nehemiah; 13. Esther. III. The Hagiographa consists of,—1. The Psalms; 2. The Proverbs; 3. Ecclesiastes; 4. The Song of Solomon. This division was made for the sake of reducing the number of the sacred books to the number of the letters in their alphabet, which amount to twenty-two. Afterwards the Jews reckoned twenty-four books in their canon of Scripture, in disposing of which, the Law stood as in the former division, and the Prophets were distributed into former and latter. The former Prophets are, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings; the latter prophets are, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets; and the Hagiographa consists of the Psalms, the Proverbs, Job, the Song of Solomon, Ruth, the Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, the Chronicles. Under the name of Ezra they comprehend Nehemiah. This order hath not always been observed, but the variations from it are of no moment. The five books of the Law are divided into fifty-four sections. This division many of the Jews hold to have been appointed by Moses himself; but others, with more probability, ascribe it to Ezra. The design of this division was, that one of these sections might be read in their synagogues every Sabbath-day. The number was fifty-four, because in their intercalated years, a month being then added, there were fifty-four Sabbaths. In other years they reduced them to fifty-two, by twice joining together two short sections.

III. BIBLE, Modern Divisions of.—The division of the Scriptures into chapters, as we at present have them, is of modern date. Some attribute it to Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, in the reigns of John and Henry III.; but the true author of the invention was Hugo de Sancto Caro, commonly called Hugo Cardinalis, because he was the first Dominican that ever was raised to the degree of cardinal. This Hugo flourished about A.D. 1240. He wrote a comment on the Scriptures, and projected the first concordance, which is that of the vulgar Latin Bible. The aim of this work being for the more easy finding out any word or passage in the Scriptures, he found it necessary to divide the book into sections, and the sections into subdivisions; for till that time the vulgar Latin Bibles were without any division at all. These sections are the chapters into which the Bible hath ever since been divided; but the subdivision of the chapters was not then into verses, as it is now. Hugo's method of subdividing them was by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G, placed in the margin, at an equal distance from each other, according to the length of the chapters. The subdivision of the chapters into verses, as they now stand in our Bibles, had its original from a famous Jewish rabbi, named Mordecai Nathan, about 1445. This rabbi, in imitation of Hugo Cardinalis, drew up a concordance to the Hebrew Bible, for the use of the Jews. But though he followed Hngo in his division of the books into chapters, he refined upon his inventions as to the subdivision, and contrived that by verses. This being found to be a much more convenient method, it has been ever since followed. And thus, as the Jews borrowed the division of the books of the Holy Scriptures into chapters from the Christians, in like manner the Christians borrowed that of the chapters into verses from the Jews. The present order of the several books is almost the same (the Apocrypha excepted) as that made by the Council of Trent.

IV. BIBLE, Rejected Books of.—The apocryphal books of the Old Testament, according to the Romanists, are the book of Enoch, the third and fourth books of Esdras, the third and fourth books of Maccabees, the prayer of Manasseh, the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Psalter of Solomon, and some other pieces of this nature. The apocryphal books of the New Testament are the Epistle of St Barnabas, the pretended Epistle of St Paul to the Laodiceans, several spurious Gospels, Acts of the Apostles and Revelations; the book of Hermas, entitled the Shepherd; Jesus Christ's Letter to Abgarus; the Epistles of St Paul to Seneca, and several others of the like nature; as may be seen in the collection of the apocryphal writings made by Fabricius. Protestants, while they agree with the Roman Catholics in rejecting all those as uncanonical, have also justly rejected the works of Tobit, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, and the first and second books of Maccabees.

In the most corrupt periods of the Jewish Church of old, a marked distinction was always made between the Sacred Scriptures and the dictates of mere tradition. The latter, doubtless, in extent of influence, gained a most unwarrantable and pernicious ascendancy over the former. Still these two sources of authority were never confounded.

V. The first English Bible we read of was that translated by J. Wicliffe, about the year 1380, but never printed, though there are MS. copies of it in several of the public libraries. This translation was wonderfully correct, considering the early period at which it was accomplished. J. de Trevisa, who died about 1398, is also said to have translated the whole Bible; but whether any copies of it are remaining does not appear. The first printed Bible in our language was that translated by W. Tyndale, assisted by Miles Coverdale, printed abroad in 1525; but most of the copies were bought up and burnt by Bishop Tonstal and Sir Thomas More. Tyndale's first publication only contained the New Testament, and was revised and republished by him in 1530. The prologues and prefaces added to it, reflect on the bishops and clergy; but this edition was also suppressed, and the copies burnt. Amid many difficulties and discouragements, the good man continued to prosecute his labours, assisted by his associates, and even after he had been lodged in prison he still proceeded with the translation of the Old Testament. On Tyndale's death, his work was carried on by Coverdale and John Rogers (superintendent of an English church in Germany, and the first martyr in the reign of Queen Mary), who translated the Apocrypha, and revised Tyndale's translation, comparing it with the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German, and adding prefaces and notes from Luther's Bible. He dedicated the whole to Henry VIII., in 1537, under the borrowed name of Thomas Matthews; whence this has been usually called Matthew's Bible. It was printed at Ham-burg, and license obtained for publishing it in England, by the favour of Archbishop Cranmer.

The first Bible printed by authority in England, and publicly set up in churches, was the same Tyndale's version, revised and compared with the Hebrew, and in many places amended by Miles Coverdale, afterwards Bishop of Exeter; and examined after him by Archbishop Cranmer, who added a preface to it,—whence this was called Craumer's Bible. It was printed by Grafton, off the largest volume, and published in 1540; and, by a royal proclamation, every parish was obliged to set one of the copies in their church, under the penalty of forty shillings a month; yet, two years after, the Popish bishops obtained its suppression by the king. It was restored under Edward VI., suppressed again in Queen Mary's reign, and restored again in the first year of Queen Elizabeth, and a new edition of it given in 1562. Some English exiles at Geneva, in Queen Mary's reign, viz., Coverdale, Goodman, Gilby, Sampson, Cole, Wittingham, and, as some say, Knox, made a new translation, printed there in 1560, the New Testament having been printed in 1557; hence called the Geneva Bible, containing the variations of readings, marginal annotations, &c., on account of which it was much valued by the Puritan party in that and the following reigns. Archbishop Parker resolved on a new translation for the public use of the Church, and engaged the bishops and other learned men to take each a share or portion; these being afterwards joined together and printed, with short annotations, in 1568, in large folio, made what was afterwards called the Great English Bible, and commonly the Bishops' Bible. In 1589, it was also published in octavo, in a small, but fine black letter; and here the chapters were divided into verses, but without any breaks for them, in which the method of the Geneva Bible was followed, which was the first English Bible where any distinction of verses was made. It was afterwards printed in large folio, with corrections, and several prolegomena, in 1572. This is called Matthew Parker's Bible. The initial letters of each translator's name were put at the end of his part. For example, at the end of the Pentateuch, W. E., for William Exon,—that is, William, bishop of Exeter, whose allotment ended there; at the end of Sammel, R. M., for Richard Menevensis, or bishop of St David's, to whom the second allotment fell; and the like of the rest. The archbishop oversaw, directed, examined, and finished the whole. This translation was used in the churches for forty years, though the Geneva Bible was more read in private houses, being printed above twenty times in as many years. King James bore it an inveterate hatred on account of the notes, which, at the Hampton Court Conference, he charged as partial, untrue, and seditious. The Bishops' Bible, too, had its faults. The king frankly owned that he had seen no good translation of the Bible in English; but he thought that of Geneva the worst of all. After the translation of the Bible by the bishops, two other private versions had been made of the New Testament,—the first by Laurence Thompson, from Beza's Latin edition, with the notes of Beza, published in 1582, in quarto, and afterwards in 1589, varying very little from the Geneva Bible; the second by the Papists at Rheims, in 1584, called the Rhemish Bible, or Rhemish Translation. These, finding it impossible to keep the people from having the Scriptures in their vulgar tongue, resolved to give a version of their own, as favourable to their cause as might be. It was printed on a large paper, with a fair letter and margin. One complaint against it was, its retaining a multitude of Hebrew and Greek words untranslated, for want, as the editors express it, of proper and adequate terms in the English to render them by. However, many of the copies were seized by the queen's searchers, and confiscated; and Thomas Cartwright was solicited by Secretary Walsingham to refute it; but, after a good progress made therein, Archbishop Whitgift prohibited his further proceeding, as judging it improper that the doctrine of the Church of England should be committed to the defence of a Puritan, and appointed Dr Fulke in his place, who refuted the Rhemists with great spirit and learning. Cartwright's Refutation was also afterwards published in 1618, under Archbishop Abbot. About thirty years after their New Testament was printed, the Roman Catholics published a translation of the Old at Douay, 1609–10, from the Vulgate, with annotations, so that the English Roman Catholics have now the whole Bible in their mother tongue; though, it is to be observed, they are forbidden to read it without a license from their superiors.

The last English Bible was that which proceeded from the Hampton Court Conference, held in 1604, where, many exceptions being made to the Bishops' Bible, King James gave order for a new one; not, as the preface expresses it, for a translation altogether new, nor yet to make a good one better; or, of many good ones, one best. Fifty-four learned men were appointed to this office by the king, as appears by his letter to the archbishop, dated 1604, which being three years before the translation was entered upon, it is probable seven of them were either dead or had declined the task, since Fuller's list of the translators makes but forty-seven,—who, being ranged under six divisions, entered on their province in 1607. It was published in 1611, with a dedication to James, and a learned preface, and is commonly called King James's Bible. After this, all the other versions dropped, and fell into disuse, except the Epistles and Gospels in the Common Prayer Book, which were still continued according to the Bishops' translation, till the alteration of the liturgy in 1661, and the psalms and hymns, which are to this day continued as in the old version. The judicious Selden, in his Table-Talk, speaking of the Bible, says: "The English translation of the Bible is the best translation in the world, and renders the sense of the original best, taking in for the English translation the Bishops' Bible as well as King James's. The translators in King James's time took an excellent way. That part of the Bible was given to him who was most excellent in such a tongue (as the Apocrypha to Andrew Downs), and then they met together, and one read the translation, the rest holding in their hands some Bible, either of the learned tongues, or French, Spanish, or Italian, &c. If they found any fault, they spoke; if not, he read on." King James's Bible is that now read by authority in all the churches in Britain. Notwithstanding, however, the excellency of this translation, it must be acknowledged that our increasing acquaintance with Oriental customs and manners, and the changes our language has undergone since King James's time, are very powerful arguments for a new translation, or at least a correction of the old one. A very considerable change has been unwarrantably introduced into the text in the subsequent editions, by turning into italics what did not thus appear in the editio princeps and several which followed it; by means of which numerous passages are rendered unavoidably perplexing to the English reader. For full information as to the history of the English Bible, the reader may be referred to an admirable work on the subject by the late Rev. Christopher Anderson of Edinburgh.

BIBLICAL ANTIQUITIES. The science of archæology, or of antiquities, has been a favourite study of the learned; but the investigation of sacred antiquities is so important in its bearing upon a full understanding of the Sacred Writings, that it may be regarded as an indispensable accomplishment of the Bible student. To enter thoroughly into the spirit and meaning of the ancient Records of Inspiration, we must become familiar with the manners,—the dress,—the domestic peculiarities of patriarchal life. We must penetrate, in idea, the family circles, and mingle in the society of the ancient Jews. It is impossible, indeed, to be completely versant in the writings of the Hebrews, without a minute acquaintance with their political, ecclesiastical, and civil state. The customs and manners of Eastern nations differ so widely from those of the West; their sacred rites are so peculiar; their whole phraseology and idioms are so bound up with their habits and modes of thinking, that, to interpret accurately the Jewish writings, we must transport ourselves, as it were, to the East, and study the customs, whether political, sacred, or civil, which obtained there. And the acquisition of a knowledge of sacred antiquities is comparatively easy, from the tenacious adherence of the Orientals to ancient usages, and the light which may, therefore, be thrown on the interpretation of the Bible by a perusal of the voyages and travels of those who have explored the East.

BIBLICAL CRITICISM, is the science by which we arrive at a satisfactory acquaintance with the origin, history, and present state of the original text of Scripture. In the wide extent of its investigations, it embraces the languages in which the Scriptures were originally written, together with the cognate or kindred dialects; the materials used for writing; the composition, collection, and preservation of the different books; the age, character, and relationships of manuscripts; the ancient versions; the various readings; the printed editions; and the various philological and historical means to be employed in order to determine what the text was as it proceeded from the original penmen. It has been divided into two kinds,—lower criticism, which is more of a verbal and historical nature, and is confined to the words, or the collocation of the words, as they stand in the manuscript or printed texts, the ancient versions, and other legitimate sources of appeal; and higher criticism, which consists in the exercise of the judgment in reference to the text, on grounds taken from the nature, form, method, subject, or arguments of the different books; the nature and connection of the context; the relation of passages to each other; the known circumstances of the writers, and those of the persons for whose immediate use they wrote. Of the two, the former is obviously the more important, as it presents a firm basis on which to rest our investigations; the latter, lying more open to conjecture and variety of opinion, may easily be abused, and has, indeed, been carried to a most unwarrantable length by many German critics.

Very little of the lower criticism is now required in the study of the Old Testament. The scrupulous care of the ancient Jewish transcribers has precluded the occurrence of any important errors. In the study of the New Testament, however, there is still much to be done in this department. Our Lectio Recepta of the Greek Testament is from the edition of the Elzevirs, published in 1624. It is conformed chiefly to the edition of Beza, but partly to the peculiar views of the editors. It is not known, however, on what principles exactly the Elzevirian text was formed. Meanwhile, the number of the various readings which are discovered in the progress of the New Testament study increases. Mill had collected thirty thousand in the year 1760, and about fifteen thousand may have been added since that time. Bengel was the first who reduced the various readings of the codices to distinct classes. His undertaking was further prosecuted by Griesbach, who took the received text for the basis of his edition, and altered this text in cases of importance only. Unimportant errors, however, may be found in the received text. Lachmann, accordingly, setting aside the received text, resolved to construct a text which should be accommodated exclusively to the united authority of the oldest manuscripts. The consequence of adopting this principle has been, that Lachmann has been sometimes obliged to adopt the readings which are authorised by only a single codex; and, besides all, the most ancient codices contain sometimes the same errors of the copyist, and these errors are, therefore, adopted by Lachmann.

The chief object of the higher criticism is, to examine the authenticity and integrity of the sacred books. From the time of the reformers down to a comparatively recent period, a regard to the cause of orthodoxy prevented the students of biblical criticism from indulging in a reckless and unfettered interference, not only with the verbal phraseology, but with the doctrines of revelation. Towards the year 1770, however, Semler and Eichhorn introduced another and a very different mode of critical investigation. Feeling little regard to the authority of the Bible as an inspired volume, their whole inquiries proceeded upon the principles of the Rationalistic system, which involved the assumption that miracles and prophecies are impossible; and they, accordingly, rejected the authenticity of the sacred books. For more than half a century has Rationalism prevailed in Germany to a melancholy extent, but of late years a more orthodox system of criticism has been gradually diffusing itself in the German universities; and it is earnestly to be hoped that Rationalism will give place, ere long, to a purer, more philosophical, and more Christian system of biblical criticism.

The study of this department of theology is indispensable to an intelligent and able and accurate exposition of the Word of God. Before any man can proceed with confidence to interpret the Bible, he must be assured that the text which he interprets is correct, or, in other words, that it approaches as nearly as possible to the original writing of the author. If such a principle be considered necessary in mere human productions, how much more is it necessary in those which are Divine! The object of the biblical critic is not to surrender the Scriptures to the uncertainties of conjectural emendations, but, by examining, comparing, and carefully collating the text in various manuscripts and versions, to ascertain, with as much certainty as possible, that what he is expounding is in reality, as it professes to be, the Word of God.

BIBLICAL GEOGRAPHY. The Old and New Testaments are chiefly occupied with scenes that occurred in Palestine. The knowledge of the geography of that and the neighbouring countries, is absolutely necessary, therefore, to elucidate the meaning of innumerable passages in the Sacred Scriptures. In reading any narrative whatever, we naturally feel a desire to know something of the place and the circumstances in which the incidents occurred. And this desire cannot but be enhanced, when we reflect on the importance and magnitude of those events which are recorded in the Scriptures. "The man is little to be envied," says Dr Johnson, "whose patriotism would not gain force on the plains of Marathon, or whose piety would not grow warmer among the ruins of Iona." A similar, but far higher and purer feeling, should lead us to take a like interest in the geography of the Bible. The events which are recorded there, are far more deeply interesting than those of any other history. Accordingly, the enthusiasm of the Eastern traveller involuntarily bursts forth as he treads the scenes, and gazes upon the objects, referred to in the Bible. "I have visited," says Chateaubriand, "the Tiber with enthusiasm, and have examined with similar interest the Eurotas and the Cephissus; but I cannot tell what I experienced on seeing the Jordan. Not only did the river recall to me a famous antiquity, and one of the fairest names which the most beautiful poetry hath intrusted to the memory of man, but its streams presented me with the scenes of the miracles of my religion. Judea is the only country of the earth which recalls to the traveller the recollection of things human and things Divine, and which causes to spring up in the bottom of the soul, by this blending, thoughts and feelings which no other place can inspire." The principal sources of biblical geography, are the Scriptures themselves, the works of Jewish, Greek, and other writers, who have treated of the different countries mentioned in the Bible. And in addition to these, much light has been thrown on the geography of Scriptures, by the various modern travellers who have visited the Eastern countries. "There are passages in the classic authors," to use the language of Dr Welsh, "which no commentator could explain, were it not for the aids afforded by travellers of classic taste, who have visited the very scenes which awakened the genius of the gifted men of Greece and Rome; and innumerable scriptural illustrations of a similar nature, are to be found in the writings of those who have travelled in Eastern countries. It is not only, however, as giving us a key to local allusions or descriptions, that an acquaintance with the features of other countries is necessary. If we would enter into the spirit of an author, if we would go along with him in the train of his emotions, and perceive the force and beauty of the thoughts that he mingles together, and of the images on which he delights to dwell, we must realise the circumstances in which he wrote; and not only have as much knowledge of remote usages and national peculiarities as may enable us to explain what is palpably difficult; we must place ourselves in the atmosphere in which he breathed, and surround ourselves with the objects of his scenery." The principal writers on sacred geography are, Bochart, Michaelis, Reland, Wells, and Robinson. Dr Wilson, also, in his 'Lands of the Bible,' has added not a little to our knowledge of the geography of the places mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION, the science of expounding the meaning or setting forth the true sense of Scripture. This, it is obvious, when applied to the Bible, presupposes an intimate acquaintance with Biblical criticism, the geography of the ancient world, particularly of Palestine, the manners and customs of the Jews, as well as of Oriental nations generally, the civil, religious, and political history of the nations of antiquity. In interpreting the Bible, various modes are adopted. 1. The Literal or Grammatical sense may be brought out, which unfolds the plain meaning of the words in their natural and proper acceptation. 2. The Historical sense, or the meaning as drawn from the nature of the subject, and the genius, manners, and circumstances of the writer. 3. The Allegorical sense, when, besides the literal meaning, a metaphorical sense is brought out, bearing upon some point of spiritual doctrine. 4. The Typical sense, when, under external objects or prophetic visions, secret things, whether present or future, are represented. 5. The Parabolical sense, when, besides the plain and obvious meaning of the related, an occult or spiritual sense is intended. 6. The Spiritual sense, or that meaning which a true, enlightened Christian derives from the passage viewed in connection with the analogy of faith. The following rules of interpretation, given by Mr Horne, in his 'Critical Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures,' may be useful:—

"1. The most simple sense is always that which is most likely to be the genuine meaning.

"2. We ought not to affirm or deny more than the inspired penmen affirmed or denied at the time when they wrote; consequently we should be more willing to take a sense from Scripture, than to bring one to it.

"3. Before we conclude upon the sense of a text, so as to prove any thing by means of it, we must be sure that such sense is not repugnant to natural reason.

"4. Although the plain, obvious, and literal sense of a passage may not always exhibit the mind of the Holy Spirit, yet it is ordinarily to be preferred to the figurative sense, and is not to be rashly abandoned unless absolute and evident necessity require such literal sense to be given up. Thus, the strict sense of the letter of Scripture may be departed from—(1.) Where words properly taken contain any thing repugnant to the doctrinal or moral precepts delivered in other parts of the Scripture. (2.) If the Holy Spirit, who is the best interpreter of his own words, elsewhere deliver his mind concerning the same thing in proper and clearer words, the latter are preferably to be adopted. (3.) Where the proper signification presents a meaning that is either absurd or manifestly contrary to truth, it must necessarily be given up."

To ascertain the true meaning, and thus rightly to interpret the Scriptures, Dr Hill makes the following valuable suggestions:—"1. One method which should be employed with a view to ascertain the sense of Scripture is to compare it with itself. 2. In studying the Scriptures it is necessary to attend to their scope and design. 3. It is necessary to attend carefully to the nature of the composition, in different passages of Scripture, which is literal or figurative. 4. Another assistance in understanding the Scriptures is the analogy of faith, which signifies that we should explain passages that are obscure or doubtful, by the general sense of Scripture previously ascertained.

5. In interpreting the Scriptures there are external sources from which assistance is to be derived; such as chronology and geography, which have been termed the two eyes of history; a knowledge of profane history; an acquaintance with natural history and the arts of life; a knowledge of ancient customs and manners."

These may be laid down as elementary rules or laws, which it were well that the diligent and anxious interpreter of the Bible should carefully weigh. But above all, there should ever rest upon his mind a deep sense of the responsibility which attaches to his office, and of the necessity which lies upon him habitually and earnestly to pray for the guidance and teaching of that Spirit by whose inspiration the Bible was penned, and without whose teaching it will remain a sealed book. There is no department of the science of theology which has been more frequently perverted than that which concerns itself with the interpretation of God's Word; and prayer, therefore, is especially incumbent, that the Spirit of Truth may keep from error and guide into all truth.

BIBLICISTS, or BIBLICI, a class of divines in the twelfth century, who, in opposition to the scholastics, and in conformity with the example of the ancient doctors, drew their systems of theology from the Holy Scriptures, as illustrated by the writings of the fathers. In this last particular they differed from the Waldenses, whose theology was purely biblical. They were also opposed to the Mystics. Paris was the centre of their influence, and was, at this time, frequented by students of divinity from all parts of Europe, who resorted thither in crowds, to receive instruction from the most celebrated masters in the biblical, mystic, and scholastic theology. The Biblicists were sometimes distinguished by the title of Positivi, or Ancient Theologists, because they explained the doctrines of religion in a plain and simple manner, by passages drawn from the Holy Scriptures, from the decrees of councils, and the writings of the ancient doctors; and very rarely made use of the aids of reason or philosophy in their theological lectures, though they did not reject them altogether. Of this class were St Bernard, Peter (surnamed the Chanter), Walter of St Victor, and others. Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, Lanfranc, and Hildebert, of the preceding century, were their chief models.

BIER, an open board on which, in the East, a corpse was laid, to be carried out to burial. A shroud was thrown over the bier to conceal the dead body from the spectators. Upon one of these was carried forth the widow of Nain's son, whom our Lord raised to life, and restored to his mother. In the account given of the funeral of Abner, the Hebrew word rendered bier, signifies properly a bed. Hence, many learned men are of opinion, that in very early times, the dead were carried to the place of burial in their own bed. The bier, however, of Eastern countries, is a plain wooden board, supported by two long poles. Dr Henderson tells us that in the Crimea this simple mode of burial prevails among the Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans, with the exception of the European families, who naturally conform to the rites of their ancestors.

BIGOTRY. It consists in being obstinately and perversely attached to our own opinions; or, as some have better defined it, "a tenacious adherence to a system or opinion, adopted without investigation, and defended without argument, accompanied with a malignant, intolerant spirit towards all who differ."

It must be distinguished from love to truth, which influences a man to embrace it wherever he finds it; and from true zeal, which is an ardour of mind exciting its possessor conscientiously to defend and propagate the principles he maintains with the meekness of wisdom. Bigotry is a kind of prejudice, combined with a certain degree of malignity. It is thus exemplified and distinguished by a sensible writer:—"When Jesus preached, Prejudice cried, 'Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?' 'Crucify him, crucify him,' said Bigotry. 'Why, what evil hath he done?' replied Candour." Bigotry is most prevalent with those who are ignorant, who have taken up principles without due examination, and who are naturally of a morose and contracted disposition. It is often manifested more in unimportant sentiments, or the circumstantialia of religion, than the essentials of it. Simple bigotry is the spirit of persecution without the power; persecution is bigotry armed with power, and carrying its will into act. As it is the effect of ignorance, so it is the nurse of it, because it precludes free inquiry, and is an enemy to truth; it cuts also the very sinews of charity, and destroys moderation and mutual goodwill. If we consider the different structure of men's minds, our own ignorance, the liberty that all men have to think for themselves, the admirable example our Lord has set us of a contrary spirit, and the baneful effects of this disposition, we must at once be convinced of its impropriety. How contradictory is it to sound reason, and how inimical to the peaceful religion we profess to maintain as Christians! Mr Toplady quaintly, but justly remarks, "Bigots are like some trees that grow by the sea-shore, which do not spread their branches equally on all sides, but are blown awry and stand entirely one way." See CATHOLICISM—LIBERALITY—PERSECUTION.

BILLOWS. Grievous afflictions succeeding one another are called, in the Scriptures, God's waves or billows. Sent and ordered by God, they terrify, perplex, and threaten to destroy men. Psal. xlii. 7, lxxxviii. 7. This phrase also signifies frequently the Divine wrath which broke on Jesus' soul. Psal. lxix. 1, 2. The billows or swellings of Jordan denote the greatest trials, or perhaps death. Jer. xii. 5.

BIND and LOOSE. This expression occurs in Matt. xvi. 19—"And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." In ancient times, keys were generally regarded as an emblem of office or a symbol of authority. Thus God says, referring to the authority of Christ, "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder, and he shall open and none shall shut, and he shall shut and none shall open." The house of David represents the church of Christ; and when Jesus says, "I am he that hath the key of David," he is claiming to himself sole power and authority in his church. Whatever, then, may be the extent of the power which is given to the apostles in the passage just quoted, it must be something essentially different from the kingly power and authority of Christ. Again, the power here spoken of was limited to earth. "Whatever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven." It cannot, therefore, imply the power of forgiving sin as committed against God. He who is forgiven must be forgiven of God; for who can forgive sins but God only?

The man who is forgiven is justified; and "it is God that justifieth." The man who is forgiven is regenerated; and the sons of God are born, "not of the will of men, but of God." The use of the keys, then, the power of binding and loosing on earth, must be something which is competent to fallible and feeble men. What, then, is the power of the keys? As exercised by the apostles, it was a power peculiar to themselves. They sometimes inflicted miraculous punishments upon notorious offenders—as upon Ananias and Sapphira, and also upon Elymas the sorcerer—and they loosed persons in many cases from supernatural diseases. But the power of the keys, in so far as it has descended to the Christian ministry, simply implies two things—an authority to preach the gospel, and also to administer discipline in the church by inflicting and removing church censures. And their proceedings, when conducted agreeably to Scripture, are ratified in heaven.

BIOGRAPHY. The study of human character is one of the most interesting and instructive employments which can engage the mind of man. It sets before us the intricate operation of influences, both external and internal; the play of feelings, and affections, and passions,—all exhibiting the character of man in a diversity of aspects. But, if the investigation of the nature and varied qualities of the human being be, in every point of view, an object of peculiar interest, it is when brought into contact with Christian principle and motive that human character assumes its proper place as a subject of inquiry truly useful; and thus it is that the biography of a Christian is so well fitted at once to enlighten the mind, and to impress the heart of the reader. How often does it happen that understandings the most exalted rest in vague speculations, and take no trouble in reducing them to practice! The innumerable cases in which the principle is applicable seem to operate as preventives to its application in any. In biography, however, this disadvantage is obviated. The writer exhibits Christianity as operating in one case, and thus we are furnished with an interesting example of its operation. The advantages of Christian biography are numerous, but there is none which more obviously occurs to the mind of a reflecting reader than the peculiar insight which he thereby obtains into the varied workings of the renewed, as distinguished from the unrenewed, heart. The principles of religion are seen, not as matters of speculative belief, but in actual operation, influencing the whole character and conduct. With a living exemplification of Christianity thus set before us, we become more minutely and intimately acquainted with the diversified aspects of the believer's experience. A knowledge of this kind is of inestimable value. We feel more strongly impressed with the truth of the Christian scheme, by perceiving the wonderful effects to which it gives rise; we gradually learn to perceive how we ourselves may imbibe its sacred truths so as to influence our own hearts; we are constrained to examine ourselves, that we may discover whether our experience coincides with that which is brought under our notice; and we may, perhaps, be led, by the blessing of the Holy Spirit, to strive after the attainment of a more quickened and more marked progress in holiness than we have yet reached. It is thus that from the frailties and follies, as well as virtues, of those Christians whose lives are unfolded to us by the pen of a faithful biographer, we learn to deny ourselves to all sin, and to make progress in meekness for the inheritance of the saints in light. Hence it is that the Bible abounds in biographical sketches of the most beautiful and impressive kind. Men of like passions with ourselves are beheld in a vast variety of different circumstances and positions, from which we may deduce lessons the most instructive and beneficial. But the glorious example, held forth in the New Testament, is one which more than any other shows the value of Christian biography. The manifestation of God in the flesh has given a more palpable form to all our notions of God, both in his natural and his moral attributes. These have been exhibited to the world in a mode the most intimately connected with the ordinary sympathies and feelings of humanity; and by a view, therefore, of all that has been seen, and heard, and tasted, and handled of the Word of Life, we have learned both more satisfactorily and more impressively what God is, than we could have possibly learned from the most profound explanations of the subject. And the moral influence has been remarkably powerful. Holiness has been embodied in human form, and thus what was in danger of exercising only a vague and undefined impression, has been brought home to us with all the freshness and force of a living example; and, accordingly, to urge upon us the importance of any Christian grace, no argument is more frequently resorted to in the apostolic epistles than the example of our blessed Lord. All that was exhibited of his character and doings upon earth, is put forth as affording palpable and impressive illustrations of the true nature and extent of our duty to God and to man. By such frequent and urgent appeals to a living example,—to One who himself was bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh,—are we forcibly reminded that, as in our ordinary thoughts and emotions, so here also we ought to be influenced by what has been actually "seen, and heard, and handled." Powerfully affected as our minds usually are by material objects, both in our intellectual processes and our moral emotions, the apostles skilfully avail themselves of this important law of our physical constitution, and bring forward the example of Christ as the most effective motive wherewith to bear upon the hearts and the consciences of men.

BIRDS, one of the most beautiful and numerous classes of animated nature. A few introductory observations may be permitted, before we proceed to describe the several individuals that are presented to our notice, in reviewing the ornithology of the Bible.

The common name for a bird in the Hebrew Scriptures, is tzeaphur, the rapid mover, or hurrier; a name very expressive of these volatile creatures. A more general and indefinite name is ouph, a flier; but this appellation denotes everything that flies, whether bird or insect. It is frequently translated "fowl," in the English Bible. A bird of prey is called oith, a rusher, from the impetuosity with which it rushes upon its prey. In several of the passages where it occurs, our translators have rendered its plural form by "fowls."

The first thing which claims our attention, is the structure of the feathered tribes. In a comparative view with man, their formation seems much ruder and more imperfect; and they are in general found incapable of the docility even of quadrupeds. To these, however, they hold the next rank, and far surpass fishes and insects, both in the structure of their bodies, and in their sagacity.

In reference to the structure of birds of the most perfect order, a few things demand our attention.

The whole body is shaped in the most convenient manner for making its way through the air; being, as Mr Ray observes, constructed very near Sir Isaac Newton's form of least resistance. According to Barr, in his continuation of Buffon, "it is neither extremely massive, nor equally substantial in all its parts; but being designed to rise in the air, is capable of expanding a large surface without solidity. The body is sharp before, to pierce and make its way through that element. It gradually increases in bulk, till it has acquired its just dimensions, and falls off in an expansive tail." The motion of birds being twofold, walking and flying, they are provided with legs, at once wonderfully contrived to walk with, and raise them like a spring for their flight; wings to buoy them up, and waft them along; and a tail to keep them steady in the air, assist them in their evolutions, and direct them in their course.

Although the feathery covering of birds is admirably constructed for lightness and buoyancy, their wings are furnished with a strength that is amazing; and by these they are enabled to impel themselves forward with an inconceivable rapidity. To fit them the better for their flight, the feathers are disposed in the most perfect order, lying one way; and that they may glide more smoothly along, they are furnished with a gland situated on the rump, from which they occasionally press out oil with the bill, and anoint the feathers.

Their beak or bill is a curious piece of art, formed of a hard, horny substance, constructed in the most commodious manner for piercing the air. Their ears stand not out from their head to retard their flight; and their eyes are placed in such situations as to take in nearly a hemisphere on either side.

Birds have no teeth to chew their food; but those of the granivorous kind are provided with two stomachs, in one of which the food is softened and macerated before it enters the other to be completely digested. Being often employed in traversing the upper regions, where they would be much incommoded did they bring forth their young in the manner of quadrupeds, their mode of generating is wisely made to differ, and their offspring are produced by means of eggs. In the speedy growth of young birds, by which they acquire a degree of strength and size, so as to be able so soon to provide for themselves, we have also an instance of the tender care of Providence.

What unscen power inspires these little creatures with "the passion of the groves," at the most fit season for forming their alliances; that is, when the genial temper of the weather covers the trees with leaves, the fields with grass, and produces such swarms of insects for the support of their future progeny? And how comes it to pass, that no sooner is the connubial league formed, than the little warblers immediately set about building their nests, and making preparation for their tender offspring? In the building of their nests, what art and ingenuity are displayed! Whether they are constructed from the collected portions of clay and mortar, or from the more light materials of moss and straw, they contrive to mould them into the most convenient forms, and to give them a durability proportionate to their wants. Nor is the wonder less, that birds of the same kind, however widely separated, should all follow the same order of architecture, in the construction of their habitations; that each should make choice of the situation most suitable to its kind; and that all should agree in laying as many eggs as to be sufficient to keep up their species, yet no more than they can conveniently hatch and bring up.

In the incubation, with what patience do these little creatures sit on their eggs when necessary, till the young are ready to be hatched, and then how officious in assisting the little prisoners to escape! With what inimitable care do they afterwards watch over and provide for their brood, until it is capable of doing so for itself; and with what scrupulous exactness, during this period, do they distribute to each its allotted portion of food!

The observations we have made are applicable to the feathery tribe in general; but when we turn to the peculiarities of a few of the different species, we shall observe that the wisdom and the goodness of God are no less conspicuous. How wonderful is the migration of some birds; or that surprising instinct by which "the stork in the heavens knoweth her appointed times," and "the crane and the swallow observe the time of their coming!" Jer. viii. 7.

These are a few of the proofs of the wisdom and goodness of God, which this part of creation exhibits; but, few as they are, they are sufficient to excite our admiration, and inspire us with sentiments of adoring gratitude to the Author of all being.

The number of birds already known amounts, we believe, to between three and four thousand. To distinguish the different kinds from each other, and the varieties of the same kind, when they happen to differ, is a work of great difficulty; and perhaps the attainment, when made, would not repay the labour. Linnaeus divides all birds into six classes, namely, birds of the rapacious kind, birds of the pie kind, birds of the poultry kind, birds of the sparrow kind, birds of the duck kind, and birds of the crane kind.

The first four comprehend the various kinds of land birds; the two last, those that belong to water.

From the Hebrew legislator, who had issued the strictest injunctions on the subject of animals, clean and unclean, we might naturally expect directions equally strict respecting birds; a class no less distinguished among themselves, by their qualities and modes of life. But here his animal characteristics, derived from the feet, failed; nor was it easy to fix on marks which should, in every instance, guide the learned and the unlearned to a right conclusion. Hence, there is not, in the Mosaic institutes, any reference to conformation, as the means of distinguishing birds into clean and unclean, lawful and unlawful; a list of exceptions forms the sacred directory, and certain kinds are forbidden, without a word concerning those that are allowed. Birds of prey generally are prohibited,—that is, those with crooked beaks and strong talons, whether they prey on fowls, on animals, or on fish; while those which eat vegetables are admitted. So that the same principle is admitted to a certain degree among birds as among beasts. The unclean birds may thus be classified according as they occupy the air, the land, or the water:—

BIRDS OF THE AIR.

Eagle, Ossifrage, Ospry, Vulture, Kite, Raven.

LAND BIRDS.

Owl, Night Hawk, Cuckoo, Hawk.

WATER BIRDS.

Little Owl, Cormorant, Great Owl, Swan, Pelican, Gier Eagle, Stork, Heron, Lapwing.

These are the unclean birds, to which may be added the Bat. Birds were offered for sacrifice on many occasions. The tenderness which the Jewish legislator exhibited to the feathered tribes is beautiful, when he orders the Israelites, if they find a bird's nest, not to take the dam with the young, but to suffer the old one to fly away, and to take the young only. Deut. xxii. 6, 7.

BIRTH. The feelings of a parent are very different in oriental countries when tidings are brought that a son is born, from his feelings at the announcement of the birth of a daughter. When a son is born, a servant is straightway despatched with the joyful news, and he is generally regarded as entitled to a reward. But, on the birth of a daughter, no such promptitude is manifested, no joyful feelings are experienced. Hence the language of Jeremiah (xx. 15) :—"Cursed be the man who brought tidings to my father, saying, A man child is born unto thee; making him very glad." It has been no uncommon practice in the East to expose children when they have been sickly or deformed. Hence Ezekiel, when referring to the wretched condition of the Israelites when oppressed by Pharaoh (xvi. 3-5) :—"And say, Thus saith the Lord God unto Jerusalem, Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an Amorite and thy mother a Hittite. And as for thy nativity, in the day thou wast born thy navel was not cut, neither wast thou washed in water to supple thee; thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at all. None eye pitied thee, to do any of these unto thee, to have compassion upon thee; but thou wast cast out in the open field, to the lothing of thy person, in the day that thou wast born." As soon as a child is born, it is committed to a nurse—if it be a boy, a male nurse is selected; but if it be a girl, a female nurse. The nurse generally felt a deep interest in the child throughout life. Hence Rebecca's nurse remained with her after her marriage to Isaac, and until her death. In speaking of new-born children, we are naturally reminded of the cruel edict of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, that the Hebrew midwives should not leave a single male child alive. Exod. i. 16. The construction of the words rendered "Hebrew midwives" is such, that it is doubtful whether the women referred to were Egyptian or Hebrew women. The names of the two mentioned in verse 15, and who were probably the leading persons in their profession, are Hebrew, not Egyptian; and in verse 17, they are said to have feared God, a description which seems to have marked them out as belonging to the race of the Hebrews. Josephus, probably to uphold the honour of his country, affirms that the women singled out by the tyrant for this deed of blood, were Egyptian women; but the evidence, we think, decidedly preponderates in favour of their being Hebrews. The time selected for the murder of the helpless babes was that when the new-born infant was put into a trough or vessel of stone for the purpose of being washed. The stone vessels thus referred to, are here translated "stools." This bloody command extended only to the male children, the reason of which is plain, as from them alone, at an after period, could the state fear any evil in case of an insurrection breaking out.

BIRTHRIGHT or PRIMOGENITURE, the right of the first-born or eldest son to a better inheritance than his brethren. "The following are usually enumerated as the principal privileges which constituted the distinction of the first-born: (1.) They were peculiarly given and consecrated to God, Exod. xxii. 29. (2.) They stood next in honour to their parents, Gen. xlix. 3. (3.) Had a double portion in the paternal inheritance, Deut. xxi. 17. (4.) Succeeded in the government of the family or kingdom, 2 Chron. xxi. 3; and (5.) were honoured with the office of priesthood, and the administration of the public worship of God. The phrase 'first-born,' therefore, was used to denote one who was peculiarly near and dear to his father, Exod. iv. 22, and higher than his brethren, Ps. lxxxix. 28; and typically pointed to Christ, and to all true Christians, who are joint-heirs with him to an eternal inheritance, and constitute the first-born whose names are written in heaven, (Heb. xii. 23.) It should be understood, that previously to the establishment of a priesthood under the law of Moses, the first-born had not only a preference in the secular inheritance, but succeeded exclusively to the priestly functions which had belonged to his father, in leading the religious observances of the family, and performing the simple religious rites of these patriarchal times. The secular part of the birthright entitled the first-born to a 'double portion' of the inheritance; but writers are divided in opinion as to the proportion of this double share. Some think that he had one half, and that the rest was equally divided among the other sons; but a careful consideration of Gen. xlvii. 5-22, in which we see that Jacob transfers the privilege of the first-born to Joseph, and that this privilege consisted in his having one share more than any of his brethren, inclines us to the opinion of the rabbins, that the first-born had merely twice as much as any other of his brethren. It is certainly possible, but not very likely, that in the emergency, Esau bartered all his birthright for a mess of pottage; but it seems more probable that Esau did not properly appreciate the value of the sacerdotal part of the birthright, and therefore readily transferred it to Jacob for a trifling present advantage. Hence he is called a 'profane person,' as despising his spiritual rather than his temporal privileges."

The privilege of exercising the priestly office was transferred, by the command of God, from the tribe of Reuben, to whom it belonged in right of primogeniture, to that of Levi. Numb. iii. 12. In consequence of this fact, that God had taken the Levites from among the children of Israel, instead of all the first-born, to serve him as priests, the first-born of the other tribes were to be redeemed at a valuation made by the priest, not exceeding five shekels, from serving in that capacity. Numb. xviii. 15, 16. "Hence it seems, that there had been an ancient claim of God to the first-born, as his own, or as the representative of the great First-born who should come in the fulness of time (and hence probably Eve's mistake in Gen. iv. 1, concerning Cain her first-born, 'I have gotten a man, or person, the very Jehovah,') which claim was renewed in Exod. iv. 22, and confined to a particular stock; 'Israel is my son, even my first-born.'"

"Now, this claim of God could not arise from his right to the first-born as Jehovah the Creator, for, as such, he certainly has a right to all, and so it is expressly said in Exod. xix. 5; but as Jehovah the Redeemer, whose office it was, when united to the human nature, to be the first-born among many brethren, and, as such, being the first and nearest of kin, to redeem, as their representative, the inheritance lost to the family. And the first-born, being thus specially claimed, showed that the inheritance had been forfeited; that he who had the next natural right was therefore cut off from it by being the Lord's; and that he, as well as the inheritance, must be redeemed by another, fully able and rightfully capable of performing such a redemption. It appears, then, that the ground of the doctrine of the first-born is this. All men and all their posterity are naturally under the curse for sin. The first-born, therefore, was to be devoted to God, as his peculiarly, for an acknowledgment of this truth in the first instance; and, in the second, for the declaration of another truth, arising, by God's mercy, out of the former,—namely, that God would appoint his first-born and only begotten, Christ, to be sacrificed and devoted to the curse, in commutation for all those who by grace should claim this benefit."

"The first-born of Israel were saved from destruction only by the blood of a lamb slain, sprinkled upon the lintels and door-posts of their houses; that is, by a substitute, whose blood should answer for them in the hour of general vengeance. This lamb was to be unblemished, and of the first year, thereby representing the holy Lamb of God, who, in the divine purpose, was slain from before the foundation of the world; and who also was to stand as the great first-born, or priest, bearing sin, atoning and making offerings for all his family. He, and he only, was capable of being both priest and sacrifice together. To keep this great and momentous truth in constant view, the first-born son was enjoined to be given to the Lord. Exod. xxii. 29. God would not spare his only begotten Son for the sake of his people; and this claim upon the first-born of that preaching and prophetic people the Jews, was an apt memorial of his goodness. But as their first-born, being naturally sinful and defiled, differed from his, it could not be accepted in that condition, but must necessarily be redeemed. On the contrary, the first-born of clean animals were acceptable, and on being presented became typically a curse or devoted thing to Jehovah, as a substitution for the unclean first-born of man; the first-born of unclean beasts were to be redeemed or destroyed."

Christ is spoken of in Scripture as the first-born among many brethren. All the angels of God are now his subjects, and are commanded to worship him. 1 Pet. iii. 22; Heb. i. 6. All the redeemed company are his heritage, his peculiar people. 1 Pet. v. 3; Tit. ii. 14. They are his brethren, to whom he stands related as the first-born among them. Rom. viii. 29. He is their head, their Lord, and their lawgiver; the object of their love, worship, and obedience. He is also the dispenser of all spiritual blessings; for "it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell." Col. i. 19. And not to enlarge further, he is "heir of the heavenly inheritance;" for it is in his right, and as joint-heirs with him, that all his redeemed brethren obtain it. Luke xxii. 29; Col. iii. 4; Rom. viii. 17.

BISHOP (Gr. episkopos), an overseer, superintendent, or inspector. The English word comes immediately from the Saxon, bishop, which is only a derivative of the Greek. In treating this important and much contested subject, we shall exhibit the chief arguments on both sides in regular succession, and under separate heads.

EPISCOPAL ARGUMENT.

I. In the New Testament the word bishop is once applied to Christ (1 Pet. ii. 25); but in every other passage it is spoken of men who have the oversight of Christ's flock. Because the same men are called both bishops and presbyters, or elders, the inference has been drawn by the advocates of a parity in the ministerial office, that this community of name indicated community of office and authority. The reverse of this, however, appears from the fact, that over the persons called indifferently elder, presbyter, and bishop, an office will be found of oversight and authority, held by Timothy and Titus, and directions how to discharge it, and a strict injunction to Timothy: "The same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also." In the Church of Ephesus, there were ministers thus called before Timothy was fixed there, as may be seen from Acts xx. If those ministers had the power of ordination, it would not have been necessary to set Timothy over that Church, in order to exercise these very powers. (See ORDINATION.) Similar to the authority which Timothy possessed at Ephesus, was that which was exercised by Titus over the island of Crete, which is represented as very populous, and famous in history for its hundred cities. In every one of these Titus was authorised by Paul to "ordain elders, and set in order the things that are wanting." The fact is, that during the lives of the apostles, the three orders of the ministry were distinguished by the names of apostles, bishops, presbyters, or elders, and deacons. After the death of the apostles, their successors in the first order of the ministry not choosing to retain the name, which by way of eminence had been applied to the twelve, took the name of bishops, which was never afterwards applied to the second order of the ministry, but was considered as the appropriate name of the first order. Theodoret says expressly, that "in process of time those who succeeded to the apostolic office left the name of apostle to the apostles strictly so called, and gave the name of bishop to those who succeeded to the apostolic office." Thus the name of bishop, and that of elder or presbyter, which were promiscuously used for the same office in Scripture, came to be distinct in the ecclesiastical use of words, as the offices were from the beginning. Bishops, as they are distinct from presbyters, do not derive their succession from those who are promiscuously called in the New Testament bishops or elders, but from the apostles themselves, and their successors, such as Timothy, Titus, Silvanus, Epaphroditus, and others. "Concerning the signification of the word bishop," says the judicious Hooker, "it is clearly untrue that no other thing is thereby signified but only an oversight in respect of a particular Church and congregation; for, I beseech you, of what parish or particular congregation was Matthias bishop? His office Scripture doth term Episcopal, which, being no other than was common unto all the apostles of Christ, forasmuch as in that number there is not any to whom the oversight of many pastors did not belong, by force and virtue of that office, it followeth, that the very word doth sometimes, even in Scripture, signify an oversight, such as includeth charge over pastors themselves."

II. Episcopacy, according to the views of Episcopalians, is the Divine constitution of the Christian Church in the first order of her ministry.

In the preface to the Ordinal of the Church of England, it is declared as "evident unto all men diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors, that from the apostles' time there have been these orders of ministers in Christ's Church,—bishops, priests, and deacons." In the office of making deacons, in that of ordaining priests, and in that of consecrating bishops, the same truth is solemnly declared in the supplications to Almighty God, who is addressed as having, by his Divine providence and Holy Spirit, instituted divers orders of ministers in his Church; and bishops, priests, and deacons, are enumerated as these orders. An external commission, conveyed by Episcopal consecration or ordination, is considered necessary to constitute a lawful ministry; and it is, therefore, in the Ordinal declared that no man shall be accounted or taken to be a lawful bishop, priest, or deacon, in this Church, or suffered to execute any of said functions, unless he has had Episcopal consecration or ordination; and the power of ordaining, setting or laying hands upon others is vested in the bishops.

The proof of this solemn and official declaration is,—1st, from Scripture. “Paul and Timotheus,”—the one an apostle, the other having the Episcopal power of ordination,—address themselves as servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints who are at Philippi, with the “bishops,”—then the interchangeable name of presbyters or elders,—“and the deacons.” Here are certainly three orders. The Apostle Paul, writing to Timothy, who is elsewhere termed an apostle (compare 1 Thess. i. 1, with ii. 6), also gives him particular directions as to an order of ministers whom he calls bishops (the same who, in another place, are called elders or presbyters), and also as to an order inferior to them, whom he calls deacons. Here, also, there are to be observed three orders of ministers. That of these three orders bishops were the superior, is very evident in the cases of Timothy and Titus. Presbyters or elders had been already ordained at Ephesus and Crete. Had they the power of ordination? No; but Timothy and Titus are sent there for the express purpose of laying on hands,—of ordaining to the ministry. It is alleged by some, that Timothy and Titus were extraordinary officers, and held this power as evangelists. But presbyters and deacons were also evangelists. If, then, the powers of Timothy and Titus ceased with them, because they were evangelists, for the same reason ceased the powers of the presbyters and deacons. Thus, in destroying their Episcopal power, these writers would also destroy the Christian ministry. Again, it is said, that Paul’s charge to Timothy implies, that presbyters had the power of ordination. “Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.” But he also says in his Second Epistle, “Stir up the gift of God, which is in thee, by the putting on of my hands.”

Paul then ordained Timothy, it would hence appear, with the concurrence of the presbytery; and that their concurrence was intended to express approbation, and not to convey authority, seems evident from the phraseology, “by the putting on of my hands,”—“with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.”

In the Church of England, and in the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, this concurrence is still observed.

III. If from Scripture proof we proceed to the historical proof of Episcopacy, we shall find the declaration of the Ordinal fully established.

The writings of Ignatius abound throughout with testimonies. To the Trallians he says: “He that is within the altar is pure, but he that is without, that is, does anything without the bishop, and presbyters, and deacons, is not pure in his conscience.”

To the Smyrneans: “Let no man do anything of what belongs to the Church without the bishop.” Irenæus says: “We can reckon up those whom the apostles ordained to be bishops in the several Churches, and who they were that succeeded them, to our times.” Clemens of Alexandria thus enumerates the three orders of the ministry: “There are other precepts without number, some of which relate to presbyters, others which belong to bishops, others respecting deacons.” Tertullian, writing of baptism, asserts: “The power of baptizing is lodged in the bishops, and that it may be also exercised by presbyters and deacons; but not without the bishop’s commission.”

Origen, commenting on that petition, “Forgive us our debts,” thus writes: “Besides these, there is a debt due to widows who are maintained by the Church, another to the deacons, another to the presbyters, and another to bishops, which is the greatest of all, and exacted by the Church.” Cyprian, whose epistles are many of them addressed to the presbyters and deacons, in his Thirty-Second Epistle writes: “When our Lord, whose precepts we ought to follow, was settling the honours of his bishop, and the regimen of his Church, we find him speaking thus to Peter, ‘I say unto thee that thou art Peter,’ &c. From thence, in a regular succession downwards, we date the ordination of bishops, and the course of ecclesiastical administrations, so as that we understand the Church to be settled upon her bishops. The deacons ought no more to attempt anything against bishops by whom deacons are made, than deacons should against God who makes bishops.”

To add authorities would be unnecessary. One fact is, however, worthy of consideration,—that there is no ancient ecclesiastical writer extant who does not speak of certain individuals as bishops of particular Churches,—for instance, Ignatius, bishop of Antioch; Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna,—or who mentions as contemporary with them in their particular Churches any other bishops. This uniformity is not to be explained, but on the principle that there was in each of those Churches some one individual supreme in the powers of ordination and government, on whom was bestowed the title of bishop. It is proper in this place to make a distinction between the ministers and government of the Church, properly so called. The ministry is of Divine constitution, in the three orders of bishop, priest, and deacons; but the government of the Church is of human regulation, susceptible of such modifications as circumstances may render advisable. Offices may be organized; the mode in which her ministers are invested with jurisdiction may be varied; the constitution of her legislative, executive, and judiciary powers may assume such organization as expediency may dictate. “I may securely,” says Hooker, “therefore, conclude, that there are at this day in the Church of England no other than the same degrees of ecclesiastical orders—namely, bishops, priests, and deacons—which had their beginning from Christ and his blessed apostles themselves. As for deans, prebendaries, parsons, vicars, curates, archdeacons, and such like names, being not found in the Scriptures, we have been thereby, through some men’s errors, thought to allow ecclesiastical degrees not known, nor never heard of, in the better ages of former times. All these are, in truth, but titles of office, whereunto partly ecclesiastical persons and partly others are in sundry forms and conditions admitted, as the state of the Church doth need, degrees of order still remaining the same they were from the beginning."

We conclude with a challenge from the matchless Hooker, which, as has been well remarked, has remained two hundred years unanswered: "We require you to find out but one Church upon the face of the whole earth that hath not been ordered by Episcopal regiment since the time that the blessed apostles were here conversant." And though departures from it, says Bishop Doane, since the time of which he spoke have been but too frequent and too great, "Episcopal regiment" is still maintained as Christ's ordinance for the perpetuation and government of his Church, and is received as such by eleven-twelfths of the whole Christian world.

ANTI-EPISCOPAL ARGUMENT.

It is now generally conceded, that there is no distinction made in the New Testament between bishops and elders or presbyters. The terms are used interchangeably. Bishop Onderdonk, in his 'Episcopacy Tested by Scripture,' says: "The name bishop, which now designates the highest grade in the ministry, is not appropriated to this office in Scripture. That name is given to the middle order, or presbyters (elders), and all that we read in the New Testament concerning bishops is to be regarded as pertaining to the middle grade." The ground assumed now by those who contend for the authority of Prelatical bishops is, that the apostles (to whom they say bishops have succeeded) were a superior order of officers in the primitive Church; presbyters or elders a second grade; and deacons a third. To maintain this ground, it must be shown,—

1. That the peculiarity of the apostles' office was, that they exclusively ordained, administered discipline or rule, and exercised an oversight of the Churches, these being the peculiar powers now claimed by bishops. 2. That they transmitted their office and powers to others. 3. That there has been an uninterrupted succession of such officers to the present bishops. Failing to establish any one of these points, it is clear, is fatal to their cause. But,—

I. The commission in Matt. xxviii. 19, 20, is plainly given to all ministers, to the end of the world, and conveys the same authority to all.

The very same duties are assigned to all ministers in the New Testament. Episcopalians deny this in reference to ordination and discipline. In 1 Tim. iii. 2, 4, 5, "A bishop must be one that ruleth well his own house;" otherwise "how shall he take care of the Church?" "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour." 1 Tim. v. 17. Here ruling is as expressly assigned to elders as bishops; and this is the only place where ruling is expressly assigned to a bishop.

Ordination (see article ORDINATION) is spoken of as having been exercised both by the apostles (Acts vi. 6, xiii. 3, xiv. 23), and by the presbyters. 1 Tim. iv. 14. In 1 Tim. iv. 14, is a clear case of Presbyterian ordination: "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (or assembly of elders). Here the presbytery laid on their hands, and bore a material part in the transaction. In vain will Episcopalians say the presbytery were present, not to convey authority, but for concurrence. Imposition of hands always denotes conferring some gift. But, say they, from Paul was derived the virtue of the act,—“By the putting on of my hands.” 2 Tim. i. 6. That Paul assisted, there is no doubt; but that he took any superior part, there is no proof. One text is as strong as the other, and the only mode of reconciling the two is to understand Paul and the presbyters to have had an equal and joint agency in the transaction. As to the use of the word "with" in one case, and "by" in the other, there cannot be shown to be any essential difference in the meaning or force. The only case in which ordination can possibly be ascribed to any person who was a bishop in the modern sense is, 1 Tim. v. 22; and this depends wholly on the supposition that Timothy was such a bishop, which cannot be proved. It is a proper exhortation to a presbyter, and is often used at modern ordinations. Timothy was himself ordained by the presbytery, and, of course, was no more than a common presbyter.

But on the power of ordination, as well as of discipline, the Scriptures lay very little stress. Ordaining is mentioned but nine times, and in all cases but two, incidentally; ruling six times, and without a hint of its peculiar consequence. Preaching (the duty of presbyters) is exhibited as the great and important duty of a minister, and ordination and ruling powers as altogether inferior. In 1 Tim. v. 17, superior honour is given to those who preach, on account of the superiority of their employment. Of course, the peculiar powers claimed for bishops (the alleged superior officers) are far below those assigned to presbyters (the alleged inferior officers!)

It is important also to observe, particularly,—1st, The manner in which ministers are spoken of in Mark x. 42–45, and the parallel passage; and our Lord's reproof of James and John, when they sought an office of superior power and dignity. See also Matt. xxiii. 6–12. 2d, Whenever the officers of the Church are mentioned together, no more than two classes are ever spoken of; and Peter and John certainly styled themselves explicitly elders; thus, so far as ministerial power and rank are concerned, putting themselves on a par with all other ministers. No bishop would do it at the present day. In 1 Tim. iii., where Paul instructs Timothy in the qualifications of ecclesiastical officers more extensively than is done in any other part of the New Testament, we find no officers mentioned but bishops or elders, and deacons. 3d, Notice the circumstances recorded in Acts xv.

II. Moreover,—1. There is no command in the New Testament to the apostles to transmit the peculiarities of their office. 2. There is no intimation that it would be so transmitted, no directions (as in the case of other officers) as to the qualifications and duties of such officers, and no exhortation to ministers or Churches to submit to them. 3. It was impossible that the peculiarity of the office could be transmitted. (See APOSTLE.) 4. It cannot be proved, though often affirmed, that Timothy and Titus were Prelatical bishops. That Timothy was ever sole and permanent bishop or diocesan of Ephesus, is nowhere declared in the New Testament. The subscription at the close of 2 Timothy is admitted on all hands not to have been inspired, and is of no authority. The same remarks apply to the case of Titus. But Dr Hoadley asks, "Why were Timothy and Titus commanded to ordain elders?" It does not appear that this was the chief reason of Timothy's being at Ephesus. Neither he nor Titus had any stated residence in what are claimed to have been their dioceses. Both made a temporary visit to the respective places, and there exercised the various duties of a presbyter.

III. But admitting all that is claimed on these points by the advocates of Episcopacy, there is not the slightest reason to believe that the superior office (of bishops) has been uninterruptedly transmitted to the present incumbents. The chief ground relied on to prove the succession, is the testimony of the fathers. But this testimony is not deserving of the credit sometimes given to it. For,—1. Those who have testified on this subject have given erroneous testimony on other subjects. Irenæus testifies that Linus was made bishop of Rome by Paul and Peter; and after him Anacletus; and after him Clement. Tertullian says, that Clement was first bishop of Rome, after the death of Peter and Paul. He also says that Peter was first bishop of Antioch. Again, that Euodias was first bishop of Antioch. Jerome says that Peter sat at Rome twenty-five years, till the last year of Nero. Again, that Ignatius was third bishop of Antioch after Peter. This shows that, except as to facts passing under their own eyes, the fathers are not to be relied on, they received traditional accounts so loosely. 2. The works of several of the fathers have been corrupted and partially lost. Mosheim says of Ignatius' writings (often appealed to in this controversy): "The authenticity of the Epistle to Polycarp is extremely doubtful, and the question concerning all his epistles involved in much obscurity and many difficulties." 3. The testimony of the fathers does not establish the distinction in the clergy contended for; but Irenæus, the best witness, particularly testifies that ministerial power is Presbyterian, not Episcopal. The bishop of whom Ignatius speaks was pastor of a single Church, and performed all the ordinary duties of a minister. He exhorts Polycarp to preach, to see that widows were not neglected, to know all his parishioners, even men and maid-servants, and to inspect every marriage. He speaks of the bishops of the Church in Magnesia in the plural number. Jerome says: "A presbyter is the same as bishop, and originally the Churches were governed by the joint council of the presbyters." Again: "The bishops know that they are greater than presbyters rather by custom than by real appointment of the Lord." Tertullian says: "Elders preside in the government of the Church." Firmilian says: "In elders is vested the power of baptizing, imposition of hands, and ordination." Jerome: "The presbyters of Alexandria ordained their bishop for more than two hundred years." These extracts might be enlarged. 4. The succession, if traced at all, must be through the Church of Rome, a precarious and uncomfortable ground of Christian confidence. That any powers of a Divine nature passed through such impure hands, will be slowly admitted by a man of piety. There were in the Church of Rome at one time four pontiffs, who all denounced each other as usurpers. It is not agreed who were the first seven bishops of Rome. Eusebius himself acknowledges it is no easy matter to tell who succeeded the apostles. Contested elections in nearly every considerable city, and decrees of councils rendering null all those ordinances where any simoniacal contract existed, render it doubtful who were true bishops, and impossible to prove that any person on earth is a legal or lineal successor to the apostles. 5. The ordination of English bishops cannot be traced up to the Church of Rome. Doddridge refers to Jones' and Bede's Ecclesiastical History to substantiate the fact, "that in the year 668, the successors to Austin the monk being almost extinct in England, by far the greater part of the bishops were of Scottish ordination, by Aidan and Finan, who came out of the Culdee monastery, and were nothing more than presbyters; though when the northern princes were converted by them, they made them bishops." Baxter says, remarking on the testimony of Bede, "You will find that the English had a succession of bishops by the Scottish presbyters' ordination; and there is no mention in Bede of any scruple of the lawfulness of the course."

That a distinction in the ministry was introduced early after the apostolic age is admitted. But it appears to have been of human origin, and to have taken place gradually. A most interesting and able discussion of this subject is to be found in Dr King's recent work, entitled "An Exposition and Defence of the Presbyterian Form of Church Government."

BITE, angrily to contend with and injure others is called by Paul a biting of them; it is learned from the old serpent, it manifests malice, and spreads a destructive infection. Gal. v. 15. (See BACKBITING.) Divine judgments are sometimes compared to the bite of a serpent, to indicate their suddenness, sharpness, and destructive power. Eccles. x. 8; Jer. viii. 17; Hab. ii. 7. For the like reason wine, when for a long time used to excess, bites like a serpent; and stings like an adder. Prov. xxiii. 32.

BITHYNIA, a province of Asia Minor, on the shore of the Euxine or Black Sea. It is mentioned in 1 Pet. i. 1, as one of those provinces where Jews were scattered to whom Peter addressed his first epistle. Paul, we are told, proposed to go into Bithynia, but "the Spirit suffered him not." Acts xvi. 7, 8. It was in this province, at Nice, that the first general council was held against the Arians, and at which Constantine the Great presided, A.D. 325. In another of its cities, also, at Chalcedon, the fourth general council was held against the Nestorians. It is now one of the districts of Turkish Anatolia, and is situated opposite Constantinople. The population chiefly belong to the Greek and Armenian churches.

BITTER HERBS (merurim). Exod. xii. 8; Numb. ix. 11. The Jews were commanded to eat their passover with a salad of bitter herbs; but whether one particular plant was intended, or any kind of bitter herbs, has been made a question. Dr Geddes remarks, that "it is highly probable that the succory or wild lettuce is meant." The Mishna reckons five species of these bitter herbs,—1. Chazareth, taken for lettuce. 2. Ulkin, supposed to be endive or succory. 3. Tamca,—probably tansy. 4. Charubbinim, which Boehart thought might be the nettle, but Scheuchzer shows to be the camomile. 5. Meror, the sow-thistle, or dent-de-lion, or wild lettuce. Mr Forskal says: "The Jews in Sana and in Egypt eat the lettuce with the paschal lamb." He also remarks, that moru is centaury, of which the young stems are eaten in February and March.

BITTERN, a singular bird, about the size of the common heron, but differing from it greatly in the colour of its plumage. The crown of the head is black, with a black spot also on each side about the angle of the mouth; the back and upper part are elegantly variegated with different colours, black, brown, and gray, in beautiful arrangement. This species of bird is common only in fen countries, where it is met with skulking about the reeds and sedge; and its usual posture is with the head and neck erect, and the beak pointed directly upwards. It permits persons to approach near to it, without rising. It flies principally towards the dusk of the evening, and then rises in a very singular manner, by a spiral ascent, till quite out of sight. It makes a curious noise when among the reeds, and a very different, though sufficiently singular one, as it rises on the wing in the night. Isaiah (xiv. 23), foretelling the destruction of Babylon, says, "I will also make it a possession for the bittern, and pools of water." And Zephaniah (ii. 14) prophesying against Nineveh, says, "And flocks shall lie down in the midst of her, all the beasts of the nations: both the cormorant and the bittern shall lodge in the upper lintels of it; their voice shall sing in the windows." The original word translated bittern, occurs also in Isa. xxxiv. 11. It has been rendered very differently by different authors; an owl, an osprey, a tortoise, a porcupine, and an otter. Dr Shaw, Bishop Lowth, Mr Dodson, and Bishop Stock, following Bochart, render it the porcupine. Sheuchzer says, "The bearer is what best agrees with the word."

BITTERNESS. This is often spoken of in Scripture as symbolical of affliction, misery, and servitude. Hence it was that, in remembrance of deliverance from Egyptian bondage, the Israelites were commanded to eat bitter herbs. "The gall of bitterness" is an expression applied to the wretched condition of unconverted men; and "the waters made bitter" in Rev. viii. 11, is supposed by some to refer to the invasion of Genseric, king of the Vandals, who afflicted the Romans in the year 455, and during his reign cruelly persecuted the orthodox Christians.

BLACK. This epithet is often used in Scripture to denote a state of affliction and trial of any kind. Thus: "Our skin was black like an oven because of the terrible famine." Lam. v. 10. "My skin is black upon me, and my bones are burned with heat." Job xxx. 30. The same expression is used to describe fear and anxiety in Joel ii. 6: "All faces shall gather blackness." In Rev. vi. 5, the black horse, and in verse 12, the sun becoming black as sackcloth of hair, are both indicative of severe judgments.

BLAINS. This is a disease mentioned (Exod. ix. 9-11) as one of the plagues of Egypt. It is understood to be a disease of the skin; and we find it adverted to as one of the characteristics of leprosy. Lev. xiii. 18, 20. The same word is employed (Job ii. 7) in describing Job's disease. The precise nature of the cutaneous affection, which the word rendered blains is intended to signify, can only, of course, be conjectured. Gesenius supposes that it corresponds to elephantiasis, a disease still very prevalent in some Eastern countries; and some medical writers conclude this to be the very disease with which Job was afflicted. It was called by the Greeks elephantiasis, from its rendering the skin like that of an elephant,—scabrous and dark coloured, and furrowed all over with tubercles, loathsome alike to the patient and the spectators.

BLAME. See APPROBATION and DISAPPROBATION.

BLASPHEMY, properly denotes calumny, *detractio*n, reproachful or abusive language, against whomsoever it be vented. "That blasphemia and its conjugates are very often applied," says Dr Campbell, "to reproaches not aimed against God, is evident from the following passages: Matt. xii. 31, 32. xxvii. 39; Mark xv. 29; Luke xxii. 65, xxiii. 39; Rom. iii. 8, xiv. 16; 1 Cor.

iv. 13, x. 30; Eph. iv. 31; 1 Tim. vi. 4; Tit. iii. 2; 1 Peter iv. 14; Jude 9, 10; Acts vi. 11, 13; 2 Peter ii. 10, 11; in the much greater part of which the English translators, sensible that they could admit no such application, have not used the words blaspheme or blasphemy, but rail, revile, speak evil, &c. In one of the passages quoted, a reproachful charge brought even against the devil, is (Jude 9) rendered by them, "railing accusation." The import of the word blasphemia, is evil-speaking in the largest acceptation; comprehending all sorts of verbal abuse, imprecation, reviling, and calumny. And let it be observed, that when such abuse is mentioned as uttered against God, there is properly no change made in the signification of the word; the change is only in the application,—that is, in the reference to a different object. The idea conveyed in the explanation now given is always included, against whomsoever the crime be committed. In this manner, every term is understood that is applicable to both God and man. Thus, the meaning of the word disobey is the same, whether we speak of disobeying God or of disobeying man.

BLASPHEMY AGAINST THE HOLY GHOST. This is a subject of great difficulty and yet of solemn interest, from the circumstance that Jesus Christ declares it to be an unpardonable sin. "Verily I say unto you, All sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewith soever they shall blaspheme; but he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation: because they said, He hath an unclean spirit." Mark iii. 28-30. The key to the explanation of this mysterious sin may be found in the closing observation of the passage now quoted, "Because they said, He hath an unclean spirit." This naturally leads us to notice the circumstances in which the words of Jesus were uttered. He had just before cured a man who was possessed with a devil, both blind and dumb. The Pharisees had witnessed the miracle, and were so convinced of its reality that they never attempted for a moment to deny it. But in opposition to the convictions of their understandings, and with the bitterest malignity of heart, they attributed the miracle to the agency of the prince of darkness. Such the Saviour plainly declared was the unpardonable sin of blaspheming against or speaking evil of the Holy Ghost. It was not a single sinful act, but a complicated state of mind and character. The chief ingredients, then, of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost we may gather from a consideration of the whole circumstances of the case, and these ingredients we conceive are,—1. A determined suppression of the convictions of the mind and of the workings of conscience. 2. A determined and obstinate unbelief and rejection of Christ. 3. A rooted malice against the person, the work, and the cause of Christ. 4. A total indifference and unconcern about personal salvation. Dr Campbell, in accordance with his views of blasphemy, as given in the preceding article, regards the unpardonable sin as a direct, manifest, and malignant calumny against the agency of the Holy Ghost. This cannot have been the case of all who disbelieved the mission of Jesus, and even decried his miracles; many of whom, we have reason to think, were afterwards converted by the apostles. But it was the wretched case of some who, instigated by worldly ambition and avarice, slandered what they knew to be the cause of God; and, against conviction, reviled his work as the operation of evil spirits. This view of the sin against the Holy Ghost is confirmed by the circumstances under which our Lord spoke. Such is the explanation given by Dr Campbell. The opinion of Wetstein, which is somewhat similar, is thus given by Dr Bloomfield: "The crime is that of men who, though they see a miracle achieved by the power of the Holy Ghost, yet maliciously pronounce it to have been effected by the evil spirit. Mark iii. 30; Heb. x. 29. He who shall repent may now obtain pardon of all, even sins of the deepest dye (Acts xiii. 38, 39), except blasphemy of the Spirit; for he who rails against so many and great miracles, such as could not have been effected but by Divine power, is incorrigible and irreformable; for by what other method can he be brought to reason? He who blinks even at the solar ray, will have still less power of vision in the dark, or by the light of the moon, or by that of a candle. Having, therefore, rejected the last mode that can be resorted to for his cure, his disorder is irremediable. Some sins are punished in this world only,—others only in the world to come. A sin which is neither remitted in the present nor in the future state, is punished in both. He who believes not in Christ, either because he sees not his mighty works, or because he stumbles at the humility of his appearance, or because he is alienated by the authority of his teacher, is yet not past cure, and may, by the view or the report of miracles, acknowledge his error. But he who to contempt joins calumny, and knowingly and wilfully refers the miracles wrought before his own eyes to diabolical agency, is altogether incurable and irreformable." This interpretation corresponds to that of Chrysostom, Grotius, Hammond, and Tillotson. The opinion of Dr Whitby is, that he is guilty of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost who is chargeable with confirmed unbelief, and represents the work of the Holy Spirit as the work of Satan. Such a person is resisting the last and most powerful evidence which God has vouchsafed to mankind and is obviously given up to believe a lie.

BLEMISH, any imperfection in a person or thing. The law of Moses enjoined that no man could enter into the office of the priesthood who was not free from all blemishes of person. Lev. xxi. 17–21. The same law was observed even among the heathen.

BLESSING. See BENEDICTION.

BLESSING, VALLEY OF. See BERACHAH.

BLINDFOLDING. This formed a part of the treatment to which our blessed Lord was subjected. In Luke xxii. 64, it is said, "And when they had blindfolded him, they struck him on the face, and asked him, saying, Prophecy who is it that smote thee?" The allusion is supposed to be to a game among the ancients, in which children blindfolded each other, and after striking a blow, required, under a penalty, the name of the person who struck it.

BLINDNESS, one of the most painful calamities which can befall a man, and one which is peculiarly fitted to excite compassion. In the law of Moses, special provision was made for the protection of the blind against insult and injury. Thus Lev. xix. 14, "Thou shalt not curse the deaf, nor put a stumbling-block before the blind, but shalt fear thy God: I am the Lord." And Deut. xxvii. 18, "Cursed be he that maketh the blind to wander out of the way: and all the people shall say, Amen." Among the Jews, blindness from birth was attributed to some sin which either the blind man or his parents had committed. John ix. 2. Blindness is often used in Scripture to denote ignorance of divine things. Thus, Isa. xlii. 18, 19; vi. 10. Matt. xv. 14. The Sodomites are said (Gen. xix. 11) to have been struck with blindness. The word translated in that passage "blindness" occurs also in 2 Kings xvi. 18, where a similar effect appears to have been produced upon the Syrian army in answer to the prayer of Elisha. The judgment undoubtedly consisted, not in a total privation of sight, in which case they would, of course, have desisted from the assault on Lot, and endeavoured to make their way home, but in a confused vision, such as is occasioned by vertigo of the brain, in which objects swim before the eyes, and mock every attempt to approach or seize them. It was an effect upon their vision that prevented their seeing any thing distinctly or steadily or in its right place. In this utter confusion of the senses, they wearied themselves in seeking for what they deemed a door, but which was merely a phantasm of the imagination. The miracle was as great as if they had been suddenly struck stone-blind, for seeing they saw not, with open eyes they were unable to receive any true impressions from the external world. Yet they madly persisted in their object.

BLOOD, the fluid which circulates in the bodies of men and animals. It is a viscid fluid, of red colour; peculiar odour, and saline,—somewhat nauseous taste. According to the results of microscopic observation, it consists of red particles suspended in a serous fluid. Its temperature in the living body is about ninety-seven degrees; its specific gravity is about one hundred and five to water as one hundred. Its quantity in the adult varies from eight or ten, to eighty or one hundred pounds.

From a very early period we find in the Old Testament a prohibition of the eating of blood. Immediately after the flood, the command was given to Noah: "But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat." Gen. ix. 4. This idea, that the blood of animals is the life of them,—that is, the element with which the animal life is peculiarly and inseparably connected,—pervades the whole of the Sacred Writings. In the Levitical law the eating of blood is most emphatically renewed: "It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood." Lev. iii. 17. "Moreover ye shall eat no manner of blood, whether it be of fowl, or of beast, in any of your dwellings. Whatsoever soul it be that eateth any manner of blood, even that soul shall be cut off from his people." Lev. vii. 26, 27. "And whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, that eateth any manner of blood; I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among his people. For the life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul." Lev. xvii. 10, 11. Here, then, are alleged two reasons for not eating blood,—first, Because it is the life of the animal,—and, second, Because it is to be set apart for making atonement. The blood, therefore, was sacred, or consecrated to God, and could not be lawfully eaten by man. Throughout the whole of the Old Testament the same doctrine is inculcated. And even after the death of Christ, that great event which the shedding of animal blood under the ancient economy prefigured, we find a council of apostles and elders at Jerusalem exhorting their Christian brethren to abstain not only from things offered to idols, but from things strangled, and from blood. The reason of the prohibition from eating things strangled, obviously is, because the blood was still in them. We see, then, in the prohibition of blood as an article of food to man, an evident reference to the consecrated use of blood, founded on the great principle, that "without shedding of blood there is no remission;" and even in the very reason assigned, that it is the life of the animal, we may perceive an obvious pointing to the doctrine of a vicarious atonement,—life substituted for life. The good Shepherd laid down his life for the sheep.

Amongst the ancient heathen nations covenants and alliances were often ratified with blood,—the contracting parties mutually drinking a portion of each others' blood. It has ever been a favourite pretence of the superstitious and fraudulent monks and priests of the Church of Rome to palm upon the ignorant the lying fable, that they were possessed of some drops of the real blood of Christ. By this means they received ample offerings from the deluded laity, who flocked to do homage to the sacred relic. Such deceptions have been practised in past times; and it is deeply to be lamented that in Popish countries they are still practised, to the serious injury of the souls of many.

Besides its plain and literal signification, the word blood is sometimes used in a metaphorical and figurative sense,—1. For life. "God will require the blood of a man;"—he will punish murder, in what manner soever committed. "His blood be upon us;"—let the guilt of his death be imputed to us. "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth;"—the murder committed on him crieth for vengeance. 2. Blood means relationship, or consanguinity. 3. Flesh and blood are placed in opposition to a superior nature: "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." Matt. xvi. 17. 4. They are also opposed to the glorified body: "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." 1 Cor. xv. 50. 5. They are opposed also to evil spirits: "We wrestle not against flesh and blood,"—against visible enemies composed of flesh and blood,—"but against principalities and powers," &c. Eph. vi. 12. 6. Wine is called the pure blood of the grape: Judah "washed his clothes in the blood of grapes." Gen. xlix. 11; Deut. xxxii. 14. 7. The priests were established by God to judge between blood and blood; that is, in criminal matters, and where the life of man is at stake, to determine whether the murder be casual, or voluntary,—whether a crime deserve death, or admit of remission. 8. In its most eminent sense, blood is used for the sacrificial death of Christ; whose blood or death is the price of our salvation. His blood has "purchased the Church." Acts xx. 28. We are "justified by his blood." Rom. v. 9. "We have redemption through his blood." Eph. i. 7.

BLOSSOM. This word is applied to the flowers of trees which they put forth in the spring, as the forerunners of their fruit. The office of the blossom is partly to protect, and partly to draw nourishment to, the embryo fruit or seed. The word occurs in various passages of Scripture, and among others in Gen. xl. 10. The almond rod of Aaron is said to have blossomed miraculously. Numb. xvii. 8.

BLOT, a sinful stain, a reproach. Job xxxi. 7;

Prov. ix. 7. To blot out living things, or one's name or remembrance, is to destroy, abolish, or obliterate. Gen. vii. 4; Deut. ix. 14, xxv. 19, xxix. 20; Col. ii. 14. To blot out sin, is fully and finally to forgive it. Isa. xlv. 22. God's blotting men out of his book, is to deny them his providential favours, and cut them off by an untimely death. Psal. xxxix. 28; Exod. xxxii. 32, 33. His not blotting their name out of the book of life imports his clearly manifesting their eternal election. Rev. iii. 5. To the custom of cancelling written obligations by blotting them out, or sometimes by driving a nail through them, the Apostle Paul alludes in Col. ii. 14: "Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross."

BLOW, a stroke, a heavy judgment inflicted by the rod of God's anger. Psal. xxxix. 10; Jer. xiv. 17. To BLOW, as wind doth. Song iv. 16; John iii. 8.

BLUE. The Hebrew word translated blue, which occurs so often in the Book of Exodus, when describing the construction of the tabernacle, is defined by Gesenius to be a species of mussel found in the Mediterranean, with a cerulean shell, from which is procured the bluish or cerulean purple. Hence it is used to denote that colour itself, and clothes dyed with it. The blue colour seems at one time to have been in great favour among the Jews and other Oriental nations. Now, however, it is held in no repute, being associated with meanness and poverty.

BOANERGES. In Mark iii. 17, this term is applied by our Lord to the apostles James and John, and it is interpreted as meaning "sons of thunder." On what ground such an epithet should have been used, commentators are somewhat puzzled. Some regard it as designed to point out the character of their preaching as being of a rousing and powerful kind. Others again view the expression as a prediction of the wonderful effects of their labours. Theophylact supposes that it may signify their teaching in a profounder strain than the rest. Perhaps the term may denote simply that they were to be eminent and successful ministers of the New Testament.

BOAR, WILD. This animal, which is the original of all the varieties of the hog kind, is by no means so stupid nor so filthy a beast as that which we have reduced to tameness. He is something smaller than the domestic hog, and does not so vary in his colour, being always found of an iron gray, inclining to black; his snout is much larger than that of the tame animal, and the ears are shorter, rounder, and black; of which colour are also the feet and the tail. But the tusks are larger than in the tame breed; they bend upwards circularly, and are exceedingly sharp at the points.

The wild boar roots up the ground in a different manner from the common hog; the one turns up the earth in little spots here and there; the other ploughs it up like a furrow, and does irreparable damage in the cultivated lands of the farmer, destroying the roots of the vine, and other plants. From this we may see the propriety with which the Psalmist represents the subversion of the Jewish commonwealth, under the allegory of a vine destroyed by a boar: "Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt: thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it. Thou preparedst room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root, and it filled the land. She sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river. Why hast thou then broken down her hedges, so that all they which pass by the way do pluck her? The boar out of the woods doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it." Psal. lxxx. 8-13. If this psalm was written, as is supposed, during the Babylonian captivity, the propriety of the allegory becomes more apparent. Not satisfied with devouring the plants and fruit which have been carefully raised by the skill and attention of the husbandman, the ferocious boar lacerates and breaks with his powerful tusks the roots and branches of the surrounding vines, and tramples them beneath his feet. Mr Hartley, in his 'Researches in Greece,' says, "It is astonishing what havoc a wild boar is capable of effecting during a single night. What with eating, and what with trampling under foot, he will destroy an immense quantity of grapes. With what fatal propriety does the affecting image in the 80th Psalm retain its force up to the present moment! Still is the vine of Israel broken down, ravaged, cut down, and burnt with fire." The reader will easily apply this to the conduct pursued by the Chaldeans towards the Jewish State, whose desolation is thus pathetically bewailed by the prophet: "The Lord hath trodden under foot all my mighty men in the midst of me: he hath called an assembly against me to crush my young men: the Lord hath trodden the virgin, the daughter of Judah, as in a wine-press." Lam. i. 15.

The boar is exceedingly fond of marshes, fens, and reedy places; a disposition which is probably referred to in Psal. lxxviii. 30: "Rebuke the company of the spearmen,"—or, as it is literally, "the beast of the reeds," or canes.

BOAST. The saints boast of or in God, or glory in Christ, when they rejoice in, highly value, and commend him, and loudly publish the great things he has done for them. Psal. xxxiv. 2; Isa. xlv. 25. "Glory not, and lie not against the truth;"—do not proudly and deceitfully pretend to have true wisdom and zeal for God, when you have it not. James iii. 14.

BOAT, a small open vessel, propelled on the water by oars or sails. Every ship in the East was furnished with a boat, which was attached to the stern, and left floating in the sea. When a storm arose, and the boat was in danger of being drifted away, it was drawn up close to the ship's side. Hence we read, that the boat which belonged to the Egyptian ship in which Paul sailed was secured in the storm by "being taken up." The boats used on the Sea of Galilee were fishing-boats, but the structure or materials of these vessels can only be conjectured. The boats on the Nile were formed from small planks about two cubits square, cut either from the roots of the papyrus or the Egyptian acantha. Herodotus tells us, that in his time boats of wicker-work, covered with the skins of animals, were used on the Tigris and the Euphrates.

BOAZ, an Israelite who married Ruth, and who is mentioned in the genealogy of our Lord. Matt. i. 5. It is somewhat difficult to ascertain precisely when Boaz lived, it being said by Matthew that Salmon, the father of Boaz, was married to Rahab the harlot, and yet that Boaz was the grandfather of David, who was born about three hundred and sixty years after the siege of Jericho, when Rahab protected the spies. It is difficult to conceive that during such a length of time only three persons—Boaz, Obed, and Jesse—should have intervened between Rahab and David. Perhaps the solution may be found in the supposition, that some unimportant links in the chain may have been omitted. The Rabbi Kimchi, and other Jewish authors, regard Boaz as identical with Izban, who judged Israel immediately after Jephthah. Archbishop Usher alleges, that the events recorded in this history happened in the days of Shamgar. Bishop Patrick refers the beginning of this history to the period of Gideon, about A.M. 2759. Our version assigns it to B.C. 1322. See RUTH.

BOAZ, the name of one of the pillars which Solomon placed in the porch of the temple at Jerusalem, which was situated on the eastern extremity of the entire building, the holy of holies, or most holy place, occupying the position on the western extremity. "And he set up the pillars in the porch of the temple: and he set up the right pillar, and called the name thereof Jachin: and he set up the left pillar, and called the name thereof Boaz." 1 Kings vii. 15. The name denotes strength or firmness. It was composed of brass, and was eighteen cubits high. 1 Kings vii. 15. The same account of its height is given by Jeremiah (lii. 21), who also says that the thickness of these columns was four fingers, for they were hollow. The same prophet further describes it thus:—"And a chapter of brass was upon it; and the height of one chapter was five cubits, with network and pomegranates upon the chapters round about, all of brass. The second pillar also and the pomegranates were like unto these. And there were ninety and six pomegranates on a side; and all the pomegranates upon the network were an hundred round about." Jer. lii. 22, 23. Gesenius supposes that the column may have been called Boaz, either from the name of the architect, or perhaps from the name of the donor.

BOCHIM, literally "the weepers," so called from the weeping and lamentation that took place there, as recorded in Judges ii. 8. Where Bochim was situated we are not elsewhere informed, and the probability is, that the place was in reality no other than Shiloh, where the people were now assembled (ver. 4) on one of their solemn festivals; for it appears (ver. 5) that sacrifices were offered on the occasion; and we know that, as a general rule, sacrifices were not offered except where the tabernacle and altar were fixed, and this at the present time was at Shiloh.

BODY, a real substance, an organized system; generally the animal frame of man, as distinguished from his spiritual nature. Paul also speaks of a spiritual body, in opposition to the animal. 1 Cor. xv. 44.

Body is opposed to shadow, or figure. Col. ii. 17. The ceremonies of the law are figures and shadows, realised in Christ and the Christian religion.

A regularly organized community, like the Christian Church, is called a body. 1 Cor. x. 17.

"The body of sin" (Rom. vi. 6), called also "the body of this death" (Rom. vii. 24), is the system and habit of sin in which Christians lived before conversion, and which afterwards is viewed as a loathsome burden. By an extension of the same figure, the disposition to sin is called "the old man." As the latter is "crucified with Christ," by faith, through the Holy Spirit; so the former is "put off" in baptism, "that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin."

"Where the body is, there the eagles are gathered together" (Matt. xxiv. 28), is a sort of proverb used by our Saviour. In Job xxxix. 29, it is said that the eagle, viewing its prey from a distance, as soon as there is a dead body, it immediately resorts thither. Our Saviour compares the wicked to a dead body, by God in his wrath given up to birds and beasts of prey; wherever they are, there will be likewise the judgments of God to seize and condemn them. In this passage, there seems to be an allusion to the body of the Jews, preyed on by the Roman eagles,—the eagle being the standard of that people.

BODY OF DIVINITY. See THEOLOGY.

BOGOMILI, or BOGARMITÆ, a sect of heretics which arose about the year 1179. They held that the use of churches, of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and all prayers except the Lord's Prayer, ought to be abolished; that the baptism of Catholics is imperfect; that the persons of the Trinity are unequal, and that they often made themselves visible to those of their sect.

BOHAN (a stone), a Renbenite, who had a stone erected to his honour, on the frontier between Judah and Benjamin, to commemorate his exploits in the conquest of Canaan. Josh. xv. 6, xviii. 17.

BOHEMIAN BRETHREN. About the commencement of the fifteenth century, some of the writings of the English proto-reformer, Wickliffe, were carried into Bohemia, by a gentleman of that country who had studied at Oxford. These writings recommended themselves to many learned Bohemians, particularly in the University of Prague, who were struck with the force of truth, and the knowledge of Scripture which they contained. Among these was John Huss, an eminent pastor in one of the churches of Prague, and rector of the university there. He did not adopt all the opinions of Wickliffe, and remained under the influence of several of the errors of the age, which that great man had been enabled to throw off; but he adopted the leading sentiment which was the polar star that directed Wickliffe in all his inquiries after truth, viz., the supreme authority and sufficiency of the Scriptures as the rule of faith. His doctrine, and his recommendation of the writings of Wickliffe, tended to open the eyes of many to the reigning abuses, and to lead others farther into the knowledge of the truth than himself. The fate of Huss is well known. Being summoned to appear before the Council of Constance, and refusing to abjure his opinions, he was, in pursuance of a decree of that council, burned alive in 1415 (as well as his disciple, Jerome of Prague), notwithstanding the safe-conduct which he had obtained from the Emperor Sigismund.

In the meantime, the knowledge of the truth was spreading in Bohemia. About the time that Huss set out for Constance, Jacobel de Mise, or James of Misa, began to preach publicly against the practice of withholding the cup from the laity in the sacrament of the Supper; and showed from Scripture, and the practice of the primitive Church, that the eucharist ought to be administered to all the communicants in both kinds or elements. Having written to John Huss upon this subject, he, in several letters, expressed his approbation of this sentiment. Jacobel, supported by several priests, and by the approbation of the people, carried his sentiment into practice; and the communion was dispensed in both kinds, in several churches in Prague. The practice spread quickly through the different provinces of the kingdom; and the people every where flocked to those ministers who administered the ordinance after the scriptural mode.

This was the occasion of a great schism among the Hussites. Though all of them strenuously opposed the tyranny of the Court of Rome, and the corruption of the clergy, and zealously maintained the use of the cup in the Lord's Supper, yet a great part, timid, and prejudiced in favour of opinions and practices which had received the sanction of ages, and were every where submitted to, were averse to any farther reformation. A diversity of religious practice was introduced among them, and after some time, the difference came to an open breach. Two parties were formed; the one of whom were called Calixtines, from their distinguishing tenet, which was pleading for the use of the chalice, or cup, in the Lord's Supper; the other retained the name of Taborites, which was formerly a name given to all the Hussites.

At last, in a Synod which assembled at Knttenberg, in the year 1442, the Taborites, by common consent, drew up a confession of their faith. This confession may be seen at large in L'Enfant's history. It contains, in general, the same view of Divine truth which was afterwards exhibited in the Confessions of the Protestant Churches. After the suppression of the Taborites, which was effected soon after this, the standard of truth was upheld by a secession which was made from the Calixtines in the year 1457. Those who separated joined themselves to the remnant of the Taborites. Terrified by the destruction of the latter, and the rancour with which they were prosecuted, they changed their name and assumed that of Bohemian Brethren. Churches composed of these continued to exist at the time of the Reformation, and entered into a correspondence with Luther, Melancthon, and other Reformers.

BOIL, an inflamed ulcer, which is said to have been the disease with which Hezekiah was afflicted. Thus 2 Kings xx. 7, "And Isaiah said, Take a lump of figs: And they took and laid it on the boil, and he recovered;" and Isa. xxxviii. 21, "For Isaiah had said, Let them take a lump of figs, and lay it for a plaister upon the boil, and he shall recover." Dr Mead thinks that the malady of the king was a fever terminating in an abscess. In Deut. xxviii. 27 and 35, the same Hebrew word is translated "botch of Egypt," thus, "The Lord will smite thee with the botch of Egypt. . . . The Lord shall smite thee in the knees, and in the legs, with a sore botch that cannot be healed." And this Gesenius explains to be a species of leprosy, called by the Greeks elephantiasis. (See BLAINS.) This is properly the disease from which Job suffered, and which Dr Mason Good imagines to be the confluent small-pox,—“So went Satan forth from the presence of the Lord, and smote Job with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown.” Job ii. 7. But the precise nature of this disease it is exceedingly difficult to ascertain.

BOILING. See COOKERY.

BOLSTER, a soft pillow for the head. We find in 1 Sam. xix. 13, mention made of a pillow of goat's hair for a bolster. The Septuagint and Josephus say that it was a goat's liver, used by Michal on this occasion, as the latter imagines, because of the property of motion which it is alleged to possess for some time after it has been taken from the animal, thus conveying the idea, that a living person lay in the bed. The Targum says that it was a goat-skin bottle; and if so, it was probably inflated with air. The bolster in the East is, as modern travellers inform us, round, about eight inches in diameter, and twenty in length. In travelling, it is carried rolled up in the mat on which the owner sleeps. In 1 Sam. xxvi. 7, when it is said of Saul, that "his spear stuck in the ground at his bolster," the word may more properly be rendered "at his head."

BOND, literally a band or chain (Acts xxv. 14); metaphorically, oppression, captivity, affliction (Psal. cxvi. 16; Phil. i. 7); morally, an obligation of any kind. Numb. xxx. 12; Jer. v. 5; Ezek. xx. 37. The bond of iniquity is the state of sin wherein, by the curse of the law and his own corruption, the unconverted sinner, in all his desires, thoughts, words, and actions, is shut up to the service and wages of unrighteousness. Acts viii. 23. On the other hand, peace with God through Christ, with our own consciences, and with one another, is a beautiful bond which unites the affections, designs, exercises, and operations of the several members of the Christian Church. Eph. iv. 3. Charity, that is, Christian love, is called by Paul the bond of perfectness, because it completes the Christian character, promotes a close union in Church relation, and renders the gifts and graces of all subservient to mutual progress towards perfect holiness, happiness, dignity, usefulness, and glory. Col. iii. 14. The bond of the covenant is a confirmed state in the covenant of grace which decrees our salvation, and which binds us, under the most deep and lasting obligations, to be the Lord's. Ezek. xx. 37. Bonds might be cancelled in different ways. Sometimes the written engagement was blotted out, or it was struck through with a nail, and thus declared to have lost its force. At other times a rod was broken, in token that the covenant or agreement was at an end. To this last custom there is an obvious allusion in Zech. xi. 10, 14, "And I took my staff, even Beauty, and cut it asunder, that I might break my covenant which I had made with all the people. Then I cut asunder mine other staff, even Bands, that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel,"—a passage which is thus satisfactorily explained by Dr Jamieson:—"To understand the action of the prophet more fully, it is necessary to add, that intercourse between two persons who were leagued in a contract, or any kind of engagement, with each other, was frequently carried on, when they were at a distance, by means of two sticks. These, which in form and thickness exactly correspond with each other as tallies, were used as the medium of communication. A paper wrapped round one of them, and written upon, when carried to the other, and fitted in like manner to his rod, was easily read and understood, although, to the messenger who had carried it, and who was without the means of adjusting it so as to make it legible, it appeared a heap of incoherent and cabalistical characters. The breaking of both these tallies, or even of one of them, was equivalent to a breach of the covenant, or was understood as a cessation of all further intercourse."

The word "Bonds" is sometimes used in Scripture for fetters, with which criminals are bound. Thus in Acts xxvi. 31, it is said, "This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds." In this sense bonds were of two kinds, public and private. The former were employed to secure a prisoner in the public jail, after confession or conviction; the latter, when he was delivered to a magistrate, or even to private persons, to be kept at their houses till he should be tried.

BONDAGE, a state of servitude. See SLAVES—SLAVERY.

BONDAGE OF CORRUPTION. This phrase of Paul (Rom. viii. 21) has been differently understood, as has the whole magnificent passage of which it forms a part. Some, mistaking the connection and scope of the passage, have explained it of moral corruption, and have hence argued the final restoration of all men to holiness and happiness. But the context plainly shows that the apostle is treating exclusively of the future glory which awaits the believer in Christ, in consequence of his adoption as a child of God and joint-heir with Christ. A part of that glory is the deliverance of this visible creation from its present subjection to change, decay, and death, in the day that this mortal shall put on immortality. 1 Cor. xv. 50-54; 2 Cor. v. 4.

BONES, the hard parts of animal bodies. They form the solid, unyielding structure of the animal frame, sustaining the weight of the body, and furnishing to the muscles, or agents of motion, fixed points of attachment. They are formed into separate pieces, with a view to their being moveable upon one another. Their extremities are connected together by smooth surfaces, which are bound together by firm bands or ligaments, bracing them on the sides where they are exposed to the greatest strain. In these respects, the structure of the bones of animals affords a striking proof of the wisdom of the great Creator. And in the hollowness of the bones of animal limbs we see an additional proof that He who formed us is Divine. The bones of the arms and legs have to perform the office of levers, and are thus exposed to very great transverse strains. By this form they become incomparably strong and stiff, and give more room for the insertion of muscles, while they are lighter, and therefore more agile; and the same wisdom has made use of this hollow for other valuable purposes of the animal economy. The following admirable exposition of the singular adaptation of the human spine to the great objects and designs of its structure, is given by Dr Kidd, in his 'Bridgewater Treatise,' and affords a remarkable instance of Divine wisdom in one important part of the bony structure in man:—"In considering the office of the adult spine, we find that great strength, combined with great flexibility, is particularly requisite. With reference to strength, the pyramidal form of this natural column is obviously conducive to the purpose intended; and the arrangement of the solid matter of which it is composed is such as to contribute to the same effect; for that solid matter, instead of being collected into one compact mass, is diffused in such a manner as to resemble the structure of sponge; and it is well known, with reference to the strength of artificial columns, that the same quantity of matter being given for each, and their height being the same, those columns which are hollow are stronger than those which are solid. Again, the whole column is made up of numerous parts, called vertebræ, which are so firmly bound together as to lessen the chance of being broken in the act of bending; and these vertebræ being applied to each other throughout by broad horizontal surfaces, are thus best calculated to support the perpendicular pressure of the superincumbent parts. The effect of general strength is further accomplished by the mutual locking in of the projecting portions or processes of the several vertebræ; and the same effect is accomplished to an additional extent among those vertebræ which belong to the thorax or chest, by the mode of articulation between them and the ribs; each rib being united, not entirely to a single vertebra, but partially to two contiguous vertebræ, near their line of junction. The flexibility of the spine is secured to the utmost requisite extent, by the great number of articulations or joints which it possesses, amounting to more than twenty; as well as by the elasticity of the substance constituting those joints; and the projecting parts or processes of the several vertebræ, which serve for the insertion of the muscles and tendons which are to move the whole, are differently disposed in the neck, the back, and the loins, so as to be accommodated to the degree and kind of motion required in each; thus the vertebræ of the neck admit of a lateral motion to a greater extent than those of the back; and the vertebræ of the back admit of flexion and extension to a greater degree than those of the neck; while the vertebræ of the loins, being intended for support rather than flexibility, have their processes so distributed as to contribute principally to the former of those effects."

Frequent allusions to the bones occur in the Sacred Writings. Thus the Psalmist says (Psal. cxli. 7), "Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth." This is a strongly figurative expression. The words "bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh," denote having the same nature, and being united by the closest and the tenderest ties; and in the same way, when the apostle would point out the mystical union which exists between Christ and his people, he speaks of the believer, in Eph. v. 30, as being a "member of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones." The valley of dry bones in Ezekiel's vision, represents a state of utter helplessness, apart from Divine interposition and aid.

BONNET was a covering for the head, worn by the Jewish priests. Josephus says, that the bonnet worn by the private priests was composed of several rounds of linen cloth, turned in and sewed together, so as to appear like a thick linen crown. The whole was entirely covered with another piece of linen, which came down as low as their forehead, and concealed the deformity of the seams. See Exod. xxviii. 40. The high priest's bonnet was not much different from that which has been described. These bonnets appear to have resembled the modern turban of the East. Bonnets are mentioned by Isaiah (iii. 20), in giving a detailed account of the articles worn by Jewish ladies in his time. These were worn upon the crown of the head, like a skull-cap, but of a most elegant appearance, consisting of little circles of thin beaten gold, adorned with emeralds, and other precious stones.

BONZES, priests of the religion of Fo, in Eastern Asia.

BOOK. There are two words employed in the Hebrew Scriptures to denote a book—the one implying a writing of any kind, and the other a roll or volume. Dr Macgill, in his 'Lectures on Rhetoric and Criticism,' gives the following account of the materials of which books were early composed:—"The material on which writing was made, differed according to its occasion and object. When the object was some public memorial, as the inscription of remarkable events, eras, or laws, the material chosen was of a durable order, such as stone, wood, or metal. Thus, the first example of writing, on record, was on stone. This was that of the two tables of the moral law. From a passage in the 19th chapter of the book of Job, it appears that men were, in his time, accustomed to write on plates of lead, to cut inscriptions on a rock, and to use an iron style. The laws of Solon were inscribed on wood; the laws of the Romans, on plates of brass; and, from the number of the plates, they were called the laws of the twelve tables. For similar purposes, it was common among some ancient nations to write on bricks and flat stones; and we are informed by Herodotus, that the Babylonians inscribed on bricks their astronomical observations; the bricks being at first in a soft state, and after the inscription was made hardened by fire. For common and temporary uses, the bark and the leaves of trees were employed, particularly those of the palm-tree. Hence liber became the name of a book, and we speak of the leaves of a book, and of folios. For more lasting uses, the skins of animals were very early employed. From the earliest times, we find them dressed and prepared for various purposes. In the book of Exodus it is stated, that the people of Israel used them for the covering of the tabernacle; amongst others, 'skins dyed red' are mentioned; and it has been noticed as a singular fact, that one of the old manuscripts of the law which Dr Buchanan received from the black Jews in India, was written on goat skins, dyed red. In the interior of China, also, the roll on which the law is written, used in some of the synagogues, is of goat skin, made into flexible leather, dyed red in a similar manner. The Mexicans used skins for their hieroglyphic paintings; and, in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, there are two books of hieroglyphics of the same kind.

"Linen cloth was common in very early ages. 'I will not,' said Abram to the king of Sodom, 'take from thee a thread of the woof, even to the latchet.' Rebecca is said to have covered herself with a veil. Joseph had a coat of many colours; and Pharaoh arrayed him in vesture of fine linen. Linen manuscripts are accordingly mentioned by various authors. Some are found at present. And Livy makes mention of 'linen books.' These various materials soon came to be so manufactured, as to be well fitted to their design. When writing was generally employed, in the ordinary business of life, materials of a still more artificial kind were adopted. Among these was the papyrus of Egypt. Paper was afterwards made from various substances. But almost every material for writing, intended to be preserved, yielded at length to the general use of parchment or vellum. For less important purposes, various materials, and in various forms, were adopted. We find, for example, tablets; and these made often of thin pieces of wood. Sometimes the letters were made in the wood itself; at other times on wax covering the wood. Sometimes tablets were covered with a substance like chalk, which could easily be rubbed off. From these tablets the writers transferred their compositions into the more durable form of parchment books. To such tablets various passages of the Scripture refer. Thus Isaiah receives this command: 'Go write it before them on a tablet, and note it on a book; that it may be for the time to come, for ever and ever.' St Paul desires Timothy to bring with him 'the books, but especially the parchments.' Dr Shaw mentions, that in Barbary the children were taught to write on a thin piece of wood covered over with whitening. In India, children are seen writing lessons on the ground, strewed over with fine sand: Hence you find in the Scriptures allusions to writing in the sand, or on the earth—to mark that which would be 'forgotten or blotted out.'

"The instrument used in writing was different according to the material. On some substances it was necessary to use a sharp-pointed instrument, called in Latin, stylus. These were made of metal or bone, sharp at one end, and blunt at the other. When the ancients wrote on parchment or paper, they used reeds or canes for pens. Pencils made of hair were also employed, and at present are employed in China.

"It is useful to observe, also, that manuscripts were very generally rolled round a cylinder of wood. Hence you read in the Scriptures of 'the roll of the book;' 'the roll which thou hast written.' At the same time, it appears that the ancients often bound their books in a manner similar to our own. These rolls were kept in wooden, brazen, earthen, or stone vessels. Sometimes they were wrapt up in very costly and elegant coverings, on which were written some title or character of the work. And it has been supposed that the titles affixed to some of the Psalms, were the inscriptions on these external coverings.

"The different sheets of parchments were joined together, sometimes downwards from the first sheet; and sometimes at the side horizontally. The Hebrew manuscripts were written in column, and not across the whole breadth of the parchment, and when the whole parchment was not filled, another book was sometimes commenced on the same sheet. Hence, you find a part of the first chapter of the book of Ezra, has been found joined to the last of the book of Chronicles." On the same subject Mr Horne makes the following judicious remarks:—"David alludes to the pen of a ready writer (Ps. xlv. 1), and Baruch, as we are told, wrote the words of Jeremiah with ink in a book. Jer. xxxvi. 18. It is highly probable that several of the prophets wrote upon tablets of wood, or some similar substance. (Compare Isa. xxx. 8, and Habak. ii. 2.) Such tablets, it is well known, were in use long before the time of Homer (who lived about one hundred and fifty years before the prophet Isaiah.) Zecharias, the father of John the Baptist, when required to name his son, asked for a writing-table, (Luke i. 63); and such tablets were also in use among the Romans and other ancient nations, and were not finally disused until the fourteenth century of the Christian era. They were in general covered with wax, and the writing was executed with styles or pens, made of gold, silver, brass, iron, copper, ivory or bone, which at one end were pointed for the purpose of inscribing the letters, and smooth at the other extremity for the purpose of erasing. In Barbary the children, who are sent to school, write on a smooth thin board slightly daubed over with whiting, which may be wiped off or renewed at pleasure. The Copts, who are employed by the great men of Egypt in keeping their accounts, &c., make use of a kind of pasteboard, from which the writing is occasionally wiped off with a wet sponge. To this mode of writing there is an allusion in Neh. xiii. 14, and especially in Numb. v. 23; where, in the case of the woman suspected of adultery who was to take an oath of cursing, it is said that the priest shall write the curses in a book, and blot them out with the bitter water. It appears that these maledictions were written with a kind of ink prepared for the purpose, without any calx of iron or other material that could make a permanent dye; and were then washed off the parchment into the water which the woman was obliged to drink: so that she drank the very words of the execration. The ink used in the East is almost all of this kind; a wet sponge will completely obliterate the finest of their writings."

In regard to the form of books, we may avail ourselves of a very instructive passage from the very valuable Biblical and Theological Dictionary of Dr Watson:—

"The first books were in the form of blocks and tables, of which we find frequent mention in Scripture, under the appellation sepher, which the Septuagint render axines,—that is, square tables; of which form the book of the covenant, book of the law, book or bill of divorce, book of curses, &c., appear to have been. As flexible matters came to be written on, they found it more convenient to make their books in form of rolls, called by the Latins volumina,—which appear to have been in use among the ancient Jews as well as the Grecians, Romans, Persians, and even Indians; and of such did the libraries chiefly consist, till some centuries after Christ. The form which prevails among us is the square, composed of separate leaves; which was also known, though little used, among the ancients; having been invented by Attalus, king of Pergamus, the same who also invented parchment; but it has now been so long in possession, that the oldest manuscripts are found in it. Montfaucon assures us, that of all the ancient Greek manuscripts he has seen, there are but two in the roll form; the rest being made up much after the manner of the modern books. The rolls, or volumes, were composed of several sheets, fastened to each other, and rolled upon a stick, or umbilicus; the whole making a kind of column, or cylinder, which was to be managed by the umbilicus as a handle; it being reputed a kind of crime to take hold of the roll itself. The outside of the volume was called frons,—the ends of the umbilicus were called cornua, "horns;" which were usually carved, and adorned likewise with silver, ivory, or even gold and precious stones. Whilst the Egyptian papyrus was in common use, its brittle nature made it proper to roll up what they wrote; and as this had been a customary practice, many continued it when they used other materials, which might very safely have been treated in a different manner. To the form of books belongs the economy of the inside, or the order and arrangement of points and letters into lines and pages, with margins, and other appurtenances. This has undergone many varieties. At first, the letters were only divided into lines, then into separate words; which, by degrees, were noted with accents, and distributed by points and stops into periods, paragraphs, chapters, and other divisions. In some countries, as among the Orientals, the lines began from the right, and ran to the left; in others, as in northern and western nations, from the left to the right; others, as the Grecians, followed both directions alternately, going in the one and returning in the other, called boustrophedon, because it was after the manner of oxen turning when at plough. In the Chinese books, the lines ran from top to bottom. Again, the page in some is entire, and uniform; in others, divided into columns; in others, distinguished into texts and notes, either marginal or at the bottom; usually it is furnished with signatures and catch-words; also with a register to discover whether the book be complete. To these are occasionally added the apparatus of summaries, or side notes; the embellishments of red, gold, or figured initial letters, head-pieces, tail-pieces, effigies, schemes, maps, and the like. The end of the book, now denoted by finis, was anciently marked with a <, called coronis, and the whole frequently washed with an oil drawn from cedar or citron chips strewed between the leaves, to preserve it from rotting. There also occur certain formulae at the beginning and end of books; as among the Jews, the word hezek (be strong), which we find at the end of the books of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Ezekiel, &c., to exhort the reader to be courageous, and proceed on to the following book. The conclusions were also often guarded with imprecations against such as should falsify them, of which we have an instance in the Apocalypse. The Mohammedans, for the like reason, place the name of God at the beginning of all their books, which cannot fail to procure them protection, on account of the infinite regard which they pay to that name, wherever found.

BOOK OF LIFE, or BOOK OF THE LIVING, or BOOK OF THE LORD. Ps. lxix. 28. It is very probable that these descriptive phrases, which are frequent in Scripture, are taken from the custom observed generally in the courts of princes, of keeping a list of persons who are in their service, of the provinces which they govern, of the officers of their armies, of the number of their troops, and sometimes even of the names of their soldiers. Thus Moses desires God rather to blot him out of his book, than to reject Israel. Exod. xxxii. 32. Vitranga remarks, that the expression, "the book of life," alludes to the genealogical tables of the Jewish priests, as it may be rendered the "book of lives." Dean Woodhouse on this subject observes: "As in states and cities, those who obtained freedom and fellowship were enrolled in the public register, which enrolment was their title to the privileges of citizens; so the King of Heaven, of the New Jerusalem, engages to preserve in his register and enrolment in the book of life the names of those who, like the good Sardians, in a corrupt and supine society shall preserve allegiance, and a faithful discharge of their Christian duties. He will own them as his fellow-citizens before men and angels." Luke xii. 8. When it is said, that any one is written in the book of life, it means that he particularly belongs to God,—is enrolled among the number of his friends and servants. When it is said, "Blotted out of the book of life," this signifies erased from the list of God's friends and servants, as those who are guilty of treachery are struck off the roll of officers belonging to a prince.

BOOTH, a temporary hut generally built of loose stones, and covered with reeds and boughs. Such erections were constructed by Oriental shepherds when unprovided with tents; and the Israelites, in passing through the wilderness, were often obliged to take shelter in such booths, from the want of a sufficient number of tents. In remembrance of this circumstance, the solemn festival was instituted, which was denominated the Feast of Tabernacles (which see).

BOOTY, spoils taken in war. The Jewish law in reference to the distribution of the booty is contained in Numh. xxxi. 27–30. "And divide the prey into two parts, between them that took the war upon them, who went out to hattle, and between all the congregation; and levy a tribute unto the Lord of the men of war which went out to battle." The Rabbins allege that under the kings of Israel a different rule was followed, according to which all that had belonged to the conquered king was allotted to the king who was conqueror, and the rest of the booty was divided equally between the king and the soldiers.

BOOZ, one of the ancestors of our Lord according to the flesh, the son of Salmon and Rahab. See BOAZ.

BORRELLISTS, a Christian sect in Holland, so named from their founder, Borrel, a man of great learning in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin tongues. They reject the use of the sacraments, public prayer, and all other external acts of worship. They assert that all the Christian Churches of the world have degenerated from the pure apostolic doctrines, because they have suffered the Word of God, which is infallible, to be expounded, or rather corrupted, by doctors who are fallible. They lead a very austere life, and employ a great part of their goods in alms.

BORROW. When our translation states that the Hebrews borrowed things of value from the Egyptians, the Hebrew word signifies merely to ask, and does not imply any promise of returning them. Dr Adam Clarke translates it, "request, demand, require." As God is the supreme possessor of all things, might he not transfer the right of the Egyptians to his own people, and require them to demand what he gave them? When the Egyptians had denied them their just wages, might not God, the supreme judge, allot them their wages, and order them to demand it in this manner? Exod. iii. 22, xii. 35. To borrow money or goods, without earnestly endeavouring to pay in due time, is a mark of a wicked and covetous person. Psal. xxxvii. 21. It is sinful to injure, in any way, what we have borrowed. Exod. xxii. 14, 15.

BOSOM, the breast. The Orientals generally wore long, wide, and loose garments; and when about to carry anything away that their hands would not contain, they used for the purpose a fold in the bosom of their robe. To this custom our Lord alludes,—"Good measure shall men give into your bosom." Luke vi. 38. To have one "in our bosom," implies kindness, secrecy, intimacy. Gen. xvi. 5; 2 Sam. xii. 8. The mode in which the Orientals, and indeed the ancient Greeks and Romans, sat, or rather reclined at table, was such, that he who reclined immediately below another at table seemed, as it were, to lie in his bosom. (See ACCUBATION). Hence the expression, Christ is in the bosom of the Father; that is, possesses the closest intimacy and perfect knowledge of the Father. John i. 18. Our Saviour is said to carry his lambs in his bosom, which beautifully represents his tender care and watchfulness over them. Isa. xl. 11.

BOSSES, the thickest and strongest parts of a buckler. Job xv. 26. See ARMS—BUCKLER.

BOSTON, REV. THOMAS. There is no name which is more uniformly associated, in the minds of Scottish Christians, with true vital religion, than that of Boston, the author of 'The Fourfold State of Man,' a work which has been eminently blessed for the advancement of spiritual religion among all classes of the people. This useful minister of Christ was born at Dunse, in Berwickshire, on the 17th of March 1676. He was early made a subject of saving grace, having been converted to God in his twelfth year, by means of the preaching of the Rev. Henry Erskine, the father of Ralph and Ebenezer Erskine, the well-known originators of the first great secession from the Church of Scotland. From his conversion, throughout the whole of his life, Thomas Boston continued consistently to manifest that he had indeed tasted and seen that the Lord is gracious. Having early shown an inclination for the ministry, his parents, though poor, made an effort to have him educated with that view. He studied at the University of Edinburgh, and was at length settled, in 1699, as minister of Simprin, a small parish now united to that of Swinton, in Roxburghshire. Here for several years he laboured with the utmost assiduity and diligence, until, in the providence of God, he was called to remove to Ettrick in 1707. While here he published various valuable works, which will ever hold a high place in the Christian literature of his country. Not only was he a man of talent and devoted piety, but, although it is not generally known, he was a man of extensive learning. Michaelis speaks of him as the "most illustrious and most learned Boston," and says, "that he had handled the subject of Hebrew punctuation with so much ingenuity, accuracy, cautious solidity, assiduity, and attention to the natural principles of the doctrine, as to leave all others whom he had seen or read far behind." As Boston lived and laboured, so he died, firm in the faith of the Lord Jesus. He entered into rest on the 20th May 1732, aged fifty-six.

BOTTLE, a vessel used for holding water and other liquids. Bottles in the East are made of the skin of a goat or kid, stripped off without opening the belly; the apertures made by cutting off the tail and legs are sewed up, and when filled, it is tied about the neck. These skin bottles preserve the water, milk, and other liquids, in a fresher state than any other vessels they can use. Both dry and liquid articles are carried in these bottles even at the present day. The Psalmist alludes to the goat-skin bottle, when he says (Psal. cxix. 83), "I am become like a bottle in the smoke;" that is, a bottle in the tent of an Arab, which becomes black, dry, and shrivelled. Skin bottles are in danger, on some occasions, of being rent; and hence the remark of our Lord: "Neither do men put new wine into old bottles: else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish: but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved." Matt. ix. 17. That skin bottles were used for holding wine is plain from a passage in Jeremiah (xiii. 12): "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Every bottle shall be filled with wine: and they shall say unto thee, Do we not certainly know that every bottle shall be filled with wine?" The Arabs use bottles of goat-skin, with the hairy side inwards, for receiving the milk of their flocks; and when they wish to make butter, they put the cream into a goat-skin, prepared in the same manner, which they suspend in their tents, and then press it to and fro in one uniform direction. In the Levant they tread upon the skin with their feet, which produces the same effect. To this, perhaps, there is an allusion in Job xxix. 6: "When I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil." Butter is carried to market in the same goat skins in which it has been churned. Bottles are now generally made of the coarsest glass, and its green colour is occasioned by the existence of a portion of iron in the sand; and it may be, also, in the vegetable ashes of which it is composed.

BOTTOMLESS PIT. See ABYSS—PIT.

BOUNDARIES. It was regarded as a very heinous sin to remove landmarks or boundaries between lands. The law of God is quite explicit on this point. Thus:—"Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the land that the Lord thy God giveth thee to possess it." Deut. xix. 14. Job reckons those who are guilty of this crime among thieves and robbers, and oppressors of the poor. Josephus has interpreted the law of Moses in a very particular sense. He says, "that it is not lawful to change the limits, either of the land belonging to the Israelites, or that of their neighbours with whom they are at peace; but that they ought to be left as they are, having been so placed by the order of God himself; for the desire which avaricious men have to extend their limits, is the occasion of war and division; and whosoever is capable of removing the boundaries of lands, is not far from a disposition to violate all other laws."

Among the Romans, if a slave, with an evil design, changed any boundary, he was punished with death. Men of condition were sometimes banished, and private persons punished according to the circumstances of their crime, by pecuniary fines or corporal punishment. The respect of the ancients for boundaries proceeded almost to adoration. Numa Pompilius, king of the Romans, ordained that offerings should be made to boundaries, with thick milk, cakes, and first-fruits. Ovid says, that a lamb was sacrificed to them, and that they were sprinkled with blood; and Juvenal speaks of cake and pap, which were laid every year upon the sacred bounds.

The Scripture reckons it among the effects of God's omnipotence, to have fixed bounds to the sea. Psal. civ. 9; Job xxvi. 10; Prov. viii. 29; Jer. v. 22.

BOURIGNONISTS, the followers of Antoinette Bourignon, a lady in France, who pretended to particular inspirations. She was born at Lisle, in 1616. At her birth she was so deformed that it was debated some days in the family whether it was not proper to stifle her as a monster; but her deformity diminishing, she was spared. From her childhood to her old age she had an extraordinary turn of mind. She set up for a reformer, and published a great number of books filled with very singular notions; the most remarkable of which are entitled, 'The Light of the World,' and 'The Testimony of Truth.' In her confession of faith, she professes her belief in the Scriptures, and in the divinity and atonement of Christ. She believed, also, that man is perfectly free to resist or receive Divine grace; that there is no such thing as foreknowledge or election; that God is ever unchangeable in his love towards all his creatures, and does not inflict any arbitrary punishment, but that the evils they suffer are the natural consequence of sin; that religion consists not in outward forms of worship nor systems of faith, but in an entire resignation to the will of God, and those inward feelings which arise from immediate communion with God. She held many extravagant notions, among which, it is said, she asserted that Adam, before the fall, possessed the principles of both sexes; that in an ecstasy, God represented Adam to her mind in his original state, as also the beauty of the first world, and how he had drawn it from the chaos; and that everything was bright, transparent, and darted forth life and ineffable glory; that Christ has a twofold manhood,—one formed of Adam before the creation of Eve, and another taken from the Virgin Mary; that his human nature was corrupted with a principle of rebellion against God's will; with a number of other wild ideas. She dressed like a hermit, and travelled through France, Holland, England, and Scotland. She died at Franeker, October 30, 1680. Her principal patrons were Christian Bartholomew, a Jansenist priest at Mechlin, and Peter Poinet, who employed a surprising genius and an uncommon sagacity to dress out the reveries of fanaticism. In his 'Divine Economy,' he reduced the substance of Bonrignon's fancies to a regular form. Dr Garden of Aberdeen attempted to introduce them into Scotland, and wrote an apology in their favour. He was condemned and deposed by the General Assembly, in 1701. If we may believe Dr Kippis, she had more disciples in Scotland than in any other country, perhaps, in the world.

BOW, an offensive weapon of very remote antiquity. (See ARCHERY.) Among the Greeks, as we learn from Homer, the bow was first made of horn, and tipped with gold; but the material of which it has been most frequently composed is wood. Among the Asiatics, bows of steel or brass were in very frequent use as weapons of war. (See ARMS.) These they generally bent with their feet. Hence the expression "treading the bow," not unfrequently occurs in Sacred Scripture. It is sometimes mentioned as a remarkable warlike feat to break the bow of the enemy. Thus: "He teacheth my hands to war, so that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms." Psal. xviii. 34. The Persians, if we may credit Xenophon, carried bows three cubits in length. Eastern warriors carried their bows, in times of peace, in a case, sometimes of cloth, but more commonly of leather, hung to their girdles. Their quiver was slung at their back, so as to be within reach of the hand. When the bow was taken from the case, it was said, in the language of Habakkuk, to be "made quite naked."

Calmet describes an engine used for throwing very heavy stones, by means of a strong bow, whose circular arms are tightly held by two vertical beams, nearly upright; the cord of the bow is drawn back by means of a windlass, placed between two beams also, behind the former, but uniting with them at the top; in the centre is an arm capable of swinging backward and forward; round this arm the bow-string passes; at the bottom of this arm is placed the stone, in a kind of seat. The bow-string being drawn backward, by the power of the windlass drawing the moving arm, the rope is suddenly let go from this arm by a kind of cock, when the bow-string, recovering its natural situation, with all its power violently swings forward the moving arm and with it the stone, thereby projecting the stone with great force and velocity.

Another machine for throwing stones consists of two arms of a bow, which are strengthened by coils of rope, sinews, or hair. These arms being drawn backward as tightly as possible, by a windlass placed at some distance behind the machine, the string of the bow is attached to a kind of cock, and the stone to be discharged being placed immediately before it, on touching the cock, the violent effort of the bow threw off the stone to a great distance. The arms of this bow were of iron, which was the same as the balista of the Romans.

Besides these kinds of instruments, which were extremely powerful, others of smaller size and inferior powers were constructed, for the purpose of being carried about. These were somewhat like our ancient cross-bows; and the bow-strings were drawn back by various contrivances,—often merely by strength of arm, or by forcing the board that carried the arrow to its station backwards, by pressing it against the ground.

After describing these various warlike machines, Calmet supposes that Jacob refers to the last mentioned kind of bow, in Gen. xlix. 24: "But his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob; (from thence is the shepherd, the stone of Israel.)" In Scripture, we often find mention made of a deceitful bow, as in Hosea vii. 15, 16: "Though I have bound and strengthened their arms, yet do they imagine mischief against me. They return, but not to the Most High: they are like a deceitful bow: their princes shall fall by the sword for the rage of their tongue: this shall be their derision in the land of Egypt." This probably refers to the bow-string which was composed of twisted horse hair or the entrails of animals, made into catgut, being so affected by the temperature as to be often rendered useless. The same figure occurs in Psal. lxxviii. 57: "But turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers: they were turned aside like a deceitful bow."

BOWELS. This term is often used in Scripture to denote the seat of mercy, tenderness, and compassion. Thus it is said, "Joseph made haste; for his bowels did yearn upon his brother." Gen. xliii. 30. The same expression is still in use in Eastern countries.

BOWING. This was a very frequent mode of showing respect in ancient, as it still is in modern times. Thus we are informed, in Gen. xxiii. 7, "And Abraham stood up, and bowed himself to the people of the land, even to the children of Heth;" and in Gen. xxxiii. 3, "And he passed over before them, and bowed himself to the ground seven times, until he came near to his brother." But while bowing the head and body is often spoken of in Scripture as the usual token of outward respect to our fellow-men, we also find bowing the knee mentioned as a sign of adoration, whether of the true God or of idols. (See ADORATION.) In 1 Kings xix. 18, this action is referred to in connection with worship: "Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him."

BOWL. We find "bowls of pure gold" mentioned in Exod. xxv. 29, in describing the vessels used in the service of the tabernacle. What these were is not precisely known, but it is probable that they were golden vases of very elegant workmanship, richly chased and embossed.

BOX. This word occurs in 2 Kings ix. 1, 3; but it more properly means a small leathern flask or bottle used for holding oil. In the New Testament we find the word rendered box rightly entitled to that name. Such boxes, intended to contain ointment, were generally of a very small size. One of them, however, is mentioned as of larger dimensions: "Then took Mary a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment." John xii. 3. The pound weight of those times is generally supposed to be somewhat more than twelve ounces of our avoirdupois weight; and the value of which, at the rate in which these articles are sold in Eastern countries now, is computed to be upwards of nine pounds sterling of our money.

BOXING. This was one of the rudest of the exercises practised in the games of the ancients. The combatants had in their hands balls of stone or lead. In earlier times, the hands and arms were naked and unguarded, but afterwards they were surrounded with thongs of leather called cestus, filled with plummets of lead and iron. Thus the boxers were so provided that they could defend themselves, and strike heavy blows at the adversary. To protect the head, they wore a leathern cap, covering their temples and ears. The contest was generally prolonged until one of the combatants, either through fatigue or loss of blood, swooned away and fell upon the ground. To this the Apostle Paul seems to allude in Heb. xii. 4: "Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin." In preparation for the games, and to acquire skill and dexterity in boxing, the intending combatants exercise their arms with the gauntlet on, and hence the apostle's expression: "So fight I, not as one that beateth the air." 1 Cor. ix. 26. When about to engage in the contest, they stripped off every article of clothing which might, in the slightest degree, hinder or incommode them. Accordingly, in allusion to this custom, the apostle speaks (Heb. xii. 1) of laying "aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset us."

BOX TREE (its Hebrew name implying flourishing, or perpetual viridity), an evergreen. Isaiah (xli. 19) says, "I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil tree; I will set in the desert the fir tree, and the pine, and the box tree together." The nature of the box tree might lead us to look for evergreens among the foregoing trees, and perhaps, by tracing this idea, we might attain to something like satisfaction respecting them, which at present we cannot. A plantation of evergreens in the wilderness is not unlikely to be the import of this passage. The contrast between a perpetual verdure, and at other times universal brownness, not enlivened by variety of tints, must be very great; nevertheless we must be careful not to group unnaturally associated vegetation. The plant alluded to in Scripture is undoubtedly the Buxus sempervirens of Linnæus. This tree abounds in many countries of Asia, as in Persia, China, Cochiu-China, and other places. Bochart says it is found by the shores of the Dead Sea. It is of the class Monœcia; order, Tetrandria.

BOZEZ, the name of a rock which Jonathan climbed up to attack the Philistines. 1 Sam. xiv. 4. It was situated between Migron and Michmash, and formed, with a similar rock opposite, called Seueh, a defile or strait. Professor Robinson tells us, that "in the bottom of the valley directly between Jeba and Mûkhuûs are two conical hills not very high, which are probably the scene of Jonathan's romantic adventure against the Philistines."

BOZKATH, or BOSCATH, a town situated in the territory of the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 39. It appears to have been the birth-place of Jedidah, the mother of Josiah, King of Judah. 2 Kings xxii. 1.

BOZRAH, the northern capital of Edom or Idumea. There is great difficulty connected with the site of this city. Some suppose it to have been the same with BEZER (which see). It is mentioned in some passages of Scripture as belonging to Israel (Micah ii. 12); in others, as belonging to Moab (Jer. xlviii. 24); and in others, as belonging to Edom. Jer. xlix. 13. In this last passage there is a prediction as to the desolation which should come upon Bozrah: "For I have sworn by myself, saith the Lord, that Bozrah shall become a desolation, a reproach, a waste, and a curse; and all the cities thereof shall be perpetual wastes." The following minute description of the present state of the city, drawn from Burckhardt and other travellers, is given by Mr Wylie, in his 'Modern Judea':—"Bozrah, which is famous as the city mentioned by the prophet, in his triumphal ode,—'Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah?'—is situated in the open plain, in the southern part of the Hauran. Its name, in the Syriac tongue, means the strong fortress, and several parts of the thick wall by which it was anciently enclosed, and which gave to it the reputation of great strength, still remain. The ruins cover a large oval of about three miles in circumference, and are approached on the west by a broad paved road,—the work of the Romans. The city gate, a noble arch, is still standing and entire. The moment we enter we discover the general arrangement of the ruins. A street runs eastward in a straight line through the city, and appears to have been the principal street of Bozrah; part of the ancient pavement remains, and on either side is a foot-path for passengers. This street is crossed at right angles by another, running from north to south. The ground is covered with the remains of Roman theatres, Christian churches, Mohammedan mosques, Saracenic castles, triumphal arches, and numerous columns, belonging to the Doric, Corinthian, and Ionic orders; some of these are richly sculptured, many are fallen, but a few remain erect. Around these monuments are the ruins of private dwellings, the walls of many of which still remain, but the roofs have fallen in. Beyond the walls are numerous ruins, obviously those of the suburbs of the ancient city. Of the vineyards for which Bozrah was famed in the time of the prophets, and even so late as that of the Romans, not a vestige remains. Olives grew here a few years ago, but these, too, have vanished. The only thing which tends to enliven this scene of desolation is a few rose trees, which, when Burckhardt was there, were just beginning to open their buds amid the ruins of a place which has so emphatically been rendered 'a curse.' A few wretched families, driven by oppression from other parts of the Hauran, assemble here, and live amongst the ruins. Such at this day is the state of a city, which, even so late as the seventh century, when the Saracens encamped before it, was reckoned the market of Syria and Mesopotamia, and could send forth from its gates twelve thousand horsemen. 'I have sworn by myself, saith the Lord, that Bozrah shall become a desolation, a reproach, a waste, and a curse.' This description seems best to answer to the Bozrah mentioned as belonging to the Moabites.

BRACELET, an ornament for the person, worn upon the wrist. "Two bracelets of ten shekels' weight of gold" were among the presents sent by Abraham to Rebekah. The weight here mentioned, about four ounces and a half, seems an extraordinary weight for a pair of bracelets. But they are worn as heavy, or indeed much heavier, in the East, resembling, as Chardin remarks, rather manacles than bracelets. It is not unusual to see five or six bracelets on the same arm, covering it from the wrist nearly to the elbow. Amber, coral, mother-of-pearl, and beads, are also used for bracelets, particularly for the upper part of the arm, while the bracelet worn on the wrist is usually silver. Such trinkets often form the sole wealth of an Oriental female. Hence, even among the poorer women, a single pair of them is never worn if they can possibly get more. The bracelet was worn even by men. One was found on Saul's arm, and was brought to David. 2 Sam. i. 10.

Bracelets of gold, many shekels in weight, formed part of the dress of an Oriental prince, and even a badge of his authority. Bracelets are mentioned in Ezek. xvi. 11. They were sometimes composed of mother-of-pearl; but silver bracelets were the most common. The poorer women wore them of horn, copper, glass, and other materials of a cheap description, and the arm from the elbow downwards was sometimes covered with them. Bracelets among the Jews were flat, and inclined to oval or semicircular where they open to introduce the hand.

BRAHMANISM. See HINDUISM.

BRAMBLE (atat), a prickly shrub. Judg. ix. 14, 15; Psal. lviii. 9. In the latter place it is translated "thorn." Hiller supposes atat to be the cynobastus, or sweet brier. The author of 'Scripture Illustrated' says, that the bramble seems to be well chosen as the representative of the original; which should be a plant bearing fruit of some kind, being associated (Judg. ix. 14), though by opposition, with the vine. The apologue or fable of Jotham has always been admired for its spirit and application. It has also been considered as the oldest fable extant.

BRANCH, a title of Messiah: "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a BRANCH shall grow out of his roots." Isa. xi. 1. See also Zech. iii. 8, vi. 12; Jer. xxiii. 5, xxxiii. 15. The Redeemer seems to have been described under this title, to show the ancient church that the Messiah would shoot forth or sprig, as to his human nature, from the race of man, and, in particular, from the royal line of Judah. The Saviour himself adopts the similitude, declaring himself to be the vine, and his people the branches, deriving sap from him.

It was customary in the East to strew flowers and branches of trees in the way of conquerors and princes. In reference to this custom, the Jews, when Jesus Christ entered Jerusalem, cut down branches of trees and strewed them in the way. In doing this, they showed their conviction that he was the promised Messiah, and the King of Israel. The expression "an abominable branch" occurs in Isa. xiv. 19: "But thou art cast out of thy grave like an abominable branch, and as the raiment of those that are slain, thrust through with a sword, that go down to the stoues of the pit; as a carcass trodden under feet;" and probably denotes a tree on which a malefactor was hanged, which was accounted accursed, and torn up by the roots and cast aside as worthy only of detestation and abhorrence. A branch is also the symbol of idolatrous worship. Ezek. viii. 17.

BRANDENBURG, CONFESSION OF, a formula or confession of faith, drawn up in the city of Brandenburg by order of the elector, with a view to reconcile the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the Confession of Augsburg. See AUGSBURG CONFESSION.

BRASS. The word brass occurs very often in our translation of the Bible; but what is called brass is a mixed metal, for the making of which we are indebted to the German metallurgists of the thirteenth century. That the ancients knew not the art of making it is almost certain. None of their writings even hint at the process. There can be no doubt that copper is the original metal intended. This is spoken of as known prior to the flood, and to have been discovered, or at least wrought, as was also iron, in the seventh generation from Adam, by Tubal-cain; whence the name Vulcan. The knowledge of these two metals must have been carried over the world afterwards with the spreading colonies of the Noachidæ. Agreeably to this, the ancient histories of the Greeks and Romans speak of Cadmus as the discoverer of the metal which by the former is called chalkos, and by the latter, æs; and from him had the denomination, cadmea. According to others, Cadmus discovered a mine, of which he taught the use. The name of the person here spoken of was undoubtedly the same with Ham, or Cam, the son of Noah, who probably learned the art of assaying metals from the family of Tubal-cain, and communicated that knowledge to the people of the colony which he settled.

If we may judge from the discoveries of ancient arms in Egypt and elsewhere, the brass of antiquity seems rather to have been a kind of bronze. "The skill of the Egyptians," says Sir John Gardner Wilkinson, "in compounding metals is abundantly proved by the vases, mirrors, arms, and implements of bronze, discovered at Thebes, and in other parts of Egypt; and the numerous methods they adopted for varying the composition of bronze, by a judicious mixture of alloys, are shown in the many qualities of the metal. They had even the secret of giving to bronze or brass blades a certain degree of elasticity, as may be seen in the dagger of the Berlin Museum." The Macedonian empire is described, in Dan. ii. 39, as a kingdom of brass, in allusion to its warlike nature. See METALS.

BRAZEN SERPENT. See SERPENT.

BREACH, a breaking, or place broken. God's breach of promise is not his falsification of his word, but the just interruption of its fulfilment on account of Israel's sin; and it may be remarked, that God never promised that those who came out of Egypt should enter Canaan. Moreover, the words may be thus understood: When your children are brought into Canaan, then shall it appear I have made no breach of my promise, as you have falsely charged me. Numb. xiv. 34. Moses stood in the breach; Israel's sins had opened the way for the destructive vengeance of God to destroy them utterly, but Moses' powerful intercession prevented it. Psal. cvi. 23. The Jews' iniquity was like a breach swelling out in a high wall; it had brought the righteous judgments of God just to the very point of ruining them. Isa. xxx. 13.

BREAD, a word which in Scripture is taken for food in general. Gen. iii. 19, xviii. 5, xxviii. 20; Exod. ii. 20. The Jews chiefly satisfied their hunger with bread, and quenched their thirst with water. Hence bread and water are spoken of as quite competent for the sustenance of man. Their bread was generally made of wheat or barley, or lentiles and beans. Wheaten bread was preferred; and it was only in times of scarcity that barley bread was resorted to. (See BARLEY.) The loaves of bread in the East appear to have been very small, so that three of them were required for the repast of a single person. Hence the passage in Luke xi. 5, 6: "And he said unto them, Which of you shall have a friend, and shall go unto him at midnight, and say unto him, Friend, lend me three loaves; for a friend of mine in his journey is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him?" The loaves were generally eaten new, and baked as they were needed. Manna is called bread from heaven (Exod. xvi. 15); and the gospel is termed (Matt. xv. 26) the "children's bread."

The ancient Hebrews had various ways of baking bread; they often baked it under the ashes, upon the hearth, upon round copper plates, or in pans or stoves made on purpose. At their departure out of Egypt, they made some of these unleavened loaves for their journey. Exod. xii. 39. Elijah, when fleeing from Jezebel, found at his head a cake, which had been baked on the coals, and a cruse of water. 1 Kings xix. 6. The same prophet desired the widow of Sarepta to make a little bread (cake) for him, and to bake it under the ashes. 1 Kings xvii. 13. The Hebrews call this kind of cake huggoth; and Hosea (vii. 8) compares Ephraim to one of them which was not turned, but was baked on one side only.

BREAK. To break with breach on breach, is to afflict with one sore trouble after another. Job xvi. 14. The breaking of the heart, denotes great inward grief and trouble, or a deep and kindly conviction of, and sorrow for, sin. Acts xxi. 13; Luke iv. 18; Isa. lxi. 1. To break up our fallow ground, is to study a deep conviction of sin and misery, and care to be reformed by means of God's Word. Jer. iv. 3; Hos. x. 12. The breaking of the day, signifies the first appearance of the morning light (Gen. xxxii. 24), the first beginning of the gospel dispensation, and of the state of perfect and everlasting glory. Cant. ii. 17. Breaking of bread, signifies the giving and receiving of the Lord's Supper. Acts ii. 42, xx. 7.

BREAKFAST. Among many of the nations of antiquity it was customary to have a morning meal, consisting of bread and wine. But among the Jews no such custom appears to have prevailed, as they seldom partook of food or wine till after the morning sacrifice. Hence the indignant reply of Peter: "We are not drunken as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day." The Syrians of the present day usually rise at dawn, and content themselves with taking a few grapes; but they only partake of a regular and prepared breakfast when they are about to set out on a journey, or in the winter season.

BREAST. Females in Eastern countries are anxious to display full swelling bosoms, and hence the peculiarity of the language used in Song of Solomon viii. 10, "I am a wall, and my breasts like towers: then was I in his eyes as one that found favour." Such language may appear extravagant to those who are unacquainted with Oriental customs.

Beating the breast was a very frequent sign of mourning in Oriental countries, more especially among females. To this custom there is an obvious reference in one of our Lord's parables, where the publican is described as standing afar off, and "he would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful unto me, a sinner."

BREAST-PLATE, a piece of embroidery worn by the high-priest upon his breast. It is described in Exod. xxviii. 15–21. It was called "breast-plate of judgment," from its being worn by the high-priest when he went into the most holy place to consult God respecting those matters of judgment which were too hard for the inferior judges. The cloth which formed the ground of the breast-plate was of the same rich embroidered stuff as the ephod, of two spans in length and one in breadth. Consequently, when doubled, it was just a span or eighteen inches square. For what reason it was doubled is not apparent. Probably it was doubled thus in order that, being sewed together on three sides, and left open on one, it might form a kind of sack, pocket, or bag, as a receptacle, according to the opinion of the rabbins, of the Urim and Thummim. At each corner of the breast-plate thus made into a square form was a golden ring. To the two upper ones were attached two golden chains of wreathen work, i.e. chains made of golden threads or wires braided together, which passed up to the shoulders and were there somehow fastened to the shoulder-pieces or to the onyx-stones. By means of these chains it was suspended on the breast.

The breast-plate or corslet was a piece of defensive armour, chiefly used for protecting the breast of the warrior. See ARMS.

BREATHE, to draw natural breath, to live. Josh. x. 40, xi. 11. God's breathing imports his powerful and easy formation of man's soul in him. Gen. ii. 7. Christ's breathing on his disciples, figured his inspiring them with the vated gifts and graces of the Holy Ghost. John xx. 22. The Spirit's breathing on the dry bones, imports his giving zeal, courage, and hope to the captive Jews at Babylon, his giving spiritual life and activity to his elect, and his quickening the bodies of saints at the last day. Ezek. xxxvii. 9. The saints breathing towards God, is prayer, whereby our spiritual life is maintained and manifested, and our weakness and pressure discovered. Lam. iii. 56. Wicked men breathe out slaughter and cruelty, heartily hate their neighbours, chiefly the saints, and take pleasure to threaten and destroy them. Acts ix. 1; Psal. xxvii. 12.

BRETHREN. See BROTHER.

BRETHREN AND CLERKS OF THE COMMON LIFE, a denomination assumed by a religious fraternity towards the end of the fifteenth century. They lived under the rule of Augustine, and were said to be eminently useful in promoting the cause of religion and learning.

BRETHREN AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT, an appellation assumed by a sect which sprung up towards the close of the thirteenth century, and gained many adherents in Italy, France, and Germany. They took their denomination from the words of Paul (Rom. viii. 2, 14), and maintained that the true children of God were invested with perfect freedom from the jurisdiction of the law. They held that all things flowed by emanation from God; that rational souls were portions of the Deity; that the universe was God; and that by the power of contemplation they were united to the Deity, and acquired hereby a glorious and sublime liberty, both from the sinful lusts and the common instincts of nature; with a variety of other enthusiastic notions. Many edicts were published against them; but they continued till about the middle of the fifteenth century.

BRETHREN, THE TWELVE. See MARROW-MEN.

BRETHREN, UNITED. See MORAVIANS.

BRETHREN, WHITE, were the followers of a priest from the Alps, about the beginning of the fifteenth century. They and their leader were arrayed in white garments. Their leader carried about a cross like a standard. His apparent sanctity and devotion drew together a number of followers. This deluded enthusiast practised many acts of mortification and penance, and endeavoured to persuade the Europeans to renew the holy war. Boniface IX. ordered him to be apprehended, and committed to the flames; upon which his followers dispersed.

BREVIARY, a daily office, or book of Divine service in the Romish Church. It is composed of matins, lauds, first, third, sixth, and ninth vespers; and the compline, or post-communio; that is, of seven different hours, on account of that saying of David: "Seven times a-day will I praise thee;" whence some authors call the Breviary by the name of horæ canonicae,—canonical hours.

The Romish Breviary was composed about the eleventh century from various offices more or less ancient. It is divided much in the same manner as the Missal as to its parts. The Psalms are so distributed that in the weekly office, if the festivals of the saints did not interfere, the whole psalter would be gone over. On the festivals of saints suitable psalms are adopted. The lessons are taken partly out of the Old and New Testaments and partly out of the Acts of the Saints and Writings of the Holy Fathers. The Lord's Prayer, the Ave Maria, the Apostles' Creed, and the Confiteor are frequently said. No prayers are more frequently in the mouth of Roman Catholics than these four, to which we may add the doxology repeated in the office at the end of every psalm and in other places. In every canonical hour a hymn is also said, composed by Prudentius or some other ancient father. The Roman Breviary contains also a small office in honour of the Virgin Mary, and likewise what is called the office of the dead. We there find, besides, the penitential and the gradual psalms, as they are called, together with the litanies of the saints and of the Virgin Mary of Loretto. Every Roman Catholic was at one time bound to recite the Breviary daily; but this obligation is now limited to the clergy. Every day in the year is the Romish priest bound to read a stated portion of the Breviary; and while no obligation is laid upon him by his church to study the Word of God, that he may be wise to win souls to Christ, the poor Romish ecclesiastic must pore daily over the silly stories and idle legends of the Breviary, at variance both with the dictates of common sense and the statements of the Bible.

BRICK, a kind of artificial stone made of baked clay. Buildings were originally constructed of stone, mud, and brick. The art of brick-making is so simple that it probably belongs to the earliest ages. In Gen. xi. 3, we are informed that burnt bricks were used in the building of Babel. From the circumstance that the bricks are said, on that occasion, to have been "burnt to a burning,"—which is the meaning of the Hebrew expression,—we may readily suppose that they were burnt in a kiln, although we find no express mention made of a brick-kiln until we meet with it in 2 Sam. xii. 31. The making of bricks was a common employment in Egypt, when the Israelites dwelt in that country, and we find that straw was used in the art of brick-making; and from this it may be supposed that in Egypt bricks were not burnt in a kiln, but baked in the heat of the sun. This mode of making bricks still prevails in the East, for the ruins of the tower near Bagdad are formed of unburnt bricks. The bricks found on the site of ancient Babylon are of two kinds,—one dried in the sun, and the other burnt with fire. Every one of the kiln-burnt bricks is stamped with an inscription, which exhibits the earliest specimens of the art of imprinting. The following description of the Babylonian bricks is given by the author of the article PRINTING in the last edition of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica':—"Specimens of these bricks may be seen in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, in the British Museum, in the library of the East India Company, and in several private collections. Those at Cambridge are parallelepipeds of thirteen inches in length by three in thickness, and are made of clay mixed with reeds, and burned in the kiln. On one of the large surfaces is an indentation, produced by the forcible impression of a stamp, from the face of which a large portion has been cut away, leaving a series of figures in relief. The depression produced by this stamp is six inches and-one eighth by three and five-eighths in extent, and about three-eighths of an inch in depth. It is exceedingly rude in execution, bearing a strong resemblance to the impressions of the names of the makers to be found upon the backs of inferior earthenware; and is produced by exactly the same means, the process of baking entirely destroying whatever sharpness the soft mass may have had. The inscription is clearly stamped in after the clay has been turned out of the mould, and is not produced by any part of it; for in all known specimens it is placed in different positions, and never stands parallel to the edges of the brick, being, in fact, put on more or less awry, according to the care and manual skill of the workman. The surface of the brick around the depression is forced up considerably, which is exactly the effect of pressing the hand or any substance into a plastic material; and the edges both of the parent depression and of the figures present the effect of the stamp having been drawn up whilst the clay was still damp and adherent to it. The inscription consists of six vertical columns, containing thirty-eight figures; the columns are divided by bold straight lines. The characters are those usually called the Persepolitan or arrow-headed, but better described by the French as nail-headed. They are found very widely spread over Asia, but most plentifully at Persepolis. No one has hitherto made any considerable progress in deciphering them, nor have the learned been able to determine whether they are alphabetic, syllabic, hieroglyphic, or signs representing one or more words, as in the Chinese."

BRIDE. In Eastern countries, the bride was subjected before marriage to various purifications. In Esth. ii. 12, we learn that these purifications continued for a whole year, being "six months with oil of myrrh, and six months with sweet odours, and with other things for the purifying of the women." In ancient times, the husband made large and valuable presents to the parents and other relatives of his bride, and these presents were called the dowry. Thus we find Shechem addressing Jacob in reference to Dinah: "Ask me never so much dowry and gift, and I will give according as ye shall say unto me: but give me the damsel to wife." Gen. xxxiv. 12. When the husband was unable to give a dowry, he gave an equivalent. Thus Jacob served Laban for his daughter Rachel. The same custom has descended to modern times. In the typical language of Scripture, the Church is termed "the bride, the Lamb's wife." Rev. xxi. 9. SEE MARRIAGE.

BRIDEGROOM. After the parties were betrothed, the bridegroom was allowed to visit his espoused wife in her father's house; but for eight days before the marriage neither of the parties left home, and the bridegroom was visited by persons of his own age, who made merry with him. Accordingly, we find a reference to this latter custom in the account of Samson's marriage: "So his father went down unto the woman: and Samson made there a feast; for so used the young men to do." Judg. xiv.

10. These companions were the children of the bridechamber, of whom our Lord speaks: "And Jesus said unto them, Can the children of the bridechamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them? but the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then shall they fast." Matt. ix. 15. See MARRIAGE.

BRIDGETINS, or BRIGITTINS, an order denominated from Bridgit, or Birgit, a Swedish lady, in the fourteenth century. Their rule is nearly that of Augustine. The Brigittins profess great mortification, poverty, and self-denial; and they are not to possess anything they can call their own—not so much as a halfpenny; nor even to touch money on any account. This order spread much through Sweden, Germany, and the Netherlands. In England we read of but one monastery of Brigittins, and this built by Henry V., in 1415, opposite to Richmond, now called Sion House; the ancient inhabitants of which monastery, since the dissolution, are settled at Lisbon.

BRIDLE, a contrivance by which a rider keeps his horse in subjection. Instead of it, a cord drawn through the nose was sometimes used for leading and commanding camels, mules, and other animals. The restraints of God's powerful providence are called his bridle and hook. The bridle in the jaws of the people causing them to err, is God's suffering the Assyrians to be directed by their foolish counsels, that they might never finish their intended purpose against Jerusalem. Isa. xxxvii. 29, xxx. 28. The restraints of law, humanity, and modesty, are called a bridle; and to let it loose is to act without regard to any of these. Job xxx. 11. Blood coming to the horse bridles, implies the terrible slaughter of the Antichristians at the battle of Armageddon, or about that time. Rev. xiv. 20.

BRIEFS, APOSTOLICAL, are letters which the pope despatches to princes and other magistrates concerning any public affair.

BRIMSTONE. Brimstone or sulphur is a highly inflammable mineral, found in great abundance in the neighbourhood of volcanoes, in all parts of the world. It is a principal ingredient in gunpowder, and is used in various processes in the arts. It is mentioned in various passages of Scripture, particularly in Gen. xix. 24; Deut. xxix. 23; Job xviii. 15; Psal. xi. 6; Isa. xxx. 33, xxxiv. 9; Ezek. xxxviii. 22. It is rendered theion by the Septuagint, and is so called in Luke xvii. 29. Fire and brimstone are represented in many passages of Scripture as the elements by which God punishes the wicked, both in this life and another. There is in this a manifest allusion to the overthrow of the cities of the plain of the Jordan, by showers of ignited sulphur, to which the physical appearances of the country bear witness to this day. This awful catastrophe stands as a type of the final and eternal punishment of the wicked in another world. In Job xviii. 15, Bildad, describing the calamities which overtake the wicked person, says, "Brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation." This may be a general expression, to designate any great destruction; as that in Psal. xi. 6: "Upou the wicked he shall rain fire and brimstone." Moses, among other calamities which he sets forth in case of the people's disobedience, threatens them with the fall of brimstone, salt, and burning like the overthrow of Sodom. Deut. xxix. 23. The Prophet Isaiah (xxxiv. 9) writes that the anger of the Lord shall be shown by the streams of the land being turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone. (See DEAD SEA.) A singular Oriental custom by which sorrow was expressed, was by burning brimstone in the house of the deceased. Livy mentions this practice as general among the Romans; and some commentators think there is a reference to it in the words of Bildad, already quoted.

BROAD. God is a place of broad rivers to his people; his fulness can never be exhausted; in him they obtain the most delightful pleasure and prospect, and the surest defence; and he is sufficiently capable to destroy and overwhelm all that seek their hurt. Isa. xxxiii. 21. His law is exceeding broad; it extends to every person and circumstance, requires innumerable things to be done, and as many to be hated and avoided. Psal. cxix. 96. He sets persons in a broad place, when he gives them great liberty, wealth, power, and prosperity. Job xxxvi. 16; Psal. xviii. 19. The way to hell is broad; multitudes of men walk in it, and by sinful courses unnumbered, they get thither at last. Matt. vii. 13.

BROIDERED, wrought with various colours of needlework. Exod. xxviii. 4. Broidered or plaited hair is also mentioned in Scripture. Both the one and the other are condemned by the sacred writers, as inconsistent with that modesty and simplicity which ought ever to characterise the Christian. Thus the Apostle Paul exhorts: "In like manner also, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with broidered hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array." 1 Tim. ii. 9. And in the same spirit the Apostle Peter, speaking of Christian women, says,—"Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price." 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4. Such exhortations were called for by the luxurious habits both of Jewish and Gentile females. Their garments were richly embroidered with devices and figures of various kinds. The Jewesses had their tunics richly fringed with passages of Scripture, in letters of gold; while the Gentile ladies wore garments decorated with various emblems of their worship. In the days of the apostles, the utmost attention was paid to the dressing of the hair. Not only was it carefully plaited into a variety of elegant forms, but the language of Paul would indicate that ornaments of gold and pearls were also used in forming the head-dress. That this extravagant love of finery in plaiting and adorning the hair prevails still in the East, we learn from the following remarks of Dr Jamieson:—"It is not easy to convey an idea of the elaborate pains bestowed by Oriental ladies on their head-dress. Their great pride consists in having long flowing hair, which they plait into a variety of fanciful figures, displaying a degree of care, ingenuity, and skill, which the most accomplished hair-dresser in Europe might envy. Generally smooth and parted on the forehead, it is tastefully wrought on the crown into an imitation of a cornet, a harp, a wreath, or allowed to hang down on each temple like clusters of grapes, or woven into a basket of flowers, while over all there is strewed an incredible profusion of gold and silver filings or coins, amid which are interspersed concentric rows of pearls on the brow and top of the head, while the long tresses that hang down the back have also little wreaths of gold, or clusters of pearls, attached to their extremities, and draw down their hair by their weight the whole length of the figure. The utmost brilliancy is imparted to the appearance by this prodigal display of jewellery and flowers; to provide greater space for which, some have the top of their heads surmounted by a cap of gold in the form of an inverted cup, from the middle of which a string of gold with a row of pearls is suspended down the back."

BROOK, a word often confounded in Scripture with the word river. Thus we find the Euphrates described as a brook, "Therefore the abundance they have gotten, and that which they have laid up, shall they carry away to the brook of the willows." Isa. xv. 7. The ease with which a brook is dried up by the heat of summer, is referred to as an emblem of deceitfulness in a pretended friend. Thus Job vi. 15, "My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the stream of brooks they pass away." Often is the traveller in the East deceived by the imaginary appearance of a brook, affording the pleasing prospect of a refreshing draught of water, when, on approaching it, he finds it only to be the mirage of the desert. Thus are we too frequently disappointed when trusting to man. Calmet remarks, that the Hebrew word which signifies a brook, also denotes a valley. Hence the two are sometimes confounded. Thus the brook of Gerar is used for the valley of Gerar.

BROTH, a dish mentioned in Jdg. vi. 19: "And Gideon went in, and made ready a kid, and unleavened cakes of an ephah of flour: the flesh he put in a basket, and he put the broth in a pot, and brought it out unto him under the oak, and presented it." From this passage it would appear that Gideon roasted one part of the kid, and stewed the other; the latter being intended for immediate use, and the former for a future meal. In reference to the rejection of the Jews, the Prophet Isaiah (lxv. 4) says, "Which remain among the graves, and lodge in the monuments, which eat swine's flesh, and broth of abominable things is in their vessels;" which Bishop Hall interprets to mean, that they were so indifferent to the arrangements of their own law, as to disregard the distinction between clean and unclean meats.

BROTHER. This term is used in Scripture language in a much wider range of signification than among us, being applied to kinsmen generally. Thus Abraham says to Lot, "We be brethren" (Gen. xiii. 8), whereas Lot was only his nephew. So Jacob told Rachel that he was her father's brother (Gen. xxix. 12), whereas he was her father's nephew. In Matt. xii. 46, and John ii. 12, there is mention made of the brethren of Jesus; and in another passage they are expressly named "James and Joses, and Simon and Jude." Hence the opinion of the Antidicomarianites, who have impugned the perpetual virginity of the mother of our Lord. They are supposed by some to have been children of Joseph by a former marriage; and, therefore, reputed the brethren of Christ in the same sense in which he was reputed the son of Joseph. This was the opinion of Eusebius, Epiphanius, and many of the ancients. Jerome, Chrysostom, and some others, regard them as having been the sons of Mary, cousin-german, or, according to the idiom of the Hebrew language, sister to the Virgin Mary. This last opinion is more likely to be the just one, if it be true, as Schneckenburger, a German critic, alleges, that after the death of Joseph, which took place at an early period, Mary removed to the house of her sister, the wife of Alpheus; hence it would be usual to designate her sons, who lived from their childhood with Jesus, simply as the brethren of Jesus.

BROWNISTS, a sect that arose among the Puritans towards the close of the sixteenth century; so named from their leader, Robert Brown. He was educated at Cambridge, and was a man of good parts and some learning. He began to inveigh openly, at Norwich in 1580, against the ceremonies of the Church; but being much opposed by the bishops, he, with his congregation, left England, and settled at Middleburgh, in Zealand, where they obtained leave to worship God in their own way, and form a Church according to their own model. They soon, however, began to differ among themselves, so that Brown, growing weary of his office, returned to England in 1589, renounced his principles of separation, and was preferred to the rectory of a church in Northamptonshire. He died in prison in 1630. The revolt of Brown was attended with the dissolution of the Church at Middleburgh; but the seeds of Brownism which he had sown in England were so far from being destroyed, that Sir Walter Raleigh, in a speech in 1592, computes no less than twenty thousand of this sect.

The articles of their faith seem to be nearly the same as those of the Church of England. The occasion of their separation was not, therefore, any fault they found with the faith, but only with the discipline and form of government of the Churches in England. They equally charged corruption on the Episcopal and Presbyterian forms; nor would they join with any other Reformed Church, because they were not assured of the sanctity and regeneration of the members that composed it. They condemned the solemn celebration of marriages in the church, maintaining that matrimony, being a political contract, the confirmation thereof ought to come from the civil magistrate. They would not allow the children of such as were not members of the Church to be baptized. They rejected all forms of prayer, and held that the Lord's Prayer was not to be recited as a prayer, being only given for a rule or model whereon all our prayers are to be formed. Their form of Church government was nearly as follows:—When a Church was to be gathered, such as desired to be members of it made a confession of their faith in the presence of each other, and signed a covenant, by which they obliged themselves to walk together in the order of the gospel. The whole power of admitting and excluding members, with the decision of all controversies, was lodged in the brotherhood. Their church officers were chosen from among themselves, and separated to their several offices by fasting, prayer, and imposition of hands. But they did not allow the priesthood to be any distinct order. As the vote of the brethren made a man a minister, so the same power could discharge him from his office, and reduce him to a mere layman again; and as they maintained the bounds of a Church to be no greater than what could meet together in one place, and join in one communion, so the power of these officers was prescribed within the same limits. The minister of one Church could not administer the Lord's Supper to another, nor baptize the children of any but those of his own society. Any lay brother was allowed the liberty of giving a word of exhortation to the people; and it was usual for some of them, after sermon, to ask questions, and reason upon the doctrines that had been preached. In a word, every Church, on their model, is a body corporate, having full power to do everything in itself, without being accountable to any class, synod, convocation, or other jurisdiction whatever. The reader will judge how near the Independent Churches are allied to this form of government. See INDEPENDENTS.

The laws were executed with great severity on the Brownists; their books were prohibited by Queen Elizabeth; their persons imprisoned, and some hanged. Brown himself declared on his death-bed, that he had been in thirty-two different prisons, in some of which he could not see his hand at noon-day. They were so much persecuted, that they resolved at last to quit the country. Accordingly, many retired and settled at Amsterdam, where they formed a Church, and chose Mr Johnson to be their pastor, and after him Mr Ainsworth, author of the learned 'Commentary on the Pentateuch.' Their Church flourished nearly a hundred years. Among the Brownists, too, were the famous John Robinson, a part of whose congregation from Leyden, in Holland, made the first permanent settlement in North America; and the laborious Canne, the author of the 'Marginal References to the Bible.'

BRUISE,—1. The bruise of a soul, implies doubts, fears, anguish, inward trouble on account of the prevalence of sin, God's wrath, &c. Matt. xii. 20. 2. God bruised Christ, in inflicting on his soul and body the fearful punishment due to our sin. Isa. liii. 5. 3. Satan bruises Christ's heel, in harassing his humble manhood, and afflicting his members on earth. Gen. iii. 15; Rom. xvi. 20. 4. Christ bruises Satan's head, when he crushes his designs, despoils him of his power, triumphs over him on the cross, or in the conquest of believers; and when he enables his people to oppose, conquer, and tread his temptations under foot.—The King of Egypt is called a bruised reed, to mark the weak and broken state of his kingdom, and his utter inability to help such as depended on him. 2 Kings xviii. 21. Weak saints and their feeble graces are bruised, or bruised reeds, which Christ will not break; they are trodden down and afflicted by Satan, by false teachers, by the world, by their own lusts, and are in a pained and disjointed case, unable to oppose their spiritual enemies; but Jesus will protect, heal, comfort, and deliver them. Isa. xlii. 3; Luke iv. 18. To bruise or pound in a mortar, is referred to by Solomon: "Though thou shouldest bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." Prov. xxvii. 22. This punishment is still in use among Eastern nations. Roberts, the traveller, observes: "Cruel as it is, this is a punishment of the State; the poor victim is thrust into the mortar, and beaten with the pestle."

BUDDHISM, or BOODHISM. This religion is spread over the Burman Empire, Siam, Ceylon, Japan, Cochin China, and the greater part of China Proper. It has been contended, that it was also the ancient religion of Hindostan itself, and that the prevailing brahmanical superstitions were the invention of later times. It is indeed probable, that all the idolatrous systems of religion which have ever existed in the world, have had a common origin, and have been modified by the different fancies and corruptious of different nations. The essence of idolatry is everywhere the same. It is everywhere "abominable" in its principles and its rites, and everywhere the cause of indescribable and manifold wretchedness.

It is asserted by Mr Ward, that two of the six schools of philosophy which once flourished among the Hindus, taught the same Atheistical principles as the disciples of Boodh now maintain; and it is indisputable that these two sects were numerous before the appearance of Boodh. This personage is said in Burman books to have been a son of the king of Benares, and to have been born about the year 600 B.C. He is supposed to have adopted the Atheistical system of these sects, and his principles were espoused and maintained by the successive monarchs of his family, who are charged by the Brahmins with the crime of destroying their religion, and substituting Atheism. At length, however, the Brahmins obtained the ascendancy, and arming themselves with the civil power, they so effectually purified Hindostan from the offensive heresy, that scarcely a vestige of the Boodhist superstition is now to be traced in that country. It found a refuge in Ceylon and neighbouring regions; and the most learned Burmans assert, that it was introduced into that empire about four hundred and fifty years after the death of Boodh, or (as he is more commonly called) Gaudama. Sir William Jones fixes the first appearance of Buddhism about a thousand years before Christ; but this antiquity the Puranas utterly disprove.

The Boodhists believe that, like the Hindu Vishnu, Boodh has had ten incarnations. The following summary statement of the principles of Boodhism is extracted from the valuable work of Mr Ward on the 'History, Literature, and Religion of the Hindus:—

"The Boodhists do not believe in a First Cause; they consider matter as eternal; that every portion of animated existence has in itself its own rise, tendency, and destiny; that the condition of creatures on earth is regulated by works of merit and demerit; that works of merit not only raise individuals to happiness, but as they prevail, raise the world itself to prosperity; while on the other hand, when vice is predominant, the world degenerates, till the universe itself is dissolved. They suppose, however, that there is always some superior deity, who has attained to this elevation by religious merit; but they do not regard him as the governor of the world. To the present grand period, comprehending all the time included in a kulpu, they assign five deities, four of whom have already appeared, including Gaudama or Boodh, whose exaltation continues five thousand years, two thousand three hundred and fifty-six of which had expired A.D. 1814. After the expiration of the five thousand years, another saint will obtain the ascendancy, and be deified. Six hundred millions of saints are said to be canonized with each deity, though it is admitted that Boodh took only twenty-four thousand devotees to heaven with him.

"The lowest state of existence is in hell; the next is that in the forms of brutes; both these are states of punishment. The next ascent is to that of man, which is probationary. The next includes many degrees of honour and happiness, up to demi-gods, &c., which are states of reward for works of merit. The ascent to superior deity is from the state of man. The Boodhists are taught that there are four superior heavens which are not destroyed at the end of a kulpu; that below these, there are twelve other heavens, followed by six inferior heavens; after which follows the earth, then the world of snakes, and then thirty-two chief hells; to which are to be added, one hundred and twenty hells of milder torments. The highest state of glory is absorbtion. The person who is unchangeable in his resolution, who has obtained a knowledge of things past, present, and to come, through one kulpu, who can make himself invisible, go where he pleases, and who has attained to complete abstraction, will enjoy absorption. The Hindu idea of absorption is, that the soul is received into the Divine essence; but as the Boodhists reject the doctrine of a separate Supreme Spirit, it is difficult to say what are their ideas of absorption. Dr Buchanan says, in his 'Asiatic Researches,' that Nigban 'implies (that is, among the Burmans) exemption from all the miseries incident to humanity, but by no means annihilation.' Those who perform works of merit are admitted to the heavens of the different gods, or are made kings or great men on earth; and those who are wicked are born in the forms of different animals, or consigned to different hells. The happiness of these heavens is wholly sensual.

"The Boodhists believe, that at the end of a kulpu the universe is destroyed. To convey some idea of the extent of this period, the illiterate Cingalese use this comparison: If a man were to ascend a mountain nine miles high, and to renew these journeys once in every hundred years, till the mountain were worn down by his feet to an atom, the time required to do this would be nothing to the fourth part of a kulpu. Boodh, before his exaltation, taught his followers, that after his ascent, the remains of his body, his doctrine, or an assembly of his disciples, were to be held in equal reverence with himself. When a Cingalese, therefore, approaches an image of Boodh, he says, 'I take refuge in Boodh; I take refuge in his doctrine; I take refuge in his followers.'

"There are five commands delivered to the common Boodhists,—the first forbids the destruction of animal life; the second forbids theft; the third, adultery; the fourth, falsehood; the fifth, the use of spirituous liquors. There are other commands for the superior classes, or devotees, which forbid dancing, songs, music, festivals, perfumes, elegant dresses, elevated seats, and other things. Among works of the highest merit, one is the feeding of a hungry, infirm tiger with a person's own flesh.

"The temples erected in honour of Boodh, in the Burman empire, are of various sizes and forms, as quadrangular, pentagonal, hexagonal, heptagonal, or octagonal. Those of a round spiral form can be erected only by the king, or by persons high in office. An elevated spot is preferred for the erection of these edifices; but where such an elevation cannot be found, the building is erected upon the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth terraces.

"When the author asked a Boodhist, Why, since the object of their worship was neither creator nor preserver, they honoured him as God? he was answered, That it was an act of homage to exalted merit.

*The priests worship at the temples daily, or ought to do so. The worship consists in presenting flowers, incense, rice, betel-nuts, and repeating certain prayers. The priest cleanses the temple, preserves the lights, and receives the offerings. A worshipper may present his own offerings, if he is acquainted with the formulas. The five commands are repeated by a priest twice a-day to the people, who stand up and repeat them after him.

"Boodh, as seen in many temples, appears seated upon a throne placed on elephants, or encircled by a hydra, or in the habit of a king, accompanied by his attendants. In most of the modern images, however, he is represented in a sitting posture, with his legs folded, his right hand resting upon his right thigh, and his left upon his lap; a yellow cloth is cast over his left shoulder, which envelops his right arm. His hair is generally in a curling state, like that of an African; his ears are long, as though distended by heavy earrings. The image is generally placed in the centre of the temple, under a small arch prepared for the purpose, or under a small porch of wood, neatly gilded. Images of celestial attendants, male and female, are frequently placed in front of the image.

"It appears evident from their writings, that the ancient religion of the Burmans consisted principally in religious austerities. When a person becomes initiated into the priesthood, he immediately renounces the secular state, lives on alms, and abstains from food after the sun has passed the meridian. The ancient writings of the Burmans mention an order of female priests; but it is likely that these were only female mendicants.

"Priests are forbidden to marry; they are to live by mendicity; are to possess only three garments, a begging dish, a girdle, a razor, a needle, and a cloth to strain the water which they drink, that they may not devour insects. The priests reside in houses which are built and offered to them as works of merit. There are numerous colleges, which are built in the style of a palace, by persons of wealth, and in which boys are taught. The priests are the school-masters, and teach gratuitously as a work of merit, the children being maintained at home by their parents. If a priest finds a pupil to be of quick parts, he persuades the parents to make him a priest; but if a boy wishes to embrace a secular life after he has been some time in the college, he is at liberty to do so.

"The Burman feasts are held at the full and change of the moon. At these times, all public business is suspended; the people pay their homage to Gaudama at the temples, presenting to the image rice, fruits, flowers, candles, &c. Aged people often fast during the whole day. Some visit the colleges, and hear the priests read portions of the Boodhist writings. According to the religion of Boodh, there are no distinctions of caste. The Burmans burn their dead with many ceremonies, especially the bodies of the priests."

The Boodhist religion, then, as plainly appears from Mr Ward's account of it, is a system of universal scepticism. It rejects the Vedas, and the religion founded upon them. It inculcates a disbelief of all religion, and a disregard of all virtue. Under the name of Buddhism, there have been included the most various and inconsistent tenets and superstitions which it is possible to imagine; and although its negative character is everywhere the same, its positive character differs in different countries. Hence, the Buddhism of China differs essentially from the Buddhism of the Burman empire. Nay, in China, the very name of Buddha is changed into that of Fo. (See CONFUCIUS.) The Boodhists conceive the series of phenomena which form both the physical and the moral world as an infinite, necessary, and fatal chain of causes and effects, independent of all governing intelligence. For them, the chief end, the supreme bliss of the soul, consists in a state of complete apathy, where all thought is extinguished.

BUDSO, a form of idolatrous worship, introduced into Japan from China and Siam. Its author is supposed to have been Buddha, whom the Indian Brahmins conceive to be their god Vishnu, who, they say, made his ninth appearance in the world under the form of a man so named.

BUILDING. See ARCHITECTURE.

BUL, or the month of rain, is the eighth month of the ecclesiastical year, and the second of the civil year, corresponding to our November. This month, which bears a Chaldean name, is only once mentioned in Scripture. 1 Kings vi. 38. The Jews fasted on the sixth day of this month, in commemoration of the melancholy incident of their history recorded in 2 Kings xxv. 9.

BULL, the male of the various species of the ox. There are several Hebrew words translated "bull" in Scripture. It was one of the animals accounted clean, and was generally used in sacrifices. The Egyptians held this animal in great veneration, and paid divine honours to it; and the Israelites, under the influence of their evil example, fell into idolatry of the same kind.

The following remarks of Dr Adam Clarke on Exod. xxii. 1, may be useful. "If a man shall steal an ox or a sheep, and kill it or sell it; he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep." He observes, that "in our translation of this verse, by rendering different words by the same term in English, we have greatly obscured the sense. I shall produce the verse, with the original words which I think improperly translated, because one English term is used for two Hebrew words, which, in this place, certainly do not mean the same thing. If a man shall steal an ox [שׁוֹר SHOR] or a sheep [שֶׂה SEH], and kill it, or sell it; he shall restore five oxen, [בָּקָר BAKAR] for an ox, [שׁוֹר SHOR] and four sheep, [צֹאן TSON] for a sheep [שֶׂה SEH.] I think it must appear evident that the sacred writer did not intend that these words should be understood as above. A SHOR certainly is different from a BAKAR, and a SEH from a TSON. Where the difference in every case lies wherever these words occur, it is difficult to say. The SHOR and the BAKAR are doubtless creatures of the beecv kind, and are used in different parts of the sacred writings, to signify the bull, the ox, the heifer, the steer, and the calf. The SEH and the TSON are used to signify the ram, the wether, the ewe, the lamb, the he-goat, the she-goat, and the kid; and the latter word TSON seems frequently to signify the flock composed of either of these lesser cattle, or both sorts conjoined. As SHOR is used, Job xxi. 10, for a bull, probably it may mean so here. If a man steal a bull, he shall give five oxen for him; which we may presume was no more than his real value, as very few bulls could be kept in a country destitute of horses, where oxen were so necessary to till the ground. For though some have imagined that there were no castrated cattle among the Jews, yet this cannot be admitted on the above reason; for as they had no horses, and bulls would have been unmanageable and dangerous, they must have had oxen for the purposes of agriculture. TSON is used for a flock either of sheep or goats; and SEH for an individual of either species. For every SEH, four, taken indifferently from the TSON or flock, must be given; that is, a sheep stolen might be recompensed with four out of the flock, whether of sheep or goats. So that a goat might be compensated with four sheep; or a sheep with four goats."

BULL, PAPAL, a brief or mandate of the Pope, so called from the seal (bullæ) of lead or sometimes of gold attached to it. The lead is stamped on one side with the heads of Peter and Paul and on the other with the name of the Pope and the year of his pontificate. If the bull has been issued in reference to a matter of justice, the lead is hung by a hempen cord; if in reference to a matter of grace, by a silken thread. There is a particular bull called the Bull in Cœna Domini, which is publicly read on Maundy Thursday by a cardinal deacon in the Pope's presence, accompanied with the other cardinals and the bishops. This bull contains an excommunication of all that are called by that apostate Church heretics, stubborn and disobedient to the holy see; and after the reading of this bull, the Pope throws a burning torch into the public place, to denote the thunder of his anathema.

BULRUSH (Exod. ii. 3; Job viii. 11; Isa. xviii. 2, xxxv. 7), a plant growing on the banks of the Nile, and in marshy grounds. It was of the bulrush that the ark was made for the infant Moses, when he was hid among the rushes of the Nile. It is not said that the mother of Moses made an ark, but that she "took for him an ark of bulrushes," probably some ready-made vessel constructed out of that plant. The stalk rises to the height of six or seven cubits, besides two under water. The stalk is triangular, and terminates in a crown of small filaments resembling hair, which the ancients used to compare to a thyrsus. This reed, the Cyperus papyrus of Linnæus, commonly called "the Egyptian reed," was of the greatest use to the inhabitants of the country where it grew; the pith contained in the stock served them for food, and the woody part for building vessels, figures of which are to be seen on the engraven stones and other monuments of Egyptian antiquity. For this purpose they made it up, like rushes, into bundles; and by tying these bundles together, gave their vessels the necessary shape and solidity. "The vessels of bulrushes," or papyrus, "that are mentioned in sacred and profane history," says Dr Shaw, "were no other than large fabrics of the same kind with that of Moses (Exod. ii. 3); which, from the late introduction of plank and stronger materials, are now laid aside." Thus Pliny takes notice of the "ships made of papyrus, and the equipments of the Nile;" and he observes, "of the papyrus itself they construct sailing vessels." Herodotus and Diodorus have recorded the same fact; and among the poets, Lucan says that "the Memphian" or Egyptian "boat is made of the thirsty papyrus;" where the epithets "drinking," "soaking," "thirsty," are particularly remarkable, as corresponding with great exactness to the nature of the plant, and to its Hebrew name, which signifies to soak or drink up. These vegetables require much water for their growth; when, therefore, the river on whose banks they grew was reduced, they perished sooner than other plants. This explains Job viii. 11, 12, where the circumstance is referred to as an image of transient prosperity: "Can the rush grow without mire? Can the flag grow without water? Whilst it is yet in his greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb." By the account of Isaiah (xviii. 2), we learn that the people of the land, "shadowing with wings which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia," formed boats, and even ships, of the same material. Some of these must have been very large vessels; for it is expressly said that they sent ambassadors by the sea, even in "vessels of bulrushes." From the Egyptian papyrus our English word paper is derived. The bulrush of Scripture, the Cyperus papyrus, is of the class Triandria, and order Monogynia. It is found in those places in Egypt into which the Nile overflows during its periodical inundations, and especially where the river stagnates. It is found in similar situations in the lakes in Ethiopia, where boats are still made of it; also on the River Jordan, in the vicinity of the Lake of Tiberias; and at the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates. It thrives best among mud and slime. Hence the appropriate description of Job (viii. 11): "Can the rush grow up without mire?"

BUNDLE, anything tied up in a cloth, and reserved for future disposal. Thus, in 1 Sam. xxv. 29, Abigail says to David, "Yet a man is risen to pursue thee, and to seek thy soul: but the soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God; and the souls of thine enemies, them shall he sling out, as out of the middle of a sling."

BUNYAN, JOHN. Few men have acquired a more lasting and imperishable fame than John Bunyan. From a state of poverty and wretchedness,—wretchedness aggravated by immorality,—he rose to the highest honour in the Church of God, so that it is scarcely possible to point to an individual who has been more eminently and extensively useful by his writings, than the subject of the present sketch. John Bunyan was born at Elstow, within a mile of Bedford, in the year 1628. He is well known to have been descended of humble parentage, and he himself acknowledges that his "father's house was of that rank that is meanest and most despised of all the families in the land." His education, in such circumstances, could not fail to be scanty, and the little knowledge he did acquire was speedily lost, amid the follies and crimes of an ill-spent youth. His early character, in fact, appears to have been of the lowest and most abandoned description. "From a child," we learn by his own confession, "he had but few equals, both for cursing, swearing, lying, and blaspheming." Even then, however, the conscience of Bunyan was not altogether seared; a gloom of despondency occasionally overshadowed his mind, and he was visited with fearful forebodings of coming wrath. Often, in these dark moments, did he earnestly wish that there were no heaven, no hell. He, nevertheless, continued to pursue a course of the most reckless and abandoned profligacy.

At length Bunyan enlisted as a soldier in the Parliament army; and in the discharge of his military duties he experienced some wonderful instances of the Divine goodness, in the preservation of his life. Yet, neither allured by the kindness, nor awed by the judgments of Heaven, he persevered in his rebellion against the Most High. In the midst of this career of ungodliness, it pleased the Almighty to guide him to the selection of a wife, who, sprung of godly parents, was herself disposed to pay at least an outward respect to religion. Her father had bequeathed to her, at his death, two excellent tracts,—'The Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven,' and 'The Practice of Piety.' These she highly prized; and "in these two books," says Bunyan, "I would sometimes read with her, wherein I also found some things that were somewhat pleasing to me, but all this while I met with no conviction." These tracts, combined with the pious influence of his wife, were the means, under Providence, of awakening his mind to some desire after an outward reformation of conduct. He attended church now with the utmost regularity, and yielded the most scrupulous obedience to all the appointed observances of the Church of England; and yet his conduct was as immoral as before, for the simple and obvious reason that his heart was unchanged. It is possible to wait upon ordinances with undeviating scrupulosity, and to wear, in the eyes of the world, an aspect of seeming Christianity, while, in deed and in truth, we have but "a name to live," and "are spiritually dead." Such was Bunyan for a considerable period of his life. But, at length, in the wise providence of God, he began to be partially awakened to the necessity of leading a life of holiness. The circumstance which, on this occasion, led to a considerable improvement in his character and conduct, was the conversation of a poor man, who spoke strongly of the happiness connected with religion. Bunyan now took great pleasure in reading the Bible, chiefly, however, the historical parts; "for as for Paul's Epistles," to quote his own words, "and such like Scriptures, I could not away with them, being as yet ignorant, either of the corruptions of my nature, or of the want and worth of Jesus Christ to save us." The change which had taken place in the whole deportment of this once abandoned sinner was now quite apparent. His acquaintances thought him decidedly religious, and he himself was quite satisfied with their approbation. The change, however, was merely superficial. He was "going about to establish his own righteousness," in utter contempt of the righteousness of the Redeemer. Such a course, if persisted in, must have terminated in his utter ruin; but, in the all-wise arrangements of God, this man was destined to be a burning and a shining light in the Church of Christ. He was not suffered, therefore, longer to walk after the sight of his own eyes. The Almighty interposed and plucked him as "a brand from the burning."

About this time Mr Bunyan was introduced to Mr Gifford, who was an excellent and efficient Baptist minister in Bedford; and from his private intercourse, as well as public ministrations, he seems to have derived much benefit. His pious resolutions became more confirmed, his conscience more tender, and though his soul was sometimes overclouded, the peace of God generally flowed into his heart, with all its refreshing and invigorating influences. Amid all the strange and fitful fluctuations of Christian experience to which he was exposed, he was evidently, in a peculiar sense, a child of Providence. The Almighty was ever and anon interposing in his behalf, to deliver him from those seasons of doubt and even despondency to which he was occasionally subject. At such seasons of sore temptation he derived great advantage from Luther's work upon the Epistle to the Galatians,—a book which he accordingly preferred before all the books that he had ever seen, excepting the Bible, "as most fit for a wounded conscience." Still it was at the fountain of truth itself, the inspired Word of God, that Bunyan sought and found those refreshing streams which were afterwards "in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life." At length, when nearly twenty-five years old, he joined the Church under the pastoral care of Mr Gifford. He felt that he had now openly professed himself on the Lord's side, that he had vowed to be the Lord's, and by that vow he must abide. Still he often experienced strong temptations from the wicked one, that roaring lion who goeth about seeking whom he may devour.

It has been often remarked in the course of the Lord's dealings with his people, that those are subjected to peculiar trials who are intended for the fulfilment of peculiar duties. And this observation was remarkably exemplified in the case of John Bunyan. As a private Christian, the Lord tried him long severely, that he might be fitted for much usefulness in the Church of Christ. No sooner did he become settled and established in the belief of the truth, than he burned with an ardent anxiety to make it known to others. In the year 1656, accordingly, he began publicly to preach the everlasting gospel, at the request of the congregation and the pastor of the church to which he belonged. The appearance in the pulpit of one who had formerly been so notorious for his wickedness, excited considerable sensation in Bedford and its neighbourhood. The people flocked in crowds to hear him. At first, and for two years after he had been called to the ministry, he directed his chief attention to the awakening of sinners; but after that period, he himself began to feel much comfort and peace in Christ, and he now, therefore, delighted in exhibiting Christ in all his offices as a complete and an everlasting Saviour.

During the protectorate of Oliver Cromwell, Mr Bunyan was permitted, without molestation, to preach the gospel of Christ; but immediately after the restoration of Charles II., he was apprehended, by a warrant from a justice, and committed to prison for having absented himself from the parish church, and held what were considered unlawful meetings and conventicles. Nonconformity was at that period a very heinous crime, and he was, accordingly, tried at the Quarter Sessions at Bedford, in 1660. No legal proof was adduced, no witnesses were brought forward, but a part of his examination was recorded as a confession, and he was sentenced to perpetual banishment; and though the sentence was never enforced, he was imprisoned in Bedford jail for twelve years and a-half. Sometimes during that long period Bunyan's heart sunk within him, more especially when he thought of his destitute wife and four children. While in prison, Bunyan contributed towards the support of his family by making long pointed laces. The respectability of his character, and the propriety of his conduct, led the jailer to take a particular interest in him, and he even permitted him to go out occasionally and visit his friends.

It was during his long imprisonment that many of John Bunyan's works were composed, and among them, the first part of one of the most popular books in the English language,—‘The Pilgrim's Progress.’ For genius and strong imagination, that admirable piece is still unrivalled, and it may well be considered as entitling its author to be regarded as a boast of his country. Before his incarceration in the jail at Bedford, his time was so much occupied in travelling the country as a tinker, for the support of his family, that he never thought of engaging in writing; but when secluded from the world, and driven, as it were, upon his own resources, he employed himself in the preparation of those very works which were destined, in the course of Providence, to prove the support and the consolation of many a Christian in every future age. What a remarkable exemplification is this of the truth of God's own statement, that “he maketh the wrath of man to praise him, and the remainder of his wrath he will restrain.”

At last, by what means is not ascertained, but probably by the kind intervention of Dr Barlow, bishop of Lincoln, Mr Bunyan was set at liberty, and entered upon the office of pastor over the congregation with which he had been formerly connected. Here he officiated for some years with much acceptance, and, assisted by the kind subscriptions of some friends, he built a new meeting-house in the same town, where he continued to preach to large audiences till his death. He was accustomed to pay an annual visit to London, where he was remarkably popular as a preacher, and was sometimes honoured with the attendance and decided approbation of the celebrated Dr Owen. He travelled, besides, through different parts of the country, proclaiming the gospel in all its freeness, and urging upon men everywhere to accept of its promised blessings.

He closed his earthly career on the 31st of August 1688, at the age of sixty, and was buried in Bunhill-fields, where there is a tomb erected to his memory.

BURDEN. The Hebrew word which is thus translated, occurs frequently in the Old Testament prophecies, and seems to be applied, not as Calmet supposes, uniformly to disastrous prophecies, but indifferently to prophecies of good and of evil. Hence it seems to be equivalent in meaning to the word message. There is no doubt, however, that in by far the greatest number of instances the word is used to usher in severe denunciations of Divine judgment. Thus the Burden of Babylon, of Nineveh, of Tyre, and other places. But in Zechariah ix. 1, it is prefixed to a favourable prophecy,—“When the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel, shall be toward the Lord.”

BURGLE, a mode of preparing corn which seems to have been known to the ancient Hebrews. The wheat is boiled, then bruised in a mill so as to separate it from the husk, and when dried it is boiled like rice into a pillaw made into balls, with meat and spices. Wheat and barley were prepared in the same way by the ancient Romans.

BURIAL. Various modes of interment have prevailed in the world, but undoubtedly the most ancient was that of burying in the ground. At a very early period we find Abraham purchasing a family burial-place from the children of Heth. Professor Paxton thus describes the preparations for burial among the Jews:—“The parting kiss being given, the company rent their clothes, which was a custom of great antiquity, and the highest expression of grief in the primitive ages. This ceremony was never omitted by the Hebrews when any mournful event happened, and was performed in the following manner:—They took a knife, and holding the blade downwards, gave the upper garment a cut in the right side, and rent it an hand's-breadth. For very near relations, all the garments are rent on the right side. After closing the eyes, the next care was to bind up the face, which it was no more lawful to behold. The next care of surviving friends was to wash the body; probably that the ointments and perfumes with which it was to be wrapped up might enter more easily into the pores, when opened by warm water. This ablution, which was always esteemed an act of great charity and devotion, was performed by women. Thus the body of Dorcas was washed, and laid in an upper room, till the arrival of the Apostle Peter, in the hope that his prayers might restore her to life. After the body was washed, it was shrouded, and swathed with a linen cloth, although, in most places, they only put on a pair of drawers and a white tunic; and the head was bound about with a napkin. Such were the napkin and grave-clothes in which the Saviour was buried.” A Jewish burial occurs in the Travels of Messrs Bonar and M'Cheyne, and it shows in how many points the descendants of Abraham, even at the present day, retain the habits and customs of their ancestors:—"Near sunset, we had the opportunity of witnessing the funeral of an old Jewess. The dead body was carried on a bier, covered with a black pall; the men in their ordinary clothes followed, and a throng of women and children brought up the rear. One Jew walked immediately behind the bier, rattling a tin collection-box, and crying out in Hebrew, every few paces, 'Alms deliver from death;' and the same words were embroidered upon the pall. In obedience to this summons, many Jews put in pieces of money as they went along, and the money thus collected goes to the Hebra, or burying society. At the gate of the burying-ground, one woman uttered a loud and piercing cry, which she continued as they proceeded. Arriving at a small portico or covered walk in the grave-yard, they set down the bier, and uncovered the face of the dead. All the relations gathered round, and bending over the corpse, till their lips almost touched the lips of the deceased, entreated her to forgive them if they had injured her in any way. After this, they proceeded to the grave, and the body alone was lowered down into it, with the face uncovered. Several of the women now joined in a loud and bitter wail; but their tears and lamentations were only feigned, for at one time they appeared very lugubrious, then all of a sudden they stopped and began to scold, or appeared utterly careless. They were specimens of 'the mourning women' mentioned in the Scriptures. Jer. ix. 17; Matt. xi. 17. A white linen pillow was next produced, to be laid under the head of the deceased; on which there was a scramble among the women which would be the foremost in filling it with earth. The scene of asking forgiveness from the dead woman was renewed with great vehemence, and many besought her when she came before God to pray for them and for their children. The Hazan, or chanter, being hired by the relatives for the purpose, stood by the open grave, and repeated many prayers for the dead. This done, the body was covered in, and the company retired to the portico, where the eldest son, standing in the midst, read, from off a board hung on the wall, another prayer for his dead mother; in which he was assisted by the chanter, for we were assured that he scarcely understood a word of it. Before leaving the burying-ground, each individual washed his hands in water that stood in earthen jars near the gate for this purpose; for the Jews believe that evil spirits hover about the grave-yard, and would have access to them, if they were at all defiled by the dead body."

The simple rites of burial among the early Christians are thus described in Dr Jamieson's 'Manners and Trials of the Primitive Christians':—"In ordinary circumstances, the funeral ceremonial was conducted in a style corresponding to the character and views of the Christians. Having closed the eyes, and washed the body of the deceased, they sprinkled it with a profusion of costly spices and odoriferous ointments,—a part of the preparation for burial held in so great esteem, that care was taken that none of the poorest of the brethren wanted it. This custom was the more remarkable in them, that their general habits were marked by austerity, and by abstinence from everything that tended to foster a love for the gratification of the senses; and it often drew from their heathen neighbours the sarcastic remark, that the Christians, notwithstanding they affected to abhor all fragrant perfumes, lavished these expensive luxuries at death more extravagantly than others did in life, and that, too, on persons whose situation rendered them insensible to the enjoyment. But they mistook entirely the object of the Christians in their copious use of strong-scented odours on these occasions; which was not done in the vain hope of giving pleasure to the dead, or heaping attentions on a body soon to become a prey to corruption, but with the view of showing that they looked upon death as a season of joy, not of gloom and despondency,—of testifying their belief that their friend had entered into a new and happier state,—and that he had left them to be present at a joyful festival, whither they hoped soon to go and join his company. These were the cheerful ideas which the sumptuous anointing of the body, previous to burial, was designed to impress on the senses. Nor was it practised altogether without other views, to the comfort and uses of the living; for in those frequent troubles that arose in primitive times, and drove the Christians to take refuge in the cemeteries, the strong spices of Sabæa enabled them to remain, and to enjoy the privilege of worship, without any annoyance from the disagreeable effluvia which might otherwise have driven them from these abodes of the dead.

"While, in common with the Jews, the primitive Christians wrapped the body in the robes of the grave, they first introduced the custom of depositing it in a coffin, made of plainer or costlier materials, as suited the rank or resources of the deceased. During the interval that elapsed between the completion of these preparations and the funeral, one of the family by turns, and occasionally the whole household, accompanied by some of their relatives and Christian neighbours, set themselves to watch the corpse,—not, however, in the attitude of mourners who brooded in sad and unbroken silence over their bereavement,—but solacing themselves with psalmody and prayer, and free conversation on such subjects as were connected with the hope of believers and the joys of the resurrection. The time appointed for the funeral having arrived, the body was carried to the grave on the shoulders of the nearest relatives, or of persons of dignity, when the deceased had been of eminent piety, or borne office in the Church, or sometimes of any Christian friends who volunteered their services, to testify their respect for the memory of departed worth. The solemnity was always performed during the day; and it is the more necessary to take notice of this, because it was an innovation on the long established practice of the heathen, and had to combat, where it was not authoritatively forbidden, the strongest prejudices which their superstition engendered in the minds of the populace. According to their ideas, to come into contact with a dead body was a presage of misfortune, and the mere sight of a funeral disqualified them for the worship of the gods; on which account, as well as from its being supposed a fitter season for grief, they invariably solemnized their funeral obsequies in the night. But the Christians, who had no such superstitious fear of receiving contamination from the dead, and who were supported by strong consolation, changed the time of their burials to the day; and the whole style of the ceremonial observed among them indicated a state of mind that bore a striking contrast to the gloom and extravagant lamentations of the heathen. The nearest relations only wore dresses slightly betokening grief, while the rest of the attendants were attired in habiliments whose colour was expressive of cheerfulness and joy. The company consisted of an assemblage of men and women, boys and girls, belonging to the Christian society; and as they moved along in procession, their united voices sung in slow and solemn cadence some pathetic psalm; while the pastor, who on such occasions was always a welcome guest, took his place in the family group, and, watching if any of the relatives betrayed symptoms of weakness, and of nature sinking under the load of long-suppressed grief, endeavoured to fortify him with views of the life and immortality brought to light by the gospel, and to remind him, that though a tie had been broken on earth, a new and a happier one had been formed in heaven. This was a noble refinement on the practice of the heathen, whose funeral cavalcades were preceded by the wild and artificial lamentations of the 'Præficæ,'—women, whose mercenary office was to sing the praises of the dead, and employ every art for exciting the tears of surviving friends. In the simple rites of the Christians, every part was moulded on the faith and hope of the gospel, and though, from early associations, they continued the vocal and instrumental music, as an indispensable accompaniment of such solemnities, the chanting of hymns that delighted the ear, while they animated the mind 'with joy unspeakable and full of glory,' was a happy improvement on the forced and hypocritical strains of the ancient mourners. So much admired, indeed, was the change by the Christians, and so prominent a part did the singing of psalms become in their burial service, that to be borne to the grave in silence was looked upon as a great calamity, and the sacred dirge was refused to none but those who had laid violent hands on themselves, who had suffered the death of malefactors, or who had lived in the obstinate neglect of baptism."

BURNING. This was a mode of capital punishment which at an early period seems to have been practised by the Jews. Thus we find Judah, in Gen. xxxviii. 24, condemning his daughter-in-law Tamar to be burned, though the punishment was not inflicted. The Rabbins allege, that burning consisted in pouring melted lead down the throat; and Lewis, in his 'Origines Hebraicæ,' gives the following shocking account of the process:—"They set the malefactor in dung up to the knees, and then tied a towel about his neck, which was drawn by the two witnesses till they made his mouth gape, into which they poured melted lead down his throat, which consumed his bowels." That such a cruel mode of punishment should ever have been resorted to is scarcely to be credited. At all events, the practice of burning alive, by throwing the criminal into a furnace of fire, is well known to have been common among the Assyrians; and we have a remarkable instance of it in the account given in the Book of Daniel of the three children who were cast, by the command of Nebuchadnezzar, into the burning fiery furnace. This cruel punishment appears to have been not uncommon in the East even so late as the seventeenth century. The Romans inflicted the punishment of burning upon the early Christians in various different forms. Sometimes they were fixed to a stake over a slow fire, until the flesh was burned from the bones; at other times, they were clothed in coats fitted close to the person, besmeared with pitch, sulphur, wax, or some other inflammable materials, and being fastened to a stake, with a cord tied round their chin to keep their head in an erect posture, fire was applied, and the martyrs expired amid the most excruciating pains. Another form of this horrid punishment was, fixing the Christians, in a sitting posture, on an iron chair just taken red hot from a furnace, and so contrived that its arms encircled the body of the martyr. On some occasions, the chair was gradually heated by a slow fire kept burning beneath it.

BURNT-OFFERINGS. This is one of the sacrifices or offerings appointed in the law of Moses. The reason of the name is thus given in Lev. vi. 9: "It is the burnt-offering, because of the burning upon the altar all night unto the morning, and the fire of the altar shall be burning in it." The Hebrew word translated burnt-offerings, denotes sacrifices which ascend in flame or smoke. These offerings were obviously designed to prefigure the sacrifice of Christ, as that which could alone expiate the sins of a ruined world. The animals used in sacrifice were of five kinds,—bullocks, goats, sheep, turtle-doves, and young pigeons. The manner of presenting the burnt-offering is distinctly laid down in Sacred Scripture. While the tabernacle stood, the offerer brought his victim to the door of the tabernacle; and after the building of the temple, he brought it into the court of Israel. Even women, who were forbidden to enter the court of Israel at all other times, were obliged to enter it when they presented a burnt-offering. Having brought his sacrifice, the offerer laid his hands upon its head, confessing his sins over the head of the victim, as an emblem of the sinner's acknowledgment that Christ "bore our sins and carried our sorrows." The offering was then transferred to the priests, who slew the animal, by cutting its throat; and the blood being received in a vessel prepared for the purpose, was sprinkled upon the altar, as a type of Christ pouring out his blood as an atonement for sin. The blood which remained was poured out at the foot of the altar, whence it was carried off by a drain to the brook Kidron. After this process had been completed, the animal was flayed, deprived of the fat, and laid wholly naked and open; the various parts to be burned were then salted, and thrown into the fire to be utterly consumed. To all this there is an obvious allusion in Heb. iv. 12, 13: "For the word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart. Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight: but all things are naked and opened to the eyes of him with whom we have to do." The mode of flaying the turtle-doves and the young pigeons was somewhat different. The person who brought these presented them to the priest, who offered up one of them for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering.

BUSH, BURNING. The Lord appeared to Moses on Mount Horeb, in a bush burning but not consumed. The event is thus recorded in the Sacred Writings, "And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush; and he looked, and behold, the bush burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed." Exod. iii. 2. To this miraculous event Moses afterwards referred in his dying prayer for the descendants of Joseph, "And for the precious things of the earth, and fulness thereof, and for the good will of him that dwelt in the bush: let the blessing come upon the head of Joseph, and upon the top of the head of him that was separated from his brethren." Deut. xxxiii. 16. It is doubtful what is the precise kind of bush to which the sacred writer refers. According to Dioseorides, it is the white thorn. Celsius calls it the rubus fruticosus. The number of these bushes in these regions seems to have given the name to the mountain, Sinai. The miracle was probably intended, in the first instance, to describe the state of Israel, as exposed to the burning fire of persecution on the part of the Egyptians, and yet miraculously preserved by the mighty power of their covenant God, who held them up in the midst of their trials. They were as a bush burning, but not consumed. Considerable discussion has taken place as to the design of the miracle. It has sometimes been supposed that the miraculous appearance on Horeb was designed to testify the incarnation of the Son of God, in which the Word who was with God, and was God, became flesh, and dwelt among us. The burning bush has generally been considered as beautifully emblematic of the Church of Christ, which although incessantly exposed to the persecution of the world, has, though burning, never yet been consumed. It has survived all the opposition of men and devils, and still lives and flourishes in the world, upheld by its glorious Head, and manifesting that He who dwelt of old in the bush says even now, of his own true living church, "This is my rest for ever: here will I dwell; for I have desired it. I will abundantly bless her provision: I will satisfy her poor with bread." But others consider that the particular thing intended to be taught the Hebrews by this phenomenon, namely, the bush of thorns or briars burning yet not consumed, was to intimate to them that God was present with them in their great afflictions and tribulations, and, by his providence, so ordering matters that their afflictions did not consume them; agreeably to the words of the prophet: "In all their affliction he was afflicted, and the angel of his presence saved them." Isa. lxiii. 9. "This fire, also," says Bishop Patrick, "might be intended to show that God would there meet with the Israelites and give them his law in fire and lighting, and yet not consume them."

BUSHEL. A Jewish measure (Matt. v. 15), containing about a pint less than a peck of English measure.

BUTLER, JOSEPH. This eminent individual was born at Wantage, in Berkshire, on the 18th of May, in the year 1692. His father was a respectable linen and woollen draper in that town. Joseph, who was the youngest of eight children, was early sent to the grammar school, under the tuition of the Rev. Philip Barton, a clergyman of the Church of England. Having acquired the elements of classical literature, his father, who was a Presbyterian, resolved to educate him for the ministry in connection with that communion, to which he was most conscientiously attached. With this view Joseph was sent to an academy at Gloucester, where he pursued his theological studies with the utmost diligence and success, under the care of Mr Jones. It was while attending this academy that he displayed those remarkable powers for philosophical research which afterwards rendered him so conspicuous. The work of Dr Samuel Clarke had recently appeared, entitled, 'A Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God;' and after perusing this very able argument, which failed to satisfy his mind, young Butler opened a correspondence with Dr Clarke on the subject, proposing his difficulties, and respectfully requesting an explanation. The correspondence extended to five letters on each side; and the utmost kindness and candour were displayed throughout the whole of this epistolary discussion, both by the powerful author of the 'Demonstration,' and his no less powerful, though still youthful, antagonist. In reference to these letters, Sir James Macintosh with truth remarks: "He suggested objections to the celebrated 'Demonstration,' which were really insuperable, and which are marked by an acuteness which neither himself nor any other ever surpassed." The correspondence which was thus carried on between young Butler and Dr Clarke was anonymous on the part of the former, but as soon as the great metaphysician discovered the name of his able correspondent, he cordially offered him his friendship, and continued ever after to hold him in the highest respect.

While resident at Tewkesbury, the attention of Butler was called to the principles of nonconformity in which he had been educated; and the result of his investigation led him to conform to the Established Church. His father was by no means satisfied with the conclusion to which his son had come, and to effect, if possible, a change in the young man's resolution, he summoned to his assistance several Presbyterian ministers, whom he employed to confer with him. All argument, however, was unavailing; the purpose of the youth remained unshaken, and his father, accordingly, entered him as a commoner of Oriel College, Oxford, on the 17th of March 1714. That he prosecuted his studies at the university with the utmost assiduity and success, the eminence of his after life fully proved; he was a scholar of the highest order, and his talents and attainments were alike conspicuous.

At what period Butler was ordained is unknown, but it does not appear that he entered upon any ministerial charge till the year 1718, when, upon the joint recommendation of his friends Edward Talbot and Dr Samuel Clarke, he was appointed preacher at the Rolls Court. He was then in the twenty-sixth year of his age; and as the emoluments of the office were not sufficient to discharge the expenses incident to a residence in the metropolis, he was under the necessity of receiving occasional pecuniary assistance from his family at Wantage. After having occupied this honourable office for four years, he was prescuted, in 1722, with the living of Haughton, near Darlington, in Yorkshire; and in a short time he was promoted to the richer benefice of Stanhope, in the same diocese. Up to the year 1726, when he resigned the preachiership of the Rolls, he was accustomed to divide the year between his duties in the metropolis and those in the country. His labours in the city, however, he discontinued; and on that occasion he published a selection from the discourses preached at the Rolls Chapel. These sermons have obtained for Butler a very high place among philosophical inquirers into the nature and foundations of morals; the volume, indeed, is stated by Dr Chalmers, in his 'Bridgewater Treatise,' to be "the most precious repository of sound ethical principles extant in any language." The great discovery in morals which ethical writers universally admit to be due to Butler, is the important doctrine of the supreme authority of conscience; which, to use the words of Dugald Stewart, "although beautifully described by many of the ancient moralists, was not sufficiently attended to by modern writers, as a fundamental principle in the science of ethics, till the time of Dr Butler." We do not find, it is true, in the 'Fifteen Sermons,' a system of morals; but the fundamental principles of all morality are stated with a clearness and precision which we will seek for in vain in any other writer, whether of ancient or of modern times.

Early in the autumn of 1726, Butler resigned his preacherhip at the Rolls Chapel, after which he left the metropolis, and resided wholly, during a period of seven years, at his parish of Stanhope. To the duties of the ministerial office he paid the most sedulous attention; and in the hours of retirement which he was able to snatch from his more public engagements, he employed himself in the preparation of his great work, 'The Analogy of Religion to the Constitution and Course of Nature.' (See ANALOGY.) This constant devotion, however, to studies of the most severe description, combined with the active discharge of the duties of his parish, soon preyed upon his health and spirits. His early friend, Secker, perceiving the injurious effect of his indefatigable exertions, felt anxious to obtain for him some relief by a change of situation. Through his influence, accordingly, Mr Butler was chosen chaplain to the Lord Chancellor Talbot, who happened to be the brother of the friend and associate of their early days. This appointment was accepted on the express understanding that he should be allowed to spend half the year at Stanhope, that he might not be altogether withdrawn from the duties of his parish.

In the summer of 1731, his father, Thomas Butler, died, leaving Joseph, and his eldest brother Robert, joint-executors of his will. This domestic calamity had for some time a very depressing effect upon the mind of the subject of our present sketch. By the influence of religion and engagement in the duties of active life, however, his sorrow gradually abated, and he recovered his wonted composure and tranquillity. The office of chaplain to the lord chancellor brought him to the metropolis; and his talents soon attracted the notice of the queen, through whose powerful influence he was rapidly promoted. On his way to London, to enter upon the duties of his chaplaincy, he visited Oxford, where he was admitted to a doctor's degree. Early in the summer of 1736, her majesty appointed him her clerk of the closet,—an office which afforded her an opportunity of appreciating his high talents and attainments. The first official act which he performed in his new capacity, was administering the sacrament to the queen in private. This happened on the 4th of July; and on the 16th of the same month he was presented, by the chancellor, to a prebendal stall at Rochester. From the nature of his office, Dr Butler had very frequent access to the presence of his sovereign; and as Queen Caroline, the consort of George II., was distinguished at once for her piety and her mental acquirements, she took peculiar delight in the conversation of a man possessed of such rare endowments. His attendance, accordingly, was requested in the palace in the evening of every day, from seven till nine, for the purpose of conversation upon philosophical and theological subjects. To these interviews the most distinguished men of the age were often invited; and Caroline had the high enjoyment of listening to the learned discussions of such men as Berkeley, Clarke, Hoadly, Sherlock, and Secker. The intercourse of Butler with this accomplished and excellent queen, was, however, of short duration. She died on the 20th of November 1737, universally regretted, in the fifty-fifth year of her age. The last official act in which Dr Butler was employed at the palace, was similar to the first,—the private administration of the sacrament to her majesty a few weeks previous to her decease.

It was while Butler held his appointment in the queen's household that his great work, 'The Analogy,' left the press, and called forth the admiration of the world, by the cogency of its reasoning and the depth of its research. It forms the main pillar of Butler's fame. Sir James Macintosh declares it to be "the most original and profound work extant, in any language, on the philosophy of religion."

The publication of 'The Analogy' was not long in leading to its distinguished author's promotion to the Episcopal Bench, and more especially as he was held in the highest esteem at Court. We find, accordingly, that in the autumn of the year after the queen's death, he was raised to the see of Bristol, vacant by the translation of Dr Gooch to the see of Norwich. Little more than a year elapsed, when he was invested with the additional office of the deanery of St Paul's. The acquisition of the deanery led him to resign the valuable living of Stanhope and the prebendal stall at Rochester.

A short time before Butler was made Bishop of Bristol, a correspondence was carried on between him and Henry Home (Lord Kaimes), in reference to some doubts which arose in the mind of the latter on turning his attention to the evidences of natural and revealed religion. This correspondence, though it has unfortunately been lost, is understood to have completely solved Mr Home's doubts. David Hume also appears to have anxiously sought an acquaintance with Dr Butler, and for this purpose he called upon him with a letter from Mr Home. Butler, however, was absent in the country at the time, and they do not seem to have ever met.

The generous nature of the Bishop of Bristol led him to avail himself of the patronage which his office conferred to assist some of the most deserving of his friends. His first tutor at Wantage he presented to the rectory of Hatton, in the county of Essex; and his nephew, Joseph Butler, he presented to the rectory of St Paul's, Shadwell, and afterwards to the Islington canonry, or stall, at St Paul's.

Such was the respect for Dr Butler with which Queen Caroline had impressed the mind of her husband, George II., that he embraced the first opportunity of securing his services and his company at the palace, by appointing him clerk of the closet to the king, in consequence of a vacancy which occurred in that office in 1746. On the decease of Potter, archbishop of Canterbury, in 1747, the king proposed that Dr Butler should resign the see of Bristol, and become metropolitan of all England. Such, however, was the unfavourable view which he took of the aspect of the times, that he respectfully declined the honour, declaring that "it was too late for him to support a falling Church." When intelligence of his having refused the primacy reached his family at Wantage, it excited no small astonishment; and, imagining that a step so strange could only have been taken from a dread of the heavy charges incurred in entering on such an office, his nephew, John Butler, who was possessed of great wealth, hastened to London, and offered to advance to his uncle twenty thousand pounds, or any other sum he might require, provided he would accept the high station which had been offered him. The worthy bishop, however, was inexorable, and his kind relative returned home, disappointed and chagrined at the inflexible determination of his uncle.

Towards the close of 1749, Dr Butler lost his eldest brother Robert, who, having amassed a considerable fortune by carrying on the business of his father—that of a linen and woollen draper, at Wantage—died at the age of seventy-three. The following year, by the death of Dr Edward Chandler, the see of Durham became vacant, and the king proposed to confer it upon Dr Butler. Several scruples occurred to his conscientious mind, which however were at length overcome, and he agreed to accept of the promotion. About the time of his elevation to the see of Durham, Dr Butler formed a project for the introduction of Episcopacy into America. The plan which he drew up was not adopted; and being afterwards revived by Archbishop Secker, gave rise to a warm controversy with the Dissenters in America. Immediately on entering upon his office at Durham, the new bishop summoned his clergy, and delivered to them his first, and indeed his only, charge. The publication of this address, the subject of which is, ‘The Importance of External Religion,’ was the commencement of a controversy, in which Dr Butler was much misrepresented, as if he had been inclined to Popery,—a charge which has been often refuted, but more especially by Bishop Halifax.

Bishop Butler’s health began to decline almost immediately after his promotion to the see of Durham. The most eminent physicians were consulted, and as his indisposition assumed a more serious aspect, he was advised to repair to Clifton for the benefit of the waters. These having failed to produce the desired effect, he was conveyed to Bath in a very exhausted state, and there he died in peace, on the morning of Tuesday, June 16, 1752.

BUTTER. In Scripture, the word butter is synonymous with cream, or liquid butter. Prov. xxx. 33; 2 Sam. xvii. 29. In most of the passages where it occurs it may be translated curdled milk. To make butter in the East, the cream is put into bottles of goat-skin, which are suspended between two poles in their tents, and swung to and fro, so as to churn it. It would appear that sometimes the goat-skin is trodden with the feet, and to this the patriarch Job alludes when he says, “When I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil.” Job xxix. 6. Harmer supposes that the mode of churning by the feet was adopted where large quantities of cream were to be churned. “The method of making butter in the East,” says Professor Paxton, “illustrates the conduct of Jael, the wife of Heber, described in the Book of Judges (iv. 19, v. 25): “And he (Sisera) said unto her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water to drink; for I am thirsty. And she opened a bottle of milk, and gave him drink, and covered him.” In the song of Deborah, the statement is repeated: “He asked water, and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish.” The word hemah, which our translators render butter, properly signifies cream; which is undoubtedly the meaning of it in this passage: for Sisera complained of thirst, and asked a little water to quench it,—a purpose to which butter is but little adapted. Mr Harmer, indeed, urges the same objection to cream, which, he contends, few people would think a very proper beverage for one that was extremely thirsty; and concludes that it must have been butter-milk which Jael, who had just been churning, gave to Sisera. But the opinion of Dr Russel is preferable,—that the hemah of the Scriptures is probably the same as the haymak of the Arabs, which is not, as Harmer supposed, simple cream, but cream produced by simmering fresh sheep’s milk for some hours over a slow fire. It could not be butter newly churned which Jael presented to Sisera, because the Arab butter is apt to be foul, and is commonly passed through a strainer before it is used: and Russel declares, he never saw butter offered to a stranger, but always haymak; nor did he ever observe the Orientals drink butter-milk, but always leban, which is coagulated sour milk, diluted with water. It was leban, therefore, which Pococke mistook for butter-milk, with which the Arabs treated him in the Holy Land. A similar conclusion may be drawn concerning the butter and milk which the wife of Heber presented to Sisera: they were forced cream or haymak, and leban or coagulated sour milk, diluted with water, which is a common and refreshing beverage in those sultry regions. In Isa. vii. 15, butter and honey are mentioned as food, which, in Egypt and other places in the East, is in use to this day. The butter and honey are mixed, and the bread is then dipped in it. Butter is carried to market in the same goat skins in which it is churned. Hence it is usual to melt and strain the butter, in order to clarify it, and to this there seems to be an allusion in Job xx. 17: “He shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter.” This passage would be rendered more emphatic, as well as more accordant with the original, by rendering the Hebrew word translated “brooks” by the stronger word, “torrents.”

All Arab food considered well prepared swims in butter, and large quantities are swallowed independently in a solid or liquid state. Burckhardt mentions that those who can afford such luxury swallow every morning a large cupful of butter before breakfast; and even snuff a good quantity up their nostrils. Some tribes welcome a guest by pouring a cup of melted butter on his head. Our way of spreading butter thinly on bread seems the height of absurdity to them, and indeed to other Asiatics. When they do eat it with bread at all, it is in the way which was taught us by a Bedouin, who, observing us sitting on the ground and refreshing ourselves with buttered bread and dates, looked compassionately on our ignorance of the true use of butter, and to give us a valuable lesson on the subject, commenced breaking off a thin bit of bread about the size of a crown-piece, and heaping thereon as large a lump of butter as it would support, threw it into his mouth with great satisfaction. He pursued this instruction until his rapid progress towards the bottom of our butter skin obliged us to declare ourselves sufficiently instructed. Burckhardt, in allusion to the extraordinary use of butter among the Arabs, observes, “The continual motion and exercise in which they employ themselves strengthen their powers of digestion; and, for the same reason, an Arab will live for months together on the smallest allowance, and then, if an opportunity should offer, he will devour at one sitting the flesh of half a lamb without any injury to his health.”

BYWAYS. In Judg. v. 6, we find this word thus mentioned: “In the days of Shamgar the son of Anath, in the days of Jael, the highways were unoccupied, and the travellers walked through byways.” The word is rendered on the margin, “crooked ways,” and the allusion probably is to the greater safety of the private roads, the highways being often frequented by robbers.

BYZANTINE CHURCH, all that acknowledge the authority and submit to the decrees of the Patriarch of Constantinople, who is the universal bishop of the Eastern as the Pope is of the Western Church.

BYZANTINE or ORIENTAL RECENSION. This name is assigned by Biblical critics to the text of the Greek New Testament in general use at Constantinople, after that city became the capital and metropolitan see of the Eastern empire. Michaelis remarks that the greatest number of manuscripts written on Mount Athos, are evidently of the Byzantine edition; and he thinks it probable that almost all the Moscow manuscripts of which M. Matthæi has given extracts, belong to this edition. The readings of the Byzantine edition are those which are most commonly found in the printed Greek Text, and are also most numerous in the existing manuscripts which correspond to it. Griesbach reckons upwards of one hundred manuscripts of this class, which minutely harmonize with each other. On account of the many alterations that were unavoidably made in the long interval between the fourth and fifteenth centuries, Michaelis proposes to divide the Byzantine edition into ancient and modern. The Byzantine Text is found in the four gospels of the Alexandrian manuscript; it was the original of the Slavonic or old Russian version, and was cited by Chrysostom and Theophylact bishop of Bulgaria.

C.

CAB, a Hebrew measure, the sixth part of a seah, and the eighteenth part of an ephah. A cab for liquids contained three pints one-third of our wine measure; or, for dry articles, two pints five-sixths of our corn measure.

CABBALA, the mystical interpretation of Scripture, which the Jews believe to have been originally given to Moses, and not having been committed to writing, has been handed down from generation to generation. After the death of Moses, the Cabbala was believed to have passed to the prophets, to the righteous kings, and especially to the wise men. A modern Rabbi has even given as a precious discovery the genealogy of these wise men, from Moses down to the year 1167, when he assures us that the oral law terminated. The Jews reckon that the Cabbala is of three kinds. 1. The Gematria, which consists in taking letters as figures, and explaining words by the arithmetical value of the letters of which they are composed. 2. The Notaricon, which consists in taking each particular letter of a word for an entire diction. 3. The Themura, which consists in changing and transposing the letters of a word. To the Cabbalistic mode of expounding the Word of God, the Jews attach the utmost importance, alleging that by this means hidden and recondite meanings are discovered, which in their views distinguish the Scriptures from profane books. In the early Christian Church, the introduction of the Cabbala by the Jewish converts had no small effect in giving origin to various heresies, particularly of the Gnostic sects.

CABBALISTS, those Jewish doctors who profess the study of the cabbala. In the opinion of these men, there is not a word, letter, or accent in the law, without some mystery in it. The first cabbalistical author that we know of is Simon the son of Joachai, who is said to have lived a little before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. His book, entitled 'Zohar,' is extant; but it is agreed that many additions have been made to it. The first part of the work is entitled Zeniutha, or Mystery; the second, Idra Rabba, or the Great Synod; the third, Idra Lata, or the Little Synod,—which is the author's adieu to his disciples.

The cabbalistic system was first introduced into Europe by Gaspar Newman, professor at Breslau, and it has been lately revived by a French academician, —Fabre D'Olivet. According to this latter writer, every word and every letter of the Hebrew language is symbolic of some mysterious hieroglyphical power.

CABIRI, sacred priests or deified heroes venerated by the Pagans as the authors of religion, and the founders of the human race. This subject is involved in much obscurity. Herodotus says that the worship of the Cabiri was brought to Samothrace by the Pelasgi. Strabo affirms that they are the same with the Corybantes. Some tell us that they were six in number, three male and three female; others, that they were two, sons of Jupiter or Bacchus. In Samothrace, four were venerated. In Egypt their temple was never entered by any but the priests. In Phœnicia, Rome, and other countries of Europe and Asia, traces of their worship have been found. But the mysteries celebrated at Samothrace were the most famous. Faber informs us that they were celebrated in the darkness of night, and with the most profound secrecy. After a previous probation of abstinence, chastity, and silence, the candidates for initiation were purified by water and blood; they then offered a sacrifice of a bull or ram, and were made to drink of two fountains, called Lethe and Mnemosyne, to wash away the memory of their former guilt, and to enable them to remember the new instructions. They were then transported into a dark tower or cavern, where their ears were assailed by the most appalling sounds,—the rushing of waters, the roar of thunder, dreadful yells, with occasional gleams of light flashing through the darkness, and displaying the most horrible phantoms, with a dead body exposed on a bier. Thus filled with terror, they were suddenly hurried into other scenes; light and cheerful music succeeded to darkness and the dismal sounds, the dead body revived, and the temple resounded with rejoicings. The hidden doctrines and secret mysteries were now communicated, and dances and orgies closed the ceremony.

CABUL, the name of a district in Galilee, containing twenty cities, which Hiram, king of Tyre, received as a present from Solomon, in return for the services which he rendered in building the temple. 1 Kings ix. 13. He seems to have been dissatisfied with the gift, and hence the name Cabul, which Josephus tells us signifies in the Phœnician tongue "displeasing." Others suppose the word to denote a boundary; and others still, a coast. There have been various opinions as to the situation of Cabul, but the most general idea is, that it was in the neighbourhood of Tyre.

CÆSAR, the surname of the Julian family at Rome. It was applied, after the death of Julius Cæsar, to his successors in the empire, as the customary title of dignity; at a later period it became the title of the heir-apparent. In the New Testament the title Cæsar is applied to Augustus (Luke ii. 1), Tiberius (Luke iii. 1), Claudius (Acts xi. 28), and Nero (Acts xxv. 8).

CÆSAREA. See CESAREA.

CAGE. This word occurs in Jer. v. 27.: "As a cage is full of birds, so are their houses full of deceit: therefore they are become great, and waxen rich." Gesenius explains the Hebrew word to mean a trap-cage furnished with valves or clappers, which, as soon as a bird has entered, shut to with a clap, and secure the bird. The Septuagint renders the word a snare, thus seeming to imply that they understood it to mean a cage in which a bird was kept as a decoy. The same word in Amos viii. 1, 2, denotes a basket of wicker-work, probably resembling a cage: "Thus hath the Lord God shewed unto me: and behold a basket of summer fruit. And he said, Amos, what seest thou? And I said, A basket of summer fruit. Then said the Lord unto me, The end is come upon my people of Israel; I will not again pass by them any more."

CAIAPHAS, the high-priest of the Jews at the time of our Lord's crucifixion. He possessed this office for nine years. He married a daughter of Annas, who is also called high priest. Caiaphas appears to have belonged to the sect of the Sadducees. It is remarkable that during the deliberations which took place among the priests in reference to the death of Jesus Christ, Caiaphas uttered what amounts to a prophecy, "Nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not." John xi. 50. After Judas had betrayed Jesus, he was first taken before Annas, who, it is probable, had formerly held the office of high-priest, and therefore, as was customary, still enjoyed the title. Annas then sent him to Caiaphas his son-in-law, at whose house the sanhedrim were convened. Under the guise of impartiality, Caiaphas called for witnesses against Jesus. False witnesses were brought; but feeling that their testimony was insufficient to condemn him, the high-priest said to Jesus, "I adjure thee by the living God that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God." To this adjuration, so solemnly made by the superior judge, Jesus answered, "Thou hast said; nevertheless I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." On hearing these words, Caiaphas rent his clothes, saying, "What further need have we of witnesses: behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy. What think ye?" They answered, "He is guilty of death." And as the power of life and death was not at this time in their hands, but was reserved by the Romans, they conducted him to Pilate, that he might confirm their sentence, and order his execution. Caiaphas having shortly after the crucifixion of our Lord lost the favour of the people, was deposed by Vitellius, the governor of Syria.

CAIN, the eldest son of Adam and Eve, though some commentators suppose that they were twin brothers, founding their idea chiefly on the phrase "and she added to bear." It would appear that Eve was so fully persuaded that the promised seed would immediately descend, that she supposed her first-born child to be the promised Messiah, and exclaimed, "I have gotten a man from the Lord," or, as it may more properly be rendered, "the man, the Lord," and accordingly gave him the name of Cain or "acquisition." Cain, as the first-born, became, like his father, a tiller of the ground. The awful crime of which he was guilty in murdering his brother, has already been noticed under article ABEL, (which see.) The sentence which the Almighty passed upon Cain is thus stated—"And now art thou cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand; when thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth." Gen. iv. 11, 12. Though death by the hand of man was not pronounced upon the first murderer, yet it is plain from his language, that he is apprehensive that men will kill him; and to allay his fears, we are told that "the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him." The Septuagint, however, renders the passage more literally thus, "God set a sign before Cain, to persuade him that whosoever should find him should not kill him." Thus banished from his relatives, Cain retired into the land of Nod, lying east from the province of Eden. While he dwelt in this country, which is generally understood to be Susiana, or Chusistan, he had a son, whom he named Enoch, in memory of whom he built a city of the same name. This is all we learn from Scripture concerning Cain.

CAINAN, son of Enos, who was grandson of Adam. He was born A.M. 325, when his father was ninety years old. Gen. v. 9. Cainan lived to the very advanced age of nine hundred and ten, when he died, A.M. 1235.

CAINAN. This name is introduced by the Septuagint in Gen. xi. 12, between Arphaxad and Salah, making him the son of Arphaxad, and father of Salah. This is followed by Luke (iii. 36,) who brings in the same person in the same way. But the Hebrew text, both here and in 1 Chron. i. is perfectly silent on this subject, and the best writers on chronology have agreed in rejecting it as a spurious generation. Various reasons have been assigned for the insertion of the name of Cainan by the Septuagint, and its omission by the Hebrew. Some think that Cainan and Salah were the same person, under different names, as was not unusual among the Hebrews; and others again try to explain the matter by alleging that both Cainan and Salah were sons of Arphaxad. It militates greatly against the probability of Cainan's existence as a separate individual, that the Septuagint, in repeating the genealogies in 1 Chron. i., omits Cainan; and, besides, Josephus, Philo, Eusebius, and others, reject the reading.

CAINITES, a sect that sprung up about the year A.D. 130; so called because they esteemed Cain worthy of the greatest honours. They honoured those who carry in Scripture the most visible marks of reprobation; as the inhabitants of Sodom, Esau, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. They had, in particular, great veneration for Judas, under the pretence that the death of Christ had saved mankind.

CAKES. See BREAD.

CALAH, a city of Assyria, built by Asshur. Gen. x. 12. From it the adjacent country on the north-east of the Tigris and south of the Gordian mountains of Armenia, was called Callachene, or Callacine. According to Strabo, it lies somewhere between the source of the Lycus and the Tigris.

CALAMUS. This sweet herb is first mentioned by Moses along with myrrh, cinnamon, cassia, and olive oil; all of which entered into the composition of the "holy anointing oil." When Christ sets forth the graces of the Church, he compares her to "spikenard and saffron; calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense; myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices." Cant. iv. 14. The calamus, then, was a fragrant precious herb, and is mentioned (Ezek. xxvii. 19) among the merchandise of Tyre: "Dan also and Javan going to and fro occupied in thy fairs: bright iron, cassia, and calamus, were in thy market." This plant is now referred generally by botanists to the Acorus calamus, variety Indicus; which is equivalent to the Calamus aromaticus of commerce.

CALAMUS SCRIPTORIUS, a reed answering the purpose of a pen to write with. See PEN.

CALDRON, a large kitchen utensil, commonly made of copper, having a moveable iron handle. Vessels for kitchen purposes seem, in ancient times, to have been chiefly made of brass, and in Lev. vi. 28, we read of "a brazen pot." Mr Roberts, the Eastern traveller, tells us, that at this day the wealth of a person is estimated according to the number of brass pots which he possesses.

CALEB, one of the spies sent out by Joshua to report the appearance and condition of the land of Canaan. Numb. xiii. 1-20. He and Joshua were the only persons who brought back a favourable account, and encouraged the Israelites to go forward and take possession of it. The whole multitude, accordingly, with the exception of Joshua and Caleb, were doomed to die in the wilderness. When Joshua entered Canaan, Caleb was one of the twelve whom God chose to divide the land.

CALENDAR, a method of subdividing time into certain periods, such as days, weeks, months, years. This subdivision is regulated by the motions of the heavenly bodies. Thus, the solar day is calculated by the diurnal revolution of the earth on its own axis, and the solar year by the annual revolution of the earth round the sun. Besides these, the lunar month is regulated by the motions of the moon. These three, the day, the month, the year, form what may be called the natural divisions of time; all others are arbitrary and conventional.

The civil calendar of all European countries has been borrowed from the Romans. Romulus, the founder of Rome, is said to have divided the year into ten months, including in all three hundred and four days. In the reign of Numa Pompilius, two months were added to the year, January at the beginning and February at the end. This arrangement continued until B.C. 452, when the Decemvirs changed the order of the months, and placed February after January. The year now consisted of 355 days, differing from the solar year by ten days and a fraction. To rectify this difference, Numa introduced an intercalary month every alternate year. The chief pontiffs, however, to whom was committed the power of regulating these intercalary months, so abused their office, that at the time of Julius Cæsar, the civil differed from the solar year by three months, so that the seasons were completely deranged. To remedy this disorder, Julius Cæsar ordered the civil year to be regulated entirely by the sun. He fixed the length of the year at three hundred and sixty-five days, with the exception of every fourth year, which was appointed to have three hundred and sixty-six days. Thus was the civil year rendered as nearly as possible equal in length to the solar. Still however, the year was too long by eleven minutes, ten seconds. This error, of course, by lapse of time gradually accumulated, and to remedy the disorder which was found to have taken place in the arrangement of the feasts of the church, and particularly that of Easter, Pope Gregory XIII., by a bull published in 1582, cut off ten days from the calendar, and thus introduced what is called the New Style. From 1582 to 1700, the difference between the old and new style continued to be ten days; but 1700 being a leap year in the Julian calendar, and a common year in the Gregorian, the difference of the styles during the eighteenth century, was eleven days. The year 1800 was also common in the new calendar, and consequently the difference in the present century is twelve days. The Gregorian calendar was introduced into Spain, Portugal, and part of Italy, in the same day as at Rome. In France it was received in the same year, in the month of December, and by the Catholic states of Germany the year following. In the Protestant States of Germany, the Julian calendar was adhered to till the year 1700, when it was decreed by the Diet of Ratisbon, that the new style and the Gregorian correction of the intercalation should be adopted. In Denmark and Sweden, the reformed calendar was received about the same time as in the Protestant States of Germany. Russia still adheres to the Julian reckoning, or the old style. In Great Britain, the alteration of the style was for a long time resisted. At length, in 1751, an Act of Parliament was passed for the adoption of the new style in all public and legal transactions. The difference of the two styles, which then amounted to eleven days, was removed by ordering the day following, the 2d of September of the year 1752, to be accounted the 14th of that month; and, in order to preserve uniformity in all future time, the Gregorian rule of intercalation was adopted. At the same time the commencement of the legal year was changed from the 25th of April to the 1st of January. The calendar of the Church of England is from century to century, the same as the old Roman calendar, excepting that the golden numbers indicate the full moons instead of the new moons. See CHRONOLOGY—DAY—HOUR—MONTH—YEAR.

CALENDARS, books containing the memorials of the days on which the martyrs suffered. At first the calendar contained the mention of the martyrs only; but, in the course of time, the confessors, or those who, without arriving at the glory of martyrdom, had confessed their faith in Christ, by their heroic virtues, were admitted to the same honour. The calendars were preserved in the churches. A calendar of the Church of Rome was published by Boucher, another by Allatius, a third by Joannes Wanto, chancellor of Paris. A most ancient calendar of the Church of Carthage was published by Mabillon. But the principal work of this kind is

CALF. This well-known animal is frequently mentioned in Scripture as having been used in sacrifices. Jeremiah (xxxiv. 18, 19) mentions a remarkable ceremony illustrative of the mode of ratifying a covenant by means of a calf cut into two parts: "And I will give the men that have transgressed my covenant, which have not performed the words of the covenant which they had made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof, the princes of Judah, and the princes of Jerusalem, the eunuchs, and the priests, and all the people of the land, which passed between the parts of the calf." Something of the same kind was practised among the Greeks and Romans. The first time we find the calf mentioned as an object of idolatrous worship is in Exod. xxxii. 4. It is very probable that the Israelites borrowed this species of idolatry from the Egyptians, and we find it renewed in the time of Jeroboam, who set up two golden calves, one in Dan and another in Bethel, and these continued to be a snare to the Jews till the time of the captivity. Animals of this kind are well known to have been worshipped in Egypt; the Apis at Memphis, and the Mnevis at Heliopolis. Hosea (xiv. 2), mentions the "calves of the lips," to indicate the sacrifices of praise which the captives of Babylon addressed to God, being no longer in a condition to offer sacrifices in his temple. The Septuagint render it the "fruit of the lips;" and their reading is followed by the Syriac and by the Epistle to the Hebrews (xiii. 15): "By him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to his name."

CALIXTINS, a branch of the Hussites in Bohemia and Moravia, in the fifteenth century. The principal point in which they differed from the Church of Rome, was the use of the chalice (calix), or communicating in both kinds. Calixtins was also a name given to those among the Lutherans who followed the opinions of George Calixtus, a celebrated divine in the seventeenth century, who endeavoured to unite the Romish, Lutheran, and Calvinistic Churches, in the bonds of charity and mutual benevolence. He maintained,—1. That the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, by which he meant those elementary principles whence all its truths flow, were preserved pure in all the three communions, and were contained in that ancient form of doctrine that is vulgarly known by the name of the Apostles' Creed. 2. That the tenets and opinions which had been constantly received by the ancient doctors during the first five centuries were to be considered as of equal truth and authority with the express declarations and doctrines of Scripture.

CALL, CALLING. The call of the gospel may be regarded as twofold—the external or general call, and the internal or effectual calling. By the external or general call of the Word, we are to understand the free and unlimited offer of Christ in the gospel to all the hearers of it, without money and without price. Isa. lv. 1. By the internal or effectual calling, we are to understand the Holy Spirit's accompanying the external call with power and efficacy to the soul, for its everlasting salvation. John v. 35.

That there is an outward or general call, or, in other words, that there are calls, invitations, and exhortations addressed to all men, is clear from many passages of the sacred Scriptures. Among others may be mentioned Matt. xi. 28, John vii. 37, and Rev. xxii. 17. It may perhaps be objected, that it is inconsistent to call upon all men to embrace Christ, when they cannot of themselves believe, and it is well known that multitudes never will believe unto the saving of their souls. In reply to this it may be argued, that if there be in the gospel an unlimited offer of Christ made to all men, whatever their character and state may be, then the duty of the ministers of Christ is plain. They themselves are not cognizant of the divine decree in regard to any man, and it is their obvious duty to be entirely guided by the commands of Him who hath said, "Go and preach the gospel to every creature." "On this difficult question," says a late writer, "what must we answer? Must we say that God could not foresee the event? This cannot be admitted without doing injustice to his perfections, as well as to Scripture, which foresaw and foretold the rejection of the Messiah by the Jews, and the rejection of the Jews for murdering the Messiah. Must we say that God expostulates with none but the elect? But this is rather cutting the knot than untying it. Must we, then, say that God is insincere in addressing them? This is dreadful; for if God can speak falsely, dangerous is the state of those who trust him. Neither of these inferences can be admitted; indeed it would answer no end; for to admit either of these, is to plunge ourselves into a thousand difficulties for the sake of removing one. Let us, then, rest where we ought to rest. Let us believe the Scripture propositions to be true, and, applying ourselves to practice, let us leave the manner of reconciling them to God. I call it but the shadow of a difficulty; for, indeed, a man must know very little of God, very little of himself, and very little of Scripture, not to know that two truths may be both certain, and yet the harmony of them be beyond his comprehension."

There is no truth which is more certain than that although the invitations and calls and exhortations of the gospel have been addressed to men, yet in all ages it has been true, that multitudes have rejected the call and refused to accept the Saviour. Hence arises the necessity for an inward effectual call. This calling is thus beautifully described in the Shorter Catechism of the Westminster Assembly—"Effectual calling is the work of God's Spirit, whereby, convincing us of our sin and misery, enlightening our minds in the knowledge of Christ, and renewing our wills, he doth persuade and enable us to embrace Jesus Christ, freely offered to us in the gospel." This great work, then, by which men are called out of darkness into God's marvellous light, is accomplished by the all-powerful agency of the Spirit of God. John xvi. 14; 2 Tim. i. 9. The objection has often been urged against this view of the subject, that it is subversive of the liberty of the will. This objection arises from a total misapprehension of the mode of the Spirit's operation. It must be remembered that there is no outward compulsion by which a man is compelled to do something in opposition to his own will. The power of the Spirit, instead of opposing the will, carries the will along with it. "God," as has been well remarked, "does not lead us to salvation without consciousness, like stones transported from one place to another; nor without our consent, like slaves who are driven to their task by the terror of punishment. He conducts us in a manner suitable to our rational and moral nature. He so illuminates our minds, as we shall afterwards see, that we most cordially concur with his design. His power, although able to subdue opposition, is of the mildest and most gentle kind. While he commands, he persuades; while he draws, the sinner comes without reluctance; and never in his life is there a freer act of volition than when he believes in Christ and accepts of his salvation."

But while the work of effectual calling is accomplished by the agency of the Spirit of God, it is important also to remark, that he acts by the use of means, and these means are such as are suited to the constitution of the human mind. Hence the prayer of our Lord in behalf of his people, "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy Word is truth." "The Word, or the truth," says Dr Buchanan, in his Treatise on the Holy Spirit, "contained in the Word, is the instrument by which the Spirit acts in applying the benefits of Christ's redemption; and it is an instrument admirably adapted to its end. Powerless in itself, it is mighty through God. It is the sword of the Spirit. It is the hammer by which he breaks the rock in pieces. It is the light which he opens the mind to receive. It is the food by which he feeds, and the medicine by which he heals, and the consolation with which he comforts. The Spirit and the Word must not be disjoined; the sanctification of the Spirit, and the belief of the truth, are inseparably linked together, and are equally essential—the one as an efficient agent, the other as a fit instrument or means. Mark how uniformly they go together in Scripture. Of regeneration it is said, that we are 'born of water and of the Spirit,'—he is the agent in that great initial change; but it is also said, we are 'born not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, even by the Word of God,'—that is the instrument by which the change is wrought. Of Lydia, it is said, 'The Lord opened the heart of Lydia,'—here is Divine agency; but the use of means was not superseded, for it is added, 'so that she attended to the things that were spoken of Paul,'—here is the instrumentality of the Word. And the Psalmist's prayer, 'Open thou mine eyes,' recognises the necessity of Divine influence; but when he adds, 'that I may see wonderful things out of thy law,' divine truth, as revealed in the Word, is also recognised as the means of his instruction. These two—the sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth—are equally essential, and the one must not be allowed to supersede or exclude the other."

The various steps of the all-important process of effectual calling are these:—1. Conviction of sin and misery, John xvi. 8; Acts xvi. 29, 30. 2. Making known Christ to the soul, 1 Pet. ii. 9; Eph. i. 18; Phil. iii. 8. 3. Renewing the will, Ezek. xxxvi. 26. 4. Persuading to embrace Jesus Christ, John vi. 44; Heb. xi. 13. 5. Enabling the soul to embrace Jesus Christ, Phil. ii. 13; Ezek. xxxvi. 27. By these various steps is a man effectually called from darkness to light, from death to life, from sin to God. And so vitally important is this decisive change to every human being, that his eternal welfare depends upon it. Hence, our blessed Lord in his conversation with Nicodemus (John iii.), lays it down that effectual calling is essential to the eternal safety and well-being of every man. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." He may enjoy the outward call of the Word, but this will avail him nothing unless he shall be effectually called by the Spirit of God. We are exhorted, therefore, to give all diligence to make our calling and our election sure, the two being intimately and indissolubly connected. It is a high, a holy, a heavenly calling, and whosoever is thus called, his election is sure on the one hand, and his eternal salvation on the other. "Moreover whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified." Rom. viii. 30.

CALNEH, a city built by Nimrod, in the land of Shinar. Gen. x. 10. It has been supposed to be the same with the Calno of Isaiah x. 9, and the Canneh of Ezek. xxvii. 23. Eusebius and Jerome consider it to be the same with Ctesiphon, situated on the eastern bank of the Tigris, about eighteen miles below Bagdad, where ruins are still to be found, particularly the arch of Chosroes, which is thought to have formed a part of the palace of the Parthian kings.

CALOYERS, a name given to the monks of the Greek Church.

CALVARY, or, as it is called in Hebrew, Golgotha, "the place of skulls," a small eminence on the western side of the larger mount of Moriah. It is represented to have been two hundred paces without the ancient walls of Jerusalem. It received its name either because the form of the mount somewhat resembles a man's skull, or rather, as is more probable, because, being the common place of execution, a great number of dead men's skulls was usually to be seen there. The whole of Calvary is now enclosed by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The same building also encloses several other places reputed sacred, as—1. The place where Christ was mocked by the soldiers. 2. Where the soldiers divided his garments. 3. Where he was shut up until the hole was dug in which the cross was planted. 4. Where he was crowned with thorns. 5. Where he was nailed to the cross. 6. Where the cross was erected, and the hole in which it was fixed. 7. Where the soldier stood who pierced his side. 8. The stone on which his body was anointed previous to his burial. 9. Where his body was deposited in the sepulchre. 10. Where the angels appeared to the women after the resurrection. 11. Where Christ himself appeared to Mary Magdalene. 12. Where he appeared to the Virgin Mary. All these stations are distinguished by so many separate chapels or altars. This sacred place is in possession of the followers of Mahomet, and is still further outraged by the superstitious rites of the Greek and Latin Churches. Here on Holy Thursday it is pretended that the angel Gabriel brings fire from heaven; and the deluded multitude flock in crowds, with a dreadful tumult and uproar, to carry it away with them, by means of candles, torches, &c., the original fire being presented to them for that purpose by the priest, who pretends to receive it from the angel. There is an absurd tradition, which was believed by some of the early fathers, who were often credulous enough, that Adam was buried on this spot, and that thus the remains of the first and second Adam occupied the same resting-place. Calvary was outside the walls of the ancient Jerusalem; but in the modern Jerusalem, it is not only inside the walls, but almost in the centre of the city. With the most minute precision do the monks point out the various spots on which the various details of the solemn event of the crucifixion of Jesus happened; and it can scarcely be wondered at that the mind of the traveller is affected with the deepest interest in contemplating places which, whether correctly or not,

are associated with so momentous a transaction in the world's history. M. Lamartine, the French traveller and poet, gives vent to his feelings on visiting Calvary in the following eloquent remarks:—"Whatever form religious sentiments may have assumed in the soul of man—whether influenced by private meditation, by the study of history, by years, or the vicissitudes of the heart and mind—whether he has retained Christianity in its literal interpretation, and in the doctrines imbibed from his parents, or is only a philosophical and spiritual Christian—whether Christ be to him a crucified God, or no more than a holy man deified by virtue, inspired by supreme truth, and dying to bear testimony to his Father—whether Jesus be in his eyes the Son of God or the Son of Man, Divinity incarnate or Humanity deified—Christianity is still the religion of his memory, of his heart, and of his imagination, and will not have so wholly evaporated before the winds of time and life as that the soul on which it was shed shall preserve no vestige of its primitive odour, or that its fading impressions can resist the revivifying and awfully affecting influence of its birthplace, and of the visible monuments of its earliest impression. To the Christian or to the philosopher, to the moralist or to the historian, this tomb is the boundary of two worlds, the ancient and the modern. From this point issued a truth that has renewed the universe—a civilization that has transformed all things—a word which has echoed over the whole globe. This tomb is the sepulchre of the old world, the cradle of the new; never was earthly stone the foundation of so vast an edifice—never was tomb so prolific—never did doctrine, inhumed for three days or three centuries, so victoriously rend the rock which man had sealed over it, and give the lie to death by so transcendent, so perpetual a resurrection. In my turn, and the last, I entered the Holy Sepulchre, my mind filled with these stupendous reflections, my heart touched by impressions yet more sacred, which remain a mystery between man and his soul, between the reasoning insect and his Creator. Such impressions admit not of words, they exhale with the smoke of the holy lamps, with the perfume of the censers, with the vague and confused murmur of sighs; they fall with those tears that spring to the eyes from remembrance of the first names we have lisped in infancy—of the father and the mother who inculcated them—of the brothers, the sisters, the friends, with whom we have whispered them. All the pious emotions which have affected our souls in every period of life—all the prayers that have been breathed from our hearts and our lips in the name of Him who taught us to pray to his Father and to ours—all the joys and griefs of which those prayers were the interpreters, are awakened in the depth of the soul, and produce by their echoes, by their very confusion, a bewildering of the understanding, and a melting of the heart, which seek not language, but transpire in moistened eyes, a heaving breast, a prostrate forehead, and lips glued in silence to the sepulchral stone."

Messrs Bonar and McCheyne, during their visit to Jerusalem, examined the place alleged to be the site of Calvary, and they seem to have been fully satisfied, and Professor Robinson arrived at the same conclusion, that the site on which the Church of the Holy Sepulchre stands is not the true site of Calvary. "The longer we remained," say the two former travellers, "in the Holy City, the more we were convinced that this is not the true site of Calvary. We are told expressly in the Scripture that 'Jesus suffered without the gate;' and also that 'the place where he was crucified was nigh to the city.' But the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is a long way within the walls of Jerusalem. We cannot believe that the ancient city was narrower or smaller in any way than the present Jerusalem. On the contrary, there is reason to believe that it was much more extensive. From the church along the Via Dolorosa, to the western entrance of the Mosque of Omar, is but a five minutes walk, and yet this must have been the whole breadth of the city, if the present Calvary was without the gate. How contrary is this to the description given by the Psalmist: 'Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together.'

"There is no tradition which may lead the mind to any other spot as the site of Calvary. It struck us forcibly that some place among the tombs on the high ground above Gihon was far more likely to have been the real situation. We could then understand how 'Jesus bearing his cross went forth into a place called the place of a skull,' and 'suffered without the gate.' There would be room for the 'garden,' and the new sepulchre of Joseph might well be hewn out of its rocks. But it is wisely ordered that a cloud of oblivion should rest over the spot where Immanuel died, and there is something pleasing to the mind in reflecting, that the turf that was stained with his blood, and the rocky tomb where he lay, are left unprofaned by the followers of a blind and wicked superstition."

CALVIN, JOHN, the distinguished Reformer, was born at Noyon, in Picardy, on the 10th of July 1509. From the respect in which his parents were held, even by the nobility of the district in which they lived, John received a very liberal education with the children of the Mommors, a family of the first rank in the neighbourhood. He accompanied them to Paris, where he studied in the College de la Marehe, under the celebrated Maturin Cordier, or Corderius. Thence he removed to the College of Montaigu, where he had for his tutor a Spaniard of extensive attainments as a scholar.

Calvin's father, as he wished that his son should enter the Church, obtained from the Bishop of Noyon a benefice in the Cathedral Church of that city, and afterwards the parochial cure of the village Pont l'Eveque, which had been the birth-place of the elder Calvin. Before leaving France, accordingly, John Calvin officiated for a short time as a curate in the Romish Church; but, in the wise providence of God, he was prevented from continuing long in communion with the apostasy of Rome. His father, thinking that the study of the law presented a better field for the successful exercise of his son's talents, recommended his abandonment of the clerical profession,—a step which the young man was the more ready to take, as, by the Divine blessing accompanying his study of the Sacred Writings, he had become disgusted with the superstitions of the Romish hierarchy, and convinced of the accordance of the Protestant principles with the Word of God.

Having come to the resolution of dedicating his talents to the study of the legal profession, he repaired to Orleans for that purpose; and so rapid and astonishing was his progress, that in a short time he was judged capable of filling the chair in the absence of any of the professors, and on leaving the university, he was offered the degree of Doctor, free of expense. His studies, however, were not confined to law, but he spent much of his time in the perusal of the Scriptures, and he was frequently consulted by those who wished to be instructed in the reformed religion. At this period he was accustomed, after a frugal supper, to study till midnight, and employ his morning hours in bed reviewing the studies of the preceding night. Though far from favourable to health, this sustained exertion could not fail in enabling him to store up that mass of solid erudition which so distinguished him in after life.

Anxious to perfect himself in the profession which he had adopted, Calvin attended the lectures of a distinguished civilian at Bourges; but from this place he was speedily recalled, in consequence of the sudden death of his father. After this melancholy event, which deprived him of a valuable counsellor and guide, he removed to Paris, where, in his twenty-fourth year, he published his 'Commentary on Seneca's Epistle concerning Clemency.' While in Paris, he became intimately acquainted with a number of those who had espoused the reformed religion; and so deeply did he become interested in their principles, that he resolved to dedicate himself to the service of God in connection with the Reformed Church.

His well-known talents and zeal led the Roman Catholics to watch his movements with the utmost suspicion, and they were not long in finding an excuse for raising against him and his friends a keen persecution. He found protection and an asylum, however, at the court of the Queen of Navarre, by whose intercession with the French government the storm was dispelled.

In the year 1534 the utmost severities were inflicted upon the Reformers. Eight martyrs were burned alive in Paris; and the king, Francis I., declared that he would not spare his own children if they should, by any chance, be infected with these "execrable heresies," as he called them. Calvin, grieved at the spirit of intolerance and persecution thus manifested towards his friends, determined to leave France; and, accordingly, he did so, after having first published, at Orleans, a small work in opposition to the doctrine that the soul sleeps when in a state of separation from the body.

In retiring from France, he proceeded as far as Basle, where he devoted himself to the study of the Hebrew language, and published his 'Institutes of the Christian Religion,' which have long been highly valued as an excellent system of theology. After completing this incomparable work, he set out for Italy to visit Renée, the duchess of Ferrara, and daughter of Louis XII., king of France. The interview was very pleasing to both parties, and tended to confirm the duchess still more strongly in her attachment to the reformed principles. During the rest of Calvin's life she continued his sincere and steady friend.

From Italy he passed again into France, where he settled his affairs, and brought along with him Anthony Calvin, his only surviving brother. His intention was to return to Basle or Strasburg, but, in consequence of the war which raged in various intervening places, he was led to change his route, and thus was conducted, by the mysterious arrangements of Providence, to Geneva,—the city which proved the scene of his useful and laborious efforts in the cause of Christ throughout the whole of his future life. The gospel had, before this time, been introduced into Geneva by the joint exertions of two very distinguished characters,—William Farel and Peter Viret.

On reaching the city, Calvin waited upon these good men, when Farel took the opportunity of urging him to remain with them and share their labours. For some time Calvin was resolute in refusing to yield to the arguments, powerful though they were, which were brought forward, when at length Farel, with a solemnity and pathos sufficient to awe the mind, burst forth in these words: "I denounce unto you, in the name of Almighty God, that if, under the pretext of prosecuting your studies, you refuse to labour with us in this work of the Lord, the Lord will curse you, as seeking yourself rather than Christ." Terrified by this dreadful denunciation, Calvin surrendered himself to the disposal of the presbytery and magistrates, who, with the consent of the people, appointed him preacher, and invested him also with the responsible office of professor of divinity.

No sooner had Calvin become connected with the Church in Geneva, than he devoted his powerful mind to the consideration of its internal condition, which was yet unsettled. Besides publishing a formulary of doctrine, and a catechism, he induced the citizens openly to abjure the errors of Popery, and on the 20th July 1539, the senate and the people, preceded by a public scribe, solemnly avowed their adherence to the doctrine of the Protestant religion. For some time a violent opposition was made to the exertions of Calvin by the Anabaptists; but so completely did he silence them in a public disputation, that they almost disappeared from the Church of Geneva. Another and a more copious source of discouragement, however, arose from the divided state of the city. Besides the profligacy which prevailed among certain classes of the community, ancient family feuds happened about this time to be revived. In this state of matters, when the minds of the people were agitated with civil broils, Farel, Calvin, and Couraut, openly declared that they could not conscientiously administer the Lord's Supper. This so enraged the chief men of the city, who were themselves opposed to Calvin and his colleagues, that these faithful servants of Christ were ordered to leave the city within two days. When Calvin was informed of the decree which had passed, he calmly said, "Certainly, had I been in the service of men, this would have been a bad reward; but it is well that I have served Him who never fails to repay his servants whatever he has once promised."

The banishment of these three devoted men produced a great sensation in the Reformed Churches throughout Switzerland and Germany. Various attempts were made to prevail upon the governors and people of Geneva to recall them; but in vain. They remained firm to their purpose. Calvin, accordingly, went first to Basle, then to Strasburg, where, with the sanction of the senate, he was appointed professor of divinity, with a liberal stipend. The ability with which he filled the chair to which he had been chosen soon raised his fame; and such was his influence over even the civil authorities of the place, that he succeeded in planting a French Church, and introduced such discipline as he approved. Nor did he forget his poor persecuted flock at Geneva, but by his letters encouraged and comforted them under all their trials, predicting that brighter days yet awaited them.

While at Strasburg Calvin published his 'Christian Institutions' in a more enlarged form, his 'Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans,' and a valuable treatise on the Lord's Supper. At this period, also, the Reformer married, by the advice of Bucer, Idolette de Bure, the widow of a leader among the Anabaptists.

In 1541 Calvin was appointed by the ministers of Strasburg to represent them in the conferences which Charles V. ordered to be held, first at Worms, then at Ratisbon, for the purpose of attempting a reconciliation between the Protestants and Roman Catholics. His appearances on both these occasions gave great satisfaction, and Melancthon, in particular, was so highly delighted, that he often honoured him with the name of "The Divine."

The time was now come when the Lord was pleased to revive his own work in Geneva. Of the four chief persecutors of God's servants, two of them were dead, and the other two banished, and a desire was universally manifested that Farel and Calvin should be recalled. The former, who had taken up his residence at Neufchatel, refused their request. A deputation was accordingly sent to Strasburg, that they might prevail upon the citizens to part with Calvin. To this they were very reluctant, and though the Reformer still loved the people of Geneva, he declined to quit a place where the Lord had so strikingly blessed his labours. At length, however, he was constrained to yield, and on the 13th of September 1541, he returned to Geneva, heartily welcomed both by the senate and the people. The understanding at Strasburg was, that his removal from them was merely temporary, but the people of Geneva did not rest until he was established permanently among them. As the only condition, however, on which he would consent to remain, he stipulated that the Presbyterian plan of Church government should become the adopted system of the Genevan churches. A decree was accordingly passed by the senate to that effect.

Being now settled in the former scene of his labours, he exerted himself more vigorously than ever in his varied and important duties. In every fortnight he preached one whole week; thrice every week he delivered lectures; on the Thursdays he presided in the meetings of the presbytery; on the Fridays he expounded the Holy Scriptures to the congregation. Besides these employments, he wrote many learned commentaries upon the sacred books, produced controversial writings of various kinds, and carried on an extensive correspondence. These, however, were merely his public avocations. His society was so much courted by enlightened men, that visitors from every part of Europe came to Geneva to ask his advice in religious matters; and such was the versatility of his powerful mind, that in the midst of his weightiest and most important studies, he was accessible to all who sought his counsel or assistance; and in seasons of peculiar trial to the Reformed Churches, the kindness of this great and good man was remarkably shown. In consequence of persecution, great numbers driven from Italy and France resorted to Geneva, where they obtained an asylum, and in the devoted Calvin they found a friend.

The attention which Calvin paid to his own flock was incessant. He visited, warned, exhorted them; and when the city was beset with the plague and famine, he stood forward, regardless of his own life, anxious to promote the spiritual and temporal welfare of the poor distressed people. Wherever his services were required he was ready at his post. But it was more peculiarly in seasons when the cause of religion was in peril that the energies of Calvin were put forth. Whether in opposition to the Roman Catholics, the Anabaptists, or the Libertines, he wielded his pen manfully in defence of the truth. The work which he published on the necessity of reforming the Church, and which appeared at the time the diet was assembled at Spire, attracted peculiar notice, and was, under God, one of the great means of awakening attention to the subject.

The fidelity of Calvin in discharging his pastoral duties exposed him to much obloquy and opposition from the immoral portion of the population of Geneva. He remained resolute and unmoved, however, boldly declaring the Word of truth, and reproving with all earnestness the vices which prevailed in the city. Nor was this faithfulness in God's work unattended with its reward. The Church of Geneva wonderfully increased in numbers, and the estimation in which the Reformer was held rose higher still, from the attention which he showed to the suffering Protestants, who flocked thither from all quarters.

About this period, though for a season he enjoyed a cessation from public disputes and contentions, he suffered a severe stroke in the death of his wife, who appears to have been much esteemed for her piety and Christian prudence. Her last words were peculiarly refreshing: "O glorious resurrection!—God of Abraham and of all our fathers, not one of the faithful who have hoped in thee, for so many ages, has been disappointed: I will also hope."

The Genevan Church now assumed, in all its extent, the Presbyterian polity; and, in addition to public preaching, the consistory resolved that every minister should visit every family from house to house, expounding the Scriptures, and catechising the inmates, with the view of ascertaining the extent of their knowledge of Divine truth. All festivals were abolished, and no other day was permitted to be kept holy except the Sabbath. These arrangements were not made, however, without violent opposition, so violent as to have broken the spirit and discouraged the efforts of any other man than John Calvin. He bore all with Christian resignation and invincible patience. In the midst of all opposition he remained firm in the maintenance of those doctrines which he believed to be consistent with the Word of God, and calmly but courageously obviated the objections which were offered against them. The language which he employed in speaking of the enemies of the truth was, we admit, in some cases strong, but were we in possession of all the circumstances, our opinion in this respect might be considerably modified. The charge has been made against our Reformer that he was too harsh in his treatment of heretics, and more particularly, that he was accessory to the burning of Servetus. The punishment, however, of this arch-heretic, it ought never to be forgotten, was the decree of the senate, not of the Church; and though Calvin and his colleagues might not consider themselves justified in interfering with what they regarded as the rightful prerogative of the magistrate, we ought to be cautious in blaming where we are not sufficiently acquainted with the state of the case.

In the condition of foreign Churches Calvin took a particular interest. By his correspondence he animated and encouraged the persecuted Protestants in Poland, France, and England; and the refugees from these countries, who came to Geneva, he treated with all kindness and Christian regard.

About this time he was attacked with a severe illness when preaching, and obliged to leave the pulpit. Rumours immediately spread that the Reformer was dead, and the Roman Catholics rejoiced at the intelligence so greatly that a day of public thanksgiving was appointed at Noyon, his native place. The intelligence, however, was false, for Calviu speedily recovered his wonted health and activity. Soon after he had regained his strength, he published his admirable 'Commentaries on the Psalms.' For some months his mind was much occupied with the gloomy state of affairs in France. A persecution had broken out with great atrocity and violence at Paris, and the blood of many Protestants was ruthlessly shed. At the instigation of Calvin the German States interfered, and by their friendly intercessions put an end to the calamities of the Church.

In little more than a year from his former illness, Calvin was seized with a quartan ague, which, continuing for eight months, reduced him to a state of debility, from which he never afterwards completely recovered. By the advice of his physicians, and at the urgent request of his friends, he was prevailed upon to refrain from preaching in public, and delivering his theological lectures. He still, however, continued to devote his days and nights to the dictating and writing of letters to various parts of Europe, and he very frequently exclaimed, amid his constant employment, "How unpleasant to me is an idle life!" Nor did he cease to take an interest in public matters. It was by his advice and encouragement, indeed, that amid all the troubles to which the Republic of Geneva was at this time exposed, the inhabitants established an extensive seminary or college for the instruction of youth. As soon as his health would permit, he resumed, though in great weakness, his labours, both in the pulpit and the theological chair. His strength, however, gradually diminished, and on the 6th of February 1564, he delivered his last sermon with difficulty, in consequence of an oppression on his chest. From that day he taught no more in public, unless when he was carried occasionally to the church, and addressed his people in a few words. The disease under which he laboured in his last illness was very severe and complicated, but in him "patience had her perfect work."

The closing scene of the Reformer's life is thus described by Beza:—"Calvin spent the remainder of his days, until death, in almost constant prayer. His voice, indeed, was interrupted by the difficulty of respiration; but his eyes, which retained their brilliancy to the last, uplifted to heaven, and his serene countenance, were certain proofs of the fervour of his devotion, and of his trust and confidence in God. He often, in his prayers, repeated the words of David, 'Lord, I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it;' and at times those of Ezekiah, 'I did mourn like a dove.' Once also I heard him say, 'Thou, Lord, bruise me, but I am abundantly satisfied, since it is thy hand.' His doors must have stood open day and night, if all had been admitted who, from sentiments of duty, were desirous to see him; but as he could not, from difficulty in speaking, direct his discourse to them, he requested they would rather pray for him, than be solicitous about paying their visits. Often, also, though I always found him glad to receive me, he was very scrupulous respecting the least interruptions thus given to the duties of my office; so sparing was he of the time which he knew ought to be spent in the service of the Church; and his conscientious feelings, lest he should give the smallest trouble to his friends, exceeded the bounds of moderation. Such was the manner of comforting both himself and friends until the 19th of May, when we ministers were accustomed to meet relative to the censure of morals, and to take a friendly meal together two days before Whitsuntide, and the celebration of the Lord's Supper. He expressed a wish that the common supper should on this day be prepared at his house, and rallying his little strength that remained, was carried from his bed to the adjoining chamber, when he said, 'I come to see you, my brethren, for the last time, never more to sit down with you at table.' Such was the commencement of one of the most melancholy repasts we ever took. He then offered up a prayer, took a small portion of food, and discoursed with us at supper in as cheerful a manner as his weakness permitted. Before supper was fully finished, he ordered himself to be carried back to the adjoining chamber, and addressing the company with a smiling countenance, said, 'This intervening wall will not prevent me from being present with you in spirit, though absent in body.' His prediction was fulfilled, for from this day he always lay in a horizontal posture, his small body, except his countenance, which was very little changed, being so much emaciated, that breath only remained. On the 27th of May, the day of his death, he appeared stronger, and spoke with less difficulty; but this was the last effort of nature, for about eight o'clock in the evening certain symptoms of dissolution suddenly manifested themselves. When one of his domestics brought one of the brethren and me, who had only just left him, this intelligence, I returned immediately with all speed, and found he had died in so very tranquil a manner, that without his feet and hands being in any respect discomposed, or his breathing increased, his senses, judgment, and in some measure his voice, remaining entire to his very last gasp, he appeared more to resemble one in a state of sleep than death."

Thus died one of the brightest characters that has ever adorned the page of history. His death was bewailed by all classes of the community. In him the Church of Geneva lost a faithful and devoted pastor,—the city, a wise, philanthropic, and public-spirited citizen,—the college, a learned and able professor; and all, a common parent and friend. His funeral was attended by the authorities, civil and ecclesiastical, of the town, and a great proportion of the citizens. Many tears were shed on the occasion, and for some days a gloom seemed to be thrown over the city. According to his own directions, no monument was erected to his memory. Neither was this necessary. Calviu can never be forgotten. Si monumentum quaeris, circumspice. "If you wish to see his monument, reader, look around you."

CALVINISM, the name given to that system of religious faith which corresponds in the main with that of Calvin, though in some points differing from the views of the illustrious Reformer. Calvin considered the Presbyterian form of government as that by which every church should be regulated. He proposed that it should be governed by presbyteries and synods, composed of clergy and laity, without bishops, or any clerical subordination, and maintained that the province of the civil magistrate extended only to its protection and outward accommodation. He acknowledged a real, though spiritual presence of Christ in the eucharist; and he confined the privilege of communion to such as gave evidence of being true believers. These sentiments, however, are not imbibed by all who are called Calvinists.

In 1536, Calvin was appointed professor of divinity at Geneva, where he established that system of Church polity called Presbyterianism, originally considered as an essential part of Calvinism; but since the Synod of Dort, which embraced, digested, and established his theological principles, in 1618, above forty years after his decease, the term Calvinism is generally confined to those principles, independent of his system of Church polity.

Calvinists, however, contend that their system did not originate with Calvin, but is as ancient as the Scriptures from which it is drawn. They also say it is in substance the same as that of Augustine, and it is certainly very difficult to distinguish them. Mr Toplady, in his 'Historic Proof,' has, indeed, traced the doctrine, in a series of quotations, from the times of the apostles to those of the Reformation; and though some of his extracts may be objected to, the work, as a whole, seems scarcely to admit of refutation. Our present object, however, is, to represent the sentiments of Calvin, and those denominated from him, which have been distinguished into High (hyper, or ultra) Calvinists, Strict Calvinists, and Moderate (or modern) Calvinists.

The first class will be found described in this work, under ANTINOMIANS, and HOPKINSIANS, to which it is sufficient to refer. Strict Calvinists are those who adopt the opinions of Calvin himself, and the Synod of Dort, above referred to. The most disputed point in Calvin's system, is the doctrine of absolute predestination, and its counterpart, reprobation: on these points, therefore, we shall quote his own words, in which, if he errs by excessive rigour in his statements, the origin of his error can be seen.

"Predestination," says Calvin, "by which God adopts some to the hope of life, and adjudges others to eternal death, no one, desirous of the credit of piety, dares absolutely to deny. But it is involved in many cavils, especially by those who make foreknowledge the cause of it. We maintain, that both belong to God; but it is preposterous to represent one as dependent on the other.

"Predestination we call the eternal decree of God, by which he hath determined, in himself, what he would have to become of every individual of mankind. For they are not all created with a similar destiny; but eternal life is fore-ordained for some, and eternal damnation for others. Every man, therefore, being created for one or the other of these ends, we say he is predestinated either to life or to death."

This point, this eminent Reformer proceeds to argue from the conduct of the Almighty respecting the seed of Abraham, and toward certain individuals, as Jacob and Esau.

"Now, with respect to the reprobate," proceeds Calvin, "whom the apostle introduces in the same place,—as Jacob, without any merit yet acquired by good works, is made an object of grace, so Esau, while yet unpolluted by any crime, is accounted an object of hatred. Rom. ix. 13. If we turn our attention to works, we insult the apostle, as though he saw not that which is clear to us: now, that he saw none is evident, because he expressly asserts the one to have been elected, and the other rejected, while they had not yet done any good or evil, to prove the foundation of Divine predestination not to be in works. Secondly,

When he raises the question, whether God is unjust, he never urges, what would have been the most absolute and obvious defence of his justice, that God rewarded Esau according to his wickedness—but contents himself with a different solution,—that the reprobate are raised up for this purpose, that the glory of God may be displayed by their means. Lastly, He subjoins a concluding observation,—that 'God hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.' You see how he attributes both to the mere will of God. If, therefore, we can assign no reason why he grants mercy to his people, but because such is his pleasure, neither shall we find any other cause but his will for the reprobation of others; for when God is said to harden or show mercy to whom he pleases, men are taught by this declaration to seek no cause besides his will."

It is most clear, however, from his words elsewhere, that this great divine did not mean to destroy human responsibility, nor to set aside the use of means; since the Scripture addresses to man exhortations and reproofs, though it constantly attributes to the grace of God the spirit and power of obedience.

We shall subjoin only, as immediately connected with this subject, Calvin's opinion of the corruption of human nature, by original sin. The following is his doctrine on this mysterious point:—

"Original sin appears to be an hereditary pravity and corruption of our nature, diffused through all the parts of the soul, rendering us obnoxious to the Divine wrath, and producing in us those works which the Scripture calls works of the flesh. . . . These two things, therefore, should be strictly observed: first, that our nature, being so totally vitiated and depraved, we are, on account of this very corruption, considered as convicted and justly condemned in the sight of God,—to whom nothing is acceptable but righteousness, innocence, and purity. And this liableness to punishment, arises not from the delinquency of another; for when it is said that the sin of Adam renders us obnoxious to the Divine judgment, it is not to be understood as if we, though innocent, were undeservedly loaded with the guilt of his sin; but because we are all subject to a curse in consequence of his transgression,—he is, therefore, said to have involved us in guilt. Nevertheless, we derive from him, not only the punishment, but also the pollution, to which the punishment is justly due."

We now proceed to exhibit an abstract of the same system, as arranged and matured in the articles of the Synod of Dort, in reference to the five points in dispute with the Arminians (as stated under that article), which forms the general standard of Strict Calvinism.

1. OF PREDESTINATION.—"As all men have sinned in Adam, and have become exposed to the curse, even eternal death, God would have done no injustice to any one, if he had determined to leave the whole human race under sin and the curse, and to condemn them on account of sin; according to those words of the apostle, 'All the world is become guilty before God.' Rom. iii. 19, 23, vi. 23. . . .

"That some, in time, have faith given them by God, and others have it not given, proceeds from his eternal decree; for 'known unto God are all his works from the beginning.' Acts xv. 18; Eph. i. 11. According to which decree, he graciously softens the hearts of the elect, however hard, and he bends them to believe; but the non-elect he leaves, in just judgment, to their own perversity and hardness. And here, especially, a deep discrimination, at the same time both merciful and just, a discrimination of men equally lost, opens itself to us; or that decree of election and reprobation which is revealed in the Word of God; which, as perverse, impure, and unstable persons do wrest to their own destruction, so it affords ineffable consolation to holy and pious souls.

"But election is the immutable purpose of God; by which, before the foundations of the earth were laid, he chose, out of the whole human race, fallen by their own fault from their primeval integrity into sin and destruction, according to the most free good pleasure of his own will, and of mere grace, a certain number of men, neither better nor worthier than others, but lying in the same misery with the rest, to salvation in Christ; whom he had, even from eternity, constituted mediator and head of all the elect, and the foundation of salvation; and, therefore, he decreed to give them unto him to be saved, and effectually to call and draw them into communion with him, by his Word and Spirit: or he decreed himself to give unto them true faith, to justify, to sanctify, and at length powerfully to glorify them. Eph. i. 4-6; Rom. viii. 30.

"This same election is not made from any foreseen faith, obedience of faith, holiness, or any other good quality and disposition, as a pre-requisite cause or condition in the man who should be elected. 'He hath chosen us, not because we were, but that we might be, holy.' Eph. i. 4; Rom. ix. 11-13; Acts xiii. 48.

"Moreover, Holy Scripture doth illustrate and commend to us this eternal and free grace of our election, in this more especially, that it doth testify all men not to be elected, but that some are non-elect, or passed by, in the eternal election of God; whom truly God, from most free, just, irreprehensible, and immutable good pleasure, decreed to leave in the common misery, into which they had, by their own fault, cast themselves; and not to bestow on them living faith, and the grace of conversion; but having been left in their own ways, and under just judgment, at length, not only on account of their unbelief, but also of all their other sins, to condemn and eternally punish them, to the manifestation of his own justice. And this is the decree of reprobation, which determines that God is in nowise the author of sin (which, to be thought of, is blasphemy), but a tremendous, incomprehensible, just judge and avenger."

2. OF THE DEATH OF CHRIST.—Passing over, for brevity's sake, what is said of the necessity of atonement, in order to pardon, and of Christ having offered that atonement and satisfaction, it is added: "This death of the Son of God is a single and most perfect sacrifice and satisfaction for sins, of infinite value and price, abundantly sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole world; but because many who are called by the gospel do not repent, nor believe in Christ, but perish in unbelief, this doth not arise from defect, or insufficiency of the sacrifice offered by Christ upon the cross, but from their own fault. . . .

"God willed that Christ, through the blood of the cross, should, out of every people, tribe, nation, and language, efficaciously redeem all those, and those only, who were from eternity chosen to salvation, and given to him by the Father,—that he should confer on them the gift of faith."

3. OF MAN'S CORRUPTION.—"All men are conceived in sin, and born the children of wrath,' indisposed to all saving good, propense to evil, dead in sin, and the slaves of sin; and without the regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit, they neither are willing nor able to return to God, to correct their depraved nature, or to dispose themselves to the correction of it." This will not be found to differ materially from the third article of the ARMINIANS, and therefore need not here be enlarged on, though both widely differ from the doctrine of the later Remonstrants, and Anti-Calvinists in general.

4. OF GRACE AND FREE-WILL.—"But in like manner as, by the fall, man does not cease to be man, endowed with intellect and will; neither hath sin, which hath pervaded the whole human race, taken away the nature of the human species, but it hath depraved and spiritually stained it: so that even this Divine grace of regeneration does not act upon men like stocks and trees, nor take away the properties of his will, or violently compel it, while unwilling; but it spiritually quickens, heals, corrects, and sweetly, and at the same time powerfully, inclines it: so that whereas it before was wholly governed by the rebellion and resistance of the flesh, now prompt and sincere obedience of the Spirit may begin to reign; in which the renewal of our spiritual will, and our liberty, truly consist: in which manner (or for which reason), unless the admirable Author of all good should work in us, there could be no hope to man of rising from the fall by that free-will by which, when standing, he fell into ruin."

5. ON PERSEVERANCE.—"God, who is rich in mercy, from his immutable purpose of election, does not wholly take away his Holy Spirit from his own, even in lamentable falls; nor does he so permit them to decline that they should fall from the grace of adoption and the state of justification, or commit the sin unto death, or against the Holy Spirit; that, being deserted by him, they should cast themselves headlong into eternal destruction. . . . So that not by their own merits or strength, but by the gratuitous mercy of God, they obtain it, that they neither totally fall from faith and grace, nor finally continue in their falls and perish."

Having given this summary of the sentiments of Calvin himself, and of the Ancient or Strict Calvinists it is proper to observe, that there are, and always have been, many who embrace the Calvinistic system in its leading features, who object to some particular parts, and to the strong language in which some of the propositions are expressed. These are called Moderate, or Modern Calvinists, who differ from Calvin and the Synod of Dort chiefly on two points,—the doctrine of reprobation, and the extent of the death of Christ.

1. Reprobation, or "predestination to death or misery as the end, and to sin as the means, I call (says Dr E. Williams) an impure mixture" with Calvinism, "as having no foundation either in the real meaning of Holy Writ or in the nature of things; except, indeed, we mean by it, what no one questions,—a determination to punish the guilty." Dr Williams calls this a mixture, because its connection with predestination to life is arbitrary and forced;—impure, because the supposition itself is a foul aspersion of the Divine character. Augustine, Calvin, Perkins, Twisse, and Rutherford, appear to give countenance to this doctrine. But of all modern authors, if we except the philosophical Necessarians, Dr Hopkins, of America, seems the most open in his avowal of the sentiment" above mentioned. See HOPKINSIANS.

The term reprobate is indeed scriptural, simply meaning to reject; and stands in Scripture in immediate connection with the sins of those who are thus rejected. Thus the Prophet Jeremiah (vi. 30), speaking of the apostate Jews says: "Reprobate silver shall men call them, because the Lord hath rejected them;" not, however, before they had rejected him, and turned aside to idols; and the Apostle Paul speaks of some "reprobate concerning the faith;"—that is, who had rejected the truths of the gospel; and of others, as "reprobate to every good work," because they paid no regard to its holy precepts. See 2 Tim. iii. 8; Tit. i. 16. Nor does it appear to be ever used in the Scriptures in the sense of non-elected. Hence it has been contended by some writers, that reprobation has no connection with the predestination of the Scriptures.

It must be confessed after all, that the election of some men to everlasting life implies the non-election of others; which is a point to which the mind can never be reconciled, but from a deep conviction, that had we ourselves been left to perish in our sins, God would have been just in our condemnation, and that we have no claim to distinguishing mercy. "It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, and because his compassions fail not." When viewed in this its true light, the election of any, much more of so vast a multitude as shall finally be saved out of every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, appears an act of grace equally wonderful and glorious, and worthy of all the rapturous praise ascribed for it in the Scriptures.

As to reconciling the conduct of God with our view of the fitness of things, this is not the only case in which it seems impracticable in the present world. "O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" Rom. xi. 33. In such instances it is wise, as well as pious, to be silent; for "who art thou, O man, that repliest against God?" A very ingenious man, Mr John Bacon, the statuary, used to compare the rashness of our judging of the Divine conduct in our present state of imperfection, to the folly of a man who should judge of a room-full of complicated machinery, by looking through the key-hole.

2. The other subject on which Modern Calvinists differ from the great Reformer, relates to the nature and extent of Christ's death. The doctrines of atonement, and of justification by the imputation of Christ's righteousness, are clearly admitted by all who assume the name of Calvinists, and by many others; but there are subordinate points on which they differ. Some contend that Christ not only died restrictively for a certain number,—that is, the elect; but that he underwent a certain degree of punishment, exactly in proportion to the demerit of those individuals; inasmuch, that had their number, or the number of their sins, been greater, he must have suffered still more than he actually did for their redemption. This arises from their not only considering sins as debts, as our Lord himself teaches us, but from carrying the analogy further than the subject will allow; for sins and debts certainly will not in all points agree. As, for instance, debts may be paid in kind, by returning that which we owe,—which never can apply to sins. Nor does it appear consistent with the Divine dignity to represent the covenant of grace as a commercial bargain. Many Calvinists, therefore, represent human redemption, and they think scripturally, as flowing originally from the free and sovereign mercy of God, who having chosen to redeem sinners to himself, gave his only begotten Son to be their Redeemer, in a way honourable to the Divine perfections, as well as abundantly sufficient to obliterate human guilt; and this atonement they consider as expressly made, that "whosoever believes" in Christ, and cordially approves this way of salvation, "should not perish, but have everlasting life,"—its merits being fully commensurate to the whole mass of human guilt; so that virtually Christ died for all men, in the most unlimited sense, though those who receive not the atonement, can, of course, derive no benefit therefrom. And this may be illustrated even on the principle of a debt, since the offer of a friend to give pecuniary satisfaction for a debt may be rendered nugatory by the debtor himself refusing utterly to accept the boon. The gospel itself does not insist upon men being saved against their will.

Thus Dr Magge, in his excellent work on the atonement, says:—"The sacrifice of Christ was never deemed by any, who did not wish to calumniate the doctrine of atonement, to have made God placable; but merely viewed as the means appointed by Divine wisdom, by which to bestow forgiveness. But still, it is demanded, in what way can the death of Christ, considered as a sacrifice of expiation, be conceived to operate to the remission of sin, unless by the appeasing of a Being who otherwise would not have forgiven us? To this, the answer of the Christian is: I know not, nor does it concern me to know, in what manner the sacrifice of Christ is connected with the forgiveness of sins; it is enough that this is declared by God to be the medium through which my salvation is effected. I pretend not to dive into the counsels of the Almighty. I submit to his wisdom, and I will not reject his grace because his mode of vouchsafing it is not within my comprehension."

So Andrew Fuller, in his 'Calvinistic and Socinian Systems Compared,' strongly reprobates the idea of placating the Divine Being by an atonement; "contending that the atonement is the effect, and not the cause of Divine love" to men; and insists, "that the contrary is a gross misrepresentation of the Calvinists in general." Mr Fuller adds: "If we say a way was opened by the death of Christ, for the free and consistent exercise of mercy, in all the methods which sovereign wisdom saw fit to adopt, perhaps we shall include every material idea which the Scriptures give us of that important event."

Mr Jerram says, "I do not believe that any respectable writer, on our side, says that a satisfaction, or an atonement to Divine justice, was required as a motive to love and pity; but merely as a medium whereby that sentiment could be consistently manifested. No one supposes satisfaction for sins necessary to induce God to be merciful; though we do believe that that mercy could not be consistently manifested without an atonement." See Heb. ii. 9, 10.

In the article ATONEMENT were mentioned the various opinions which have been entertained, both in ancient and in modern times, in reference to the extent of Christ's death. We adverted particularly to the late lamented Dr Wardlaw, who, following in the steps of Dr Dwight, teaches the universality of the atonement.

It ought to be added, however, that these divines hold this universality of Christ's death to be perfectly consistent with the particular and efficacious redemption of the Church. Hence it is regarded by them as rather a more full development of the ancient doctrine, than a deviation from it.

After all that has been written against "the Calvinism of the Church of England," it appears to many of her members, that her system is that of MODERATE Calvinism. She embraces the doctrines of election, original sin, &c.; but she is silent on the doctrine of reprobation, and admits the universality of the Saviour's death.

It is much to be regretted that preachers and writers who have thought it their duty to oppose Calvinism, have so generally fallen into the same sort of error complained of under the article ARMINIANISM,—of not taking proper pains to understand what it is, or else have not possessed candour enough to do it justice. If, as is to be hoped, this is the effect of mere misapprehension, still, how deplorable it is that the disciples of one blessed Master should allow themselves to misapprehend one another on subjects of such vast practical moment!

"Whatever notions of an exaggerated sort (says the profound author of the 'Natural History of Enthusiasm') may belong to some Calvinists, Calvinism as distinguished from Arminianism, encircles or involves GREAT TRUTHS, which, whether dimly or clearly discerned,—whether defended in scriptural simplicity of language, or deformed by grievous perversions,—will never be abandoned while the Bible continues to be devoutly read, and which, if they might indeed be subverted, would drag to the same ruin every doctrine of revealed religion. Let it be granted that Calvinism has often existed in a state of mixture with crude, or presumptuous, or preposterous dogmas; yet surely whoever is competent to take a calm, an independent, and a truly philosophic survey of the Christian system, and can calculate also the balancings of opinion,—the antitheses of belief—will grant that if Calvinism, in the modern sense of the term, were quite exploded, a long time could not elapse before evangelical Arminianism would find itself driven helplessly into the gulf that had yawned to receive its rival; and to this catastrophe must quickly succeed the triumph of the dead rationalism of Neology, and then that of Atheism."

CAMALDOLITES, an order founded by Romauld, an Italian fanatic, in the eleventh century. The manner of life he enjoined his disciples to observe was this:—They dwelt in separate cells, and met together only at the time of prayer. Some of them, during the two lents in the year, observed an inviolable silence, and others for the space of a hundred days. On Sundays and Thursdays they fed on herbs, and the rest of the week only on bread and water.

CAMBRIDGE MANUSCRIPT, a copy of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, in Greek and Latin. Beza found it in the Monastery of Irenæus, at Lyons, in 1562, and gave it to the university of Cambridge in 1581. It is a quarto, and written on vellum. Sixty-six leaves of it are much torn and mutilated; and ten of these are supplied by a later transcriber. It is written in the scriptio continua, or without spaces between the words, and the Greek is in uncial characters. From this and the Clermont copy of Paul's Epistles, Beza published his larger annotations in 1582. See Dr Kipling's edition of it, published at Cambridge, 1793.

CAMEL. The original name of this animal has passed into most languages, ancient and modern. In Hebrew it is called gamal, from the verb to repay, requite; probably on account of its revengeful disposition. "A camel's anger," is an Arabian proverb for an irreconcilable enmity. There is no animal which remembers an injury longer, nor seizes with greater keenness the proper opportunity of revenge; which is the more remarkable on account of its gentle and docile disposition, when unprovoked by harsh treatment.

From the Scriptures we learn that the camel constituted an important branch of patriarchal wealth. Job had at first three thousand, and after the days of his adversity had passed away, six thousand camels. The Arabians estimate their riches and possessions by the number of their camels; and speaking of the splendour and wealth of a noble or prince, they observe, he has so many camels; not so many pieces of gold. The Midianites and Amalekites had camels without number, as the sand upon the sea-shore; many of which were adorned with chains of gold, and other rich and splendid ornaments. Judg. vii. 12. So great was the importance attached to the management and propagation of camels, that a particular officer was appointed in the reign of David, to superintend their keepers. Nor is it without a special design, that the inspired writer mentions the descent of the person appointed; he was an Ishmaelite, and therefore supposed to be thoroughly skilled in the treatment of that useful quadruped.

There are as many as seven species of camels discriminated by zoologists; but it is only the Arabian camel, or dromedary, and the Bactrian camel, that are known in Scripture.

The former species is distinguished by having only one bunch or protuberance on the back. Its general height, measured from the top of the dorsal bunch to the ground, is about six feet and a half, but from the top of the head, when the animal elevates it, it is not much less than nine feet: the head, however, is usually so carried as to be nearly on a level with the bunch, or rather below it, the animal bending the neck extremely in its general posture. The head is small, the neck very long, and the body of a long and meagre shape; the legs rather slender, and the tail, which is slightly tufted at the extremity, reaches to the joints of the hind legs. The feet are very large, and are hoofed in a peculiar manner, being divided above into two lobes, the extremity of each lobe being guarded by a small hoof. The under part of the foot is guarded by an extremely long, tough, and pliable skin, which, by yielding in all directions, enables the animal to travel with peculiar ease and security over dry, hot, stony, and sandy regions, which would soon parch and destroy the hoof. On the legs are six callosities,—one on each knee, one on the inside of each fore-leg on the upper joint, and one on the inside of each hind-leg at the bottom of the thigh. On the lower part of the breast is also a large callous or tough tubercle, which is gradually increased by the constant habit which the animal has of resting upon it in lying down.

The native country of the camel is Arabia, from whose burning deserts it has been gradually diffused over the rest of Asia and Africa. The Arab venerates his camel as the gift of Heaven, as a sacred animal, without whose aid he could neither subsist, trade, nor travel.

The hair of these animals, which is fine and soft, and is renewed every year, is used by the Arabians to make stuffs for their clothing and furniture. It was of this material that Elijah the Tishbite wore a dress (2 Kings i. 8); and also John the Baptist. Matt. iii. 4. It must not be supposed, however, that the description of hair-cloth used by these and other prophets mentioned in Scripture, bore any resemblance to the beautiful Cashmere shawl, imported into this country: it was a much coarser manufacture of this material, and is still used by the modern dervises. We may probably obtain some idea of its texture, from what Braithwaite says of the Arabian huts: "They are made of camels' hair, something like our coarse hair-cloths to lay over goods."

Blessed with their camels, the Arabs not only want for nothing, but they fear nothing. In a single day they can traverse a tract of fifty leagues into the desert, and thus escape the reach of their enemies. All the armies in the world, says Buffon, would perish in pursuit of a troop of Arabs. Figure to yourself, for instance, observes this writer, a country without verdure and without water, a burning sand, an air always clear, plains of sands, and mountains still more parched, over which the eye extends without perceiving a single animated being; a dead earth, perpetually tossed by the winds, presenting nothing but bones, scattered flints, rocks, perpendicular or overthrown; a naked desert, where the traveller never breathes under a friendly shade, where nothing accompanies him, and where nothing recalls to mind the idea of animated nature; an absolute solitude, infinitely more frightful than that of the deepest forest,—for to man trees are, at least, visible objects; more solitary and naked, more lost in an unbounded void, he everywhere beholds the extended space surrounding him as a tomb; the light of the day, more dismal than the darkness of night, serves only to give him a clearer idea of his own wretchedness and impotence, and to present before his eyes the horror of his situation, by extending around him the immense abyss which separates him from the habitable parts of the earth,—an abyss which he would in vain attempt to traverse, for hunger, thirst, and burning heat haunt him every moment that remains between despair and death. The Arab, nevertheless, by the assistance of his camel, has learned to surmount, and even to appropriate these frightful intervals of nature to himself. They serve him for an asylum, they secure his repose, and maintain his independence. The Arab is early accustomed to the fatigues of travelling, to want of sleep, and to endure hunger, thirst, and heat. With this view he instructs, rears, and exercises his camels. A few days after their birth, he folds their limbs to remain on the ground, and in this situation he loads them with a pretty heavy weight, which is never removed but for the purpose of replacing a greater. Instead of allowing them to feed at pleasure, and to drink when they are thirsty, he regulates their repasts, and makes them gradually travel long journeys, diminishing at the same time their quantity of food. When they acquire some strength, he exercises them to the course, he excites their emulation by the example of horses, and in time renders them equally swift, and more robust. At length, when he is assured of the strength, fleetness, and sobriety of his camels, he loads them with whatever is necessary for his and their subsistence, departs with them, arrives unexpectedly at the confines of the desert, robs the first passenger he meets, pillages the straggling habitations, loads his camels with the booty, and, if pursued, is obliged to accelerate his retreat. It is on these occasions that he unfolds his own talents and those of his camels; he mounts one of the fleetest, and conducting the troop, makes them travel night and day, almost without stopping to eat and drink; and in this manner he easily passes over the space of three hundred leagues in eight days. During all that time of fatigue and travel, he never unloads his camels, and only allows them an hour of repose, and a ball of paste each day. They often run in this manner for eight or nine days without meeting with any water, and when by chance there is a pool at some distance, they scent the water, even when half a league from it. Thirst makes them redouble their pace, and they drink as much at once as serves them for the time that is past, and for as much to come; for their journey often lasts them several weeks, and their abstinence continues till their journey is accomplished.

The driest thistle and the barest thorn are all the food this useful quadruped requires; and even these, to save time, he eats while advancing on his journey, without stopping or occasioning a moment of delay. As it is his lot to cross immense deserts where no water is found, and countries not even moistened with the dew of heaven, he is endued with the power, at one watering place, to lay in a store, with which he supplies himself for thirty days to come. To contain this enormous quantity of fluid, nature has formed large cisterns within him, from which, once filled, he draws at pleasure the quantity he wants, and pours it into his stomach, with the same effect as if he then drew it from the spring.

Notwithstanding that the camel is so extremely revengeful as to bear in mind, and resent, in the most terrible manner, any injury it may have sustained, its patience is the most extraordinary. Its sufferings seem to be great; for, when it is overloaded, it sends forth the most lamentable cries, but never offers to resist the tyrant who oppresses it. At the slightest sign it bends its knees, and lies upon its belly, suffering itself to be loaded in this position; at another sign it rises with its load, and the driver, getting upon its back, encourages the animal to proceed with his voice and with a song.

Throughout Turkey, Persia, Egypt, Arabia, Barbary, and various other contiguous countries, all kinds of merchandise are carried by camels, which, of all conveyances, is the most expeditions, and attended with the least expense. Merchants and other travellers assemble, and unite in caravans to avoid the attacks and robberies of the Arabs. These caravans are often numerous, and are always composed of more camels than men. Each camel is loaded according to his strength; the larger ones carrying from a thousand to twelve hundred pounds weight, and the smaller from six to seven hundred. Burckhardt states that a camel can never be stopped while its companions are moving on. The Arabs are, therefore, highly pleased with a traveller who jumps off his beast, and remounts without stopping it, as the act of kneeling down is troublesome and fatiguing to the loaded camel, and before it can rise again, the caravan is considerably a-head. He also affirms it to be an erroneous opinion, that the camel delights in sandy ground. It is true, he remarks, that he crosses it with less difficulty than any other animal, but wherever the sands are deep, the weight of himself and his load makes his feet sink into the sand at every step, and he groans and often sinks under his burden. Hence this traveller states it to be, that camels' skeletons are found in great numbers where the sands are deepest. It is the hard gravelly ground of the desert, which is most agreeable to this animal.

The Bactrian camel is distinguished from the Arabian camel or dromedary, by having two bunches on his back. It is not so numerous as the other, and is chiefly confined to some parts of Asia. Unlike the dromedary, whose movement, as we have seen, is remarkably swift, the Bactrian camel proceeds at a slow and solemn pace.

From the account now furnished of this animal, we may see the propriety and beauty of several passages of Scripture, in which it is mentioned or alluded to.

It shows with what propriety the prophet calls this animal the "swift dromedary" (Jer. ii. 23), as well as the wisdom of Esther's messengers, in choosing it to carry their despatches to the distant provinces of the Persian empire. Esth. viii. 10.

In that sublime prediction, where the prophet foretels the great increase and flourishing state of Messiah's kingdom, by the conversion and accession of the Gentile nations, he compares the happy and glorious concourse to a vast assemblage of camels: "The multitude of camels shall cover thee, the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah." That people, rather than irrational animals, are intended, is evident from these words: "All they from Sheba shall come; they shall show forth the praises of the Lord." Isa. lx. 6. In adopting this figure, the prophet might, perhaps, have his eye on the hieroglyphical writing of the Egyptians, in which the figure of a camel represented a man; and if so, besides its strict conformity to the genius of Hebrew poetry, we can discern a propriety in its introduction into this illustrious prediction. Some interpreters piously refer the prophecy to Christ himself; and imagine it began to receive its accomplishment when the magi, proceeding from the very places mentioned by the prophet, worshipped the new-born Saviour, and "presented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh." But Midian, and the other places mentioned by the prophet, lay to the south of Judea; while the evangelist expressly says the magi came from the east; which, as well as their name, magi, or wise men, clearly proves that Persia was their native country, and the place of their abode.

To pass a camel through the eye of a needle, was a proverbial expression among the nations of high antiquity, denoting a difficulty which neither the art nor the power of man could surmount. Our Lord condescends to employ it in his discourse to the disciples, to show how extremely difficult it is for a rich man to forsake all for the cause of God and truth, and obtain the blessings of salvation: "I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven." Matt. xix. 24. Many expositors are of opinion, that the allusion is not to the camel, but to the cable by which an anchor is made fast to the ship; and for camel they read camil, from which our word cable is supposed to be derived. It is not, perhaps, easy to determine which of these ought to be preferred; and some interpreters of considerable note have accordingly adopted both views. Others have asserted, that there was near Jerusalem a low gate, called the Needle's Eye, under which a camel could not pass without being unloaded.

However, though the exact proverbial expression, which was doubtless well understood by those to whom it was addressed, may be to us unintelligible, the instruction conveyed is obvious. Riches are a snare, and often a hindrance in the way to heaven; and the heart that is supremely set upon them, can never be brought to a cordial surrender of itself to the meek, lowly, and self-denying Jesus, without which it is impossible to enter into his kingdom. But the things that are impossible with men are possible with God. Divine grace can do away the impossibility, by bringing the heart to a willing compliance with the requirements of the gospel.
